The plaintiff does not allege that any provisions of the contract sued on, and especially set out in the contract, were waived by the defendant, but simply pleads that the defendant waived the provisions of its by-laws and constitution set out by the defendant in its answer, and seems to limit this waiver to the fact of initiation. It was the duty of the court to dispose of this case on the issues tendered, and upon none other. Proof cannot be considered which does not have its foundation in the allegations made in the pleading. A fact, though proven, if not alleged as a basis for recovery, or a basis for avoiding matters set up by the opposite party, cannot be considered. Where a waiver is relied upon as a matter of defense, or to avoid matters set out in an answer, the waiver must be pleaded and the facts alleged, upon which it is predicated, and if not so pleaded, the party cannot avail himself of the waiver, though it may appear in the evidence.

This question was considered in Parsons v. Grand Lodge [596] A. O. U. W., reported in 108 Ia. 6, 78 N. W. 676, the part referred to being on page 9, second division. The court said: "The petition alleges that due notice of death of the deceased was presented to the proper officers of the defendant. This is denied in the answer. To sustain the allegation the plaintiff introduced a letter written by her attorney to the Grand Recorder of the defendant at Waterloo, in which the association was informed of Parson's death, and asked what was needed by way of proofs. To this the recorder responded by saying that Parsons had been suspended for nonpayment of dues and other delinquencies, further stating that if the attorney 'understood the laws of Iowa governing this class of insurance, he would undoubtedly hesitate to have taken an action in the case without further evidence.' Undoubtedly this amounted to a waiver of proofs of loss" (citing cases). "But as a waiver was not pleaded, it cannot be relied upon" (citing cases).

We think the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff upon the issues and proofs submitted. For this reason the case must be reversed.

Other matters argued depend entirely upon the by-laws and constitution of the order, proof of which, as said before, was rejected by the court. We think, however, sufficient showing was made to entitle the plaintiff to have Exhibit D-1, containing what purported to be the constitution and by-laws of the society, admitted in evidence; but that matter is not argued here, and we do not give it further consideration. In view of another trial, we refrain from commenting on the evidence, and we do not give consideration to other questions urged by counsel in argument, as it is not likely that they will occur on another trial.

For the error pointed out we think the case must be reversed and is Reversed.

What Constitutes Membership in Beneficial Association.

Introductory.

The formalities through which one must go in order to become a member of a benevolent association vary with each association. Each society has its own constitution and by-laws, and each enforces them with varying degrees of strictness. The relationship between the member and the association is based on "a sort of glorified insurance contract," and the applicant for membership must conform to all of the requisites which are considered to be conditions precedent to the inception of the contract. In speaking of this relationship the court in Devins v. Royal Templars of Temperance, 20 Ont. App.

259, said: "It was a matter of contract, and though it may savour a little of absurdity that the omission of a mere formal ceremony should prevent this contract becoming operative, it is not competent for us to make new contracts for the parties or to dispense with conditions which they deem essential." And in Wintergerst v. Court of Honor, 185 Mo. App. 373, 170 S. W. 346, the following general principles were laid down: "Contracts of this class, entered into by benevolent fraternal organizations, have been before our courts so often that it is unnecessary to review or repeat the law as announced in the numerous decisions which is to be applied to the contracts of like organizations. A few fundamental propositions lie at the foundation of all these decisions. One of these is, that contracts of indemnity or insurance, such as evidenced by these benefit certificates and the laws of the order which enter into the contract, just as are policies issued by regular insurance companies, are to be construed strictly against the organization, the courts being reluctant to decree forfeiture, and that the organization, although one formed to carry out a scheme of benevolent aid, is still an insurer and to be so treated. Another is that while parties enter into these organizations voluntarily and are presumed to have assented to the rules and regulations of the order, they are entitled to have those rules and regulations applied to them as they are to other members, and not to have their rights forfeited on a strained, harsh or too technical interpretation or application thereof. Another rule and following the above is, that these orders, like all bodies, whether corporate or individual, may be estopped from claiming a strict enforcement and application of the rules of the order, when to effect such will work a forfeiture, when by their course of conduct they have led those dealing with them as members to believe and to act upon the belief that a strict compliance with the rules would not be required, nor their rights lost by failure to comply. These are particularly so when the organization has treated the party as a member in good standing up to the time of his death, accepting from him dues and assessments paid by him during his life, and retained by the organization."

Initiation.

The general rule is that when an initiation is required in the by-laws of a beneficial association the requirement is considered to be a condition precedent to membership. Supreme Knights, etc. v. Johnson, 81 Ark. 512, 99 S. W. 834; Bruner v. Brotherhood of American Yeoman, 136 Ia. 612, 111 N. W.

Canadian Order of Chosen Friends, 29 Ont. 125, 18 Can. L. T. 86.

In Devins v. Royal Templars of Temperance, supra, it appeared that the defendant society was composed of two classes of members, royal degree and select degree. The latter was the higher class. In order to become a member of the select degree the course of proceedings was as follows: "A person was first of all required to become a member of the royal degree; then, if he desired to do so, he might be raised to the select degree. No person could hold a policy of insurance, called a beneficiary certificate, unless he belonged to the select degree; and no person could belong to the select degree who did not hold a policy of insurance; therefore, persons belonging to the royal degree who desired to get a policy of insurance had, first of all, to apply to be admitted into the select degree; then the application was balloted upon by the other members of the degree to which they all belonged; if the ballot was in favor of the admission of the applicant into the select degree, then he applied to be examined by the medical examiner of the court; if the medical examination proved to be satisfactory, the application and report were forwarded to the council of the head body in Hamilton—the head council or grand or dominion council it is called in the rules—to be approved of or rejected by them; with that was forwarded the application for a policy of insurance, which the applicant desired to have, because the amounts varied. If the grand or dominion council passed the application they drew a policy and forwarded it to the local body, that is to say, they sent it to the beneficiary secretary of the local court." The applicant was a royal degree member and applied for the higher degree. He was elected and passed the medical examination. A policy was made out at the head office and sent to the secretary of the local lodge. It was provided that "when the beneficiary secretary has received the certificate of an applicant, . . . he shall advise the applicant to appear and receive the degree." On the back of the policy was printed the following: "This certificate does not go into force until it has been signed by the council, sealed with the council seal, and the applicant has been raised to the select degree, and has signified his acceptance by signing the certificate." At the time appointed for the initiation the applicant was ill and could not attend. His policy was sent him, however, and he signed the acceptance of it. It was held that there was no liability on the policy because the initiation was a condition precedent. The court said: "It is not at all easy to gather . . . that this ceremony of conferring the degree was actually one of the conditions to the raising of the brother to the select degree; but I think that it plainly appears from all the rules taken together; it appears with a reasonable degree of certainty that it was a necessary formality. It was a formality which, undoubtedly, the company had a right to stipulate for; they had the right to say, if they chose to do so, that the policy should not go into force, unless the applicant should attend at a particular time and place and go through a particular ceremony, and that if he did not do so the policy should not go into effect. That further appears to have been the intention from section 4, which says: 'Should the applicant fail to appear for the space of three months after such notice is given without a reasonable excuse, the fee shall be forfeited to the degree treasury, and a new election and medical examination will become necessary for admission.' It is indeed pointed out that under section 1, article 18, it is provided: 'No member of the order shall be raised to, or remain in connection with, the select degree unless he holds an unforfeited beneficiary certificate with the dominion council, and is in good standing in the royal degree of the council.' I think that cannot be taken to mean that he can hold it, and take the benefit of it, before he has actually been raised to the select degree, because it appears from section 3, in addition to the sections I have already referred to, that the assessments are not payable under the policy at all until the degree has actually been received; and it is evident that until the assessments are paid the policy does not go into effect; so that I think, under the rules, it was requisite that the deceased should appear and receive the degree before he became entitled to any benefit under the policy, and that not having done so the policy never went into effect—never went into force. In order that there may be no question upon the point, and to show the construction of the rules which I think was the correct one, the dominion council, in issuing the certificate, put also this note on the back of it—that was a condition that they imposed precedent to the policy going into effect—and as the applicant never was raised to the select degree, I think the policy was never anything but an escrow, although it came into his hands.”

In Hoefner v. Canadian Order of Chosen Friends, 29 Ont. 125, 18 Can. L. T. 86, the evidence showed that the applicant had performed all of the requirements for membership in the defendant association except initiation. He became very ill and was somewhat unconscious. While in this condition an officer of the local lodge administered the required oath of initiation. The applicant was too weak to repeat the oath, but he assented to it. It was held that this did not constitute the required initiation, and the applicant was therefore not a member. The court said: “Hoefner was not present, nor could he be; he was then in bed in a very low state—not expected to live, and did only live six days thereafter; so that, in fact, the ceremony of initiation, as required, was never completed; nor, in fact, was it ever begun; nor was the obligation administered in the solemn form required in a duly constituted court of the council after certain other forms and proceedings had been strictly complied with; I am, therefore obliged to find as a fact that Hoefner never became a member of the order.”

In Supreme Lodge, etc. v. Johnson, 81 Ark. 512, 99 S. W. 834, the provisions of the constitution and laws of the association in question declared that membership should not be complete until the applicants should be duly obligated in lodge session. The applicant was elected a member, but he was never initiated nor did he ever attend a meeting. He paid one assessment in the relief fund, but failed to pay another. He was then reported as suspended for nonpayment. He had been elected to an office in the lodge, but had never served. It was held that the initiation was a prerequisite to membership, and that the applicant was not a member. The reasons for the decision were given as follows: “If it be conceded that the subordinate lodge had the power, by any action of that body, to waive this positive requirement of the constitution and laws of the supreme lodge, the mere election to office in the lodge of an applicant for membership, where he was never admitted and never attended meetings or performed any of the duties of the office, could not operate as a waiver of any prerequisites to completed membership in the order. Certainly, it could not be considered a waiver until there was an acceptance of the office and an installation therein. The laws of the order provide that ‘in all acts performed in complying with the relief fund laws of the order the subordinate lodge and its officers are the agents of the members, and not the agents of the supreme lodge.’ It may well be doubted whether the subordinate lodge could waive the provision with reference to obligation or initiation at all, but this we deem it unnecessary to decide now. We do hold, however, that it was not waived in this instance.”

In Bruner v. Brotherhood of American Yeomen, 136 Ia. 612, 111 N. W. 977, it appeared that the rules of the defendant governing admission provided that a candidate must make application in which certain questions would be asked. If he should be elected to membership by the local lodge he was to be examined, and the application and the report of the examination were to be sent to the medical director. If that official approved he would forward the papers to the secretary of the order who would make out a certificate and forward it to the local lodge. The local official would notify the candidate, who must then be initiated. The local lodge could refuse to initiate the candidate at any time prior to the initiation, and could return his application fee. Bruner's certificate was sent to the local lodge, but he never presented himself for initiation. However, the chief correspondent had written him addressing him as “brother” and telling him where his policy could be found. He was notified that an assessment had been made against him. It was held, however, that this did not constitute membership. The court said: “Is the evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that Ernest Bruner ever became a member of the defendant association and entitled to benefits as such? If, on the one hand, we are to rely wholly upon the written laws and rules of the association as to the requirements precedent to such membership, and upon the other upon the acts of Bruner in fulfilling such requirements, it is very clear that the contract never became complete. . . . That Bruner did not comply with all these conditions of membership will have to be admitted, and, if he is to be treated as a member and the appellee entitled to maintain an action as the beneficiary of his membership, it must be upon the theory of some waiver or estoppel on part of the appellant. . . . We are of the opinion that a literal compliance with the conditions may be waived by the association, and that circumstances may arise under which it will be held estopped to allege noncompliance with such conditions in defense to an action for the recovery of benefits. If, for example, compliance with a given condition is habitually ignored by the association in its admission of members, or if an applicant upon a performance of part of the conditions is given recognition as a member, accorded entrance to its meeting, charged with accruing dues and benefit assessments and his payment thereof accepted and retained, we think no court would allow the society to escape payment of the benefits which pertain to membership simply because it may appear that one or more of the conditions prescribed in the formal rules or by-laws of such society as precedent to membership appear to have been omitted. Nor is the delivery of the policy or certificate in all cases essential to membership if the right to receive it is established by competent evidence. . . . But, as we read the record before us, it contains nothing upon which the court could find any habit or practice upon the part of the defendant association or of the local lodge to ignore or omit the requirement of 'adoption' as preliminary to the recognition of an applicant as a qualified member. Nor do we find sufficient to justify the conclusion that such recognition was accorded in this particular case to Ernest Bruner. . . . He is not shown to have claimed to be a member except as some inference of that nature may be drawn from an attempt in August to find the local correspondent in order to pay his dues, and from his inquiry of the chief correspondent in September; but both of these incidents are entirely consistent with an understanding on his part that he must be 'adopted' or initiated before his rights to the benefits of membership should become perfect. So far as we are told, he never attended a meeting of the lodge or claimed the right to do so, and, although the letter from the chief correspondent in September informed him where his policy could be found and where his payments should be made, there is no word or intimation given that he ever attempted to avail himself of this information. True, a few days prior to this letter the local correspondent had marked him in her record as 'suspended,' but, if this fact came to his knowledge, he seems to have accepted the situation, and thereafter until the date of his death, seven months later, conducted himself as an entire stranger to the association. Taken as a whole, we think the showing will not sustain the conclusion that Bruner ever became a member of the association."

In Triple Tie Ben. Assoc. v. Wood, 73 Kan. 124, 84 Pac. 565, the evidence showed that the application was made in December. It was accepted and the applicant was elected to membership. The certificate of membership was signed by the grand officers on December 29, and the applicant was initiated on January 16. Then the certificate was countersigned by the local officers and was delivered to the applicant. The constitution of the order provided that no beneficiary certificate of the member of the association should be or become effective or in force until countersigned, and the conditions of the certificate accepted by the member to whom it was issued. It was held that the applicant must become a member before he would be entitled to the benefits of the order, and that he did not become a member until his initiation.

Initiation is a prerequisite to membership in the Modern Brotherhood society. Thus, in Kolosinski v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 175 Mich. 684, 141 N. W. 589, it appeared that the certificate of membership contained an agreement by the applicant whereby she waived any and all rights to any benefit certificate issued thereon, until she had been regularly adopted and initiated. A by-law provided that no benefit certificate should be issued until the initiation, and officers were forbidden to waive any provision. The right to refuse to initiate at any time prior to the initiation was given to the local lodge. The applicant was never initiated, but her certificate was given to her husband by an officer's assistant. This was held not to constitute her a member. The court said: "In view of this plain and unequivocal waiver on the part of the insured, and the undisputed fact that she was never initiated in the order, and never was (after the date of the application) in a condition of 'sound health and physical condition,' so that she could have been initiated, we are of opinion that she never became a member of the defendant society, and that the membership certificate obtained by her through plaintiff never became a binding contract." In Louden v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 107 Minn. 12, 119 N. W. 425, the evidence showed that a promoter of the defendant was organizing a local lodge. Before the organization was completed, he received from the head office the certificates of membership for some of the charter applicants. He delivered one of these to the plaintiff's wife, but she was never initiated. The plaintiff was elected to an office and reported his wife as being a member, and the head office accepted her dues. It was held that because of not being initiated the applicant did not become a member. The court said: "The association issues no certificates except to members, and there can be no members until they pass the local physician's examination, receive the approval of the main office, are initiated into the lodge, and receive the obligation. Acceptance by a vote of the other members is a necessary step, but not the final act constituting membership. The by-laws also contain express stipulations, viz., that no certificate shall become binding until the applicant has become a member, and the certificate attested by the local officers and delivered to the applicant, in good health. The association reserves the right to cancel the application if, between the time of the physician's examination and the final act constituting membership, the applicant should become disqualified on account of sickness. The contract is that the applicant must be in good health at the time he completes the final act of membership. Then, and not till then, is he entitled to the certificate." In Shartle v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 139 Mo. App. 433, 122 S. W. 1139, it appeared that the applicant received his certificate from a local officer, and paid his dues. He died before he was initiated, and it was held that the initiation was a prerequisite to liability on the certificate. The court said: "It thus appears that there was delivered to deceased, and he accepted, a benefit certificate before he became initiated as a member of the defendant's subordinate lodge for Independence, and before he took upon himself any ritualistic work. The by-laws above quoted provide that, when the benefit certificate is received, the applicant therefor shall be initiated by the subordinate lodge. If initiation is refused, the certificate is to be returned to the supreme secretary at the home office. It will be seen that the by-laws further provide that no liability shall attach 'until all the acts, qualifications, and requirements prescribed, . . . and all the laws, rules, regulations and ritual shall have been fully complied with.' Such laws also provide that no officer is authorized to waive any provisions thereof. The deceased died without having complied with any of these prerequisites entitling him to a benefit certificate. . . . The question now under consideration has been before the courts in other states, and it is held that initiation into the lodge and compliance with essential terms of the by-laws of the association are necessary prerequisites to a valid and binding beneficiary certificate. . . . It cannot be denied, for the record conclusively shows, that deceased was never initiated into the society: nor were any of the essential matters done by him, required by the by-laws, which entitled him to a benefit certificate or obligated the society to pay the certificate after his death." In Driscoll v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 77 Neb. 282, 109 N. W. 158, it appeared that the applicant by his own solicitation persuaded the local officer to give him his certificate.

He paid all of his dues. He was not initiated and was held not to be a member. The court said: "The constitution of the association, as well as the statute under which it is conceded it does business, restricts the benefits of the association to its members and their beneficiaries. It is a secret order and it is a matter of common knowledge that initiation is a condition precedent to membership in an order of that character. To speak of an uninitiated member of a secret order would involve a contradiction of terms."

In Hiatt v. Fraternal Home, 99 Mo. App. 105, 72 S. W. 463, it appeared that a by-law provided that a benefit certificate should be delivered to an applicant on his initiation. The local lodge had the right to refuse to initiate an applicant at any time. An applicant's certificate was obtained by fraud, and an assessment was paid. He was not initiated, and it was held that he was, therefore, not a member. The court said: "Section 1408, R. S. 1899, from which defendant derives its power to issue certificates of insurance, declares fraternal beneficiary associations to be corporations formed and carried on for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries and not for profit; requires that they have a lodge system, a ritualistic form of work and a representative form of government. By requiring a lodge system the statute evidently intended that no person could become a member of these orders until he was initiated as a member of one of its lodges. The by-laws of the defendant expressly so provided. William Hiatt, never having been initiated into the lodge, never became a member of the association and was a person to whom the association could not rightfully issue a certificate of insurance. Matkin v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 82 Tex. 301. The only right that Hiatt had at any time was the right to become a member. Under a by-law of the order, which was a part of his contract, he lost this right by failing to present himself for initiation not later than the next meeting after his election. He let the time pass in which he might be initiated, notwithstanding his election, without first obtaining a dispensation from the supreme lodge permitting the local lodge to initiate him. This he did not procure. At the time of his death he was neither a member nor possessed of the right to become a member."

In Lloyd v. Modern Woodmen of America, 113 Mo. App. 19, 87 S. W. 530, the evidence showed that a by-law provided that "upon receipt of the benefit certificate, the local clerk shall notify the candidate and he shall be adopted by the camp at the next or some regular or special meeting, . . . but such certificate shall not be in force or effect until said adoption ceremony shall have been performed." It was held that initiation was a prerequisite to membership. The court said: "As a condition precedent to the delivery and taking effect of the certificate as a valid and binding contract, it was agreed and so stipulated in the by-laws that James W. Loyd should be adopted into the local camp and there was no way provided by which Loyd could become a member of the society except by being inducted into the order through the initiatory service and by taking upon himself the obligations required by the rules and laws of the society. This was as necessary to constitute him a member as is baptism necessary to induct one into the Christian church. The condition, therefore, that he should be adopted into the order before receiving a benefit certificate, was not a mere form or nonessential requirement, but was a necessary one under the charter of the society. Loyd could not be qualified to become a holder of a benefit certificate unless he was a member and he could not be a member until he was adopted. But respondent contends that the initiatory ceremonies were waived in Loyd's case. There is nothing in the record to show or tending to show a waiver. What it does show is that three officers of the local camp agreed to deliver the certificate and caused it to be done in violation of the by-laws of the order, and if their conduct should be upheld it would thwart the very purposes and objects of the society by sanctioning the issuance of benefit certificates to nonmembers. It was no more competent for these officers to sign and deliver the certificate to Loyd prior to his adoption into the camp than it would have been competent for a minister of the Baptist church to have received him into that ancient Christian denomination without baptism by immersion." In McWilliams v. Modern Woodmen of America (Tex.) 142 S. W. 641, it appeared that the applicant for membership contracted in his application as follows: 'I waive for myself and beneficiaries all claim of benefit under this application until it shall be approved by the head physician, and I shall be regularly adopted in accordance with the ritual of this society and shall make the payments as required by its by-laws at adoption, and any certificate which shall be issued to me in pursuance of this application shall be delivered to me after adoption and while in sound health.' The applicant was not initiated according to the ritual, and the certificate was not delivered. An officer gave him the secret work. The court said: "Not only is it to be presumed that the applicant, McWilliams, had notice of the by-laws of the society, but his application for membership made a part of the beneficiary certificate expressly agrees that the laws of the society shall form the sole basis of his admission to membership therein, and of the benefit certificate issued to him. The by-laws expressly provided that an applicant must be adopted by the local camp, and that a benefit certificate should not be delivered until after such adoption. John M. McWilliams did not become a beneficial member of the society by reason of his not having been adopted as provided by the provisions of the by-laws of the order, and the benefit certificate was not binding on the society."

In Porter v. Loyal Americans of Republic, 180 Mo. App. 538, 167 S. W. 578, it appeared that by the laws of the association the beneficiary certificate could not be delivered until the candidate had been initiated into the local lodge and had receipted for the certificate, nor was the applicant entitled to the certificate unless he was in good health at the time of his initiation and the delivery of the certificate. In November a candidate applied. His certificate was forwarded and received by the promoter of the local lodge on December 19. He died on December 25. The initiation had been set for December 26. The applicant had paid a registry and an assessment fee. He was held not to be a member. The court said: "Section 7109, Revised Statutes 1909, which was then in force, governed this case, and provided that such an association is carried on for the 'sole benefit of its members.' The only source of revenue is the assessments paid by members. The payment of benefits must be to those sustaining certain relations to members. It is imperative that each association doing business under this law have a lodge system with ritualistic form of work and representative form of government. The whole scheme of such an association contemplates a course of dealing in regard to levying assessments and paying benefits only among members. Regular initiation is the birth of a member. Until such event occurs, the association is dealing with an outsider, a nonmember, and an assessment paid by such a person or a benefit paid to him is a course of dealing beyond the power given by law to such associations. It is a condition precedent that is necessary to give life to the beneficiary certificate."

In Loyal Mystic Legion of America v. Richardson, 76 Neb. 562, 107 N. W. 795, the evidence showed that the application contained the same oath that was administered in the initiation. It was contended that by signing the application, the applicant took the oath, and that, therefore, the formal initiation was not necessary. The formal initiation was held, however, to be requisite to membership.

In Matkin v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 82 Tex. 301, 18 S. W. 306, 27 Am. St. Rep. 886, it appeared that the application contained the following clause: "I further agree and contract that the payment of the proposition fee, or the entertaining of this application, unless I am duly elected and initiated according to the ritual and laws of the order, does not and shall not constitute membership, or give me any of the rights of a member." The applicant passed his medical examination and was elected to membership. He died before initiation. He was held not to be a member. The court gave the reasons for its decision as follows: "It is not difficult to see why there should be a regular initiation into the order, and why members only can participate in its benefits; that the ceremony of initiation is secret does not affect it; it is doubtless intended to bind the members to a performance of their duties in respect to the objects to be accomplished. We could not say that it is a useless and unreasonable requirement. The affiliation is close and confidential, for good purposes so far as can be seen from the testimony. Were the ceremonies open they could not be said to be unreasonable; because they are secret does not make them so. The entire system, its existence and objects, are based upon initiation. We think there can be no membership without it, and no benefit, pecuniary or otherwise, without it."

In Sterling v. Head Camp, etc. 28 Utah 505, 80 Pac. 375, the evidence showed that the applicant had formerly been a member, and that his membership had lapsed. The constitution provided that when a member had been suspended for more than six months, he could not be reinstated, but must apply for membership on the same terms as any person who had not been a member of the order except that he should not be required to be introduced again formally in the ritual of the protection degree. The laws required a candidate to be initiated formally or instructed formally in the secret work, to take oath that he would guard the interests of the local lodge, and to pay all dues and assessments. It was held that the applicant could not become a member until he complied with all of the original requirements of initiation except that of being formally instructed in the secret work. The court said: "We know of no principle of law where it can be said that because one party to a proposed contract had done everything to express entire willingness to enter into and make it, but the other party, no matter whether from refusal or neglect, had not done so, therefore the court can treat the proposed contract as completed, and as though in fact made, and declare something existing which in fact had no existence. Where there are conditions precedent to the completion or giving effect to a contract, they must be fulfilled or waived before rights in or to the contract can vest or be legally asserted. . . . So far as we are able to gather from the laws of the society, section 110 of its constitution does not mean that a member who had been suspended for more than six months is not required to be reobligated, in order to renew membership on his application. The said section provides that he must 'apply for membership on the same terms as any person who has not been a member of the order except that he shall not be required to be again formally introduced in the ritual of the protection degree.' The terms 'introduced' and 'protection degree,' of course have here a technical meaning, and a meaning especially appropriate to the society. While this technical or special meaning has not been defined to us with such clearness as we would have liked, and in order to enable us to determine just what is embraced within it, yet sufficient is made to appear that the so-called obligation is quite apart from the contention counsel make. That is to say, while the applicant was not required to be formally initiated or instructed in the secret work of the protection degree or of the order, nevertheless he was required to take the obligation that he will guard the interests of the camp, and pay all dues and legal assessments; that he has not been rejected by or expelled from any camp of the order; and that he is in sound bodily health. And unless this obligation is taken, under the laws and rules of the society, when all its provisions are considered, the applicant cannot be said to have become a member. It can readily be seen that the exaction of these obligations or promises is just as requisite from such suspended member applying for membership as from a person who has not been a member."

In some cases, however, it has been held that initiation is not a condition precedent to membership. Brown v. Bowman, 10 Ga. App. 707, 73 S. E. 1078; Traders' Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, 109 Ill. App. 246; O'Neal v. Sovereign Woodmen of World, 130 Ky. 68, 113 S. W. 52; Wagner v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 128 Mich. 660, 87 N. W. 903; Wintergerst v. Court of Honor, 185 Mo. App. 373, 170 S. W. 346; Fisher v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 190 Mo. App. 606, 176 S. W. 269; National Aid Assoc. v. Bratcher, 65 Neb. 378, 91 N. W. 379, 93 N. W. 1122; Supreme Ruling etc. v. Crawford, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 603, 75 S. W. 844. And see the reported case. In Brown v. Bowman, supra, it appeared that the applicant had given a note for a premium due on his policy. He had never been initiated and had never been afforded an opportunity to be initiated. It was held that this would not invalidate either the policy or the note. In Traders' Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, supra, it appeared that the laws of the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the Order of Odd Fellows left the time when membership should begin to be regulated by local legislation. The lodge of the insured provided that a person might become a member on being elected and on paying certain fees. It was held that initiation was not a prerequisite to membership in the order.

Estoppel seems to be the basis of the ruling in several cases that an initiation or a formal initiation is not necessary to constitute one a member. Thus, in O'Neal v. Sovereign Woodmen of World, 130 Ky. 68, 113 S. W. 52, it appeared that the applicant had fulfilled all of the requirements set forth as prerequisite to membership. He presented himself for initiation, and because of a minor technicality it was urged that there could not be a valid initiation at that time. It was decided, however, that the technicality should not prevail. The candidate was initiated, was always considered to be a member, and was buried with the ceremony of the order. It was held that after his death it was too late to question the validity of the initiation. In Wagner v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 128 Mich. 660, 87 N. W. 903, the evidence showed that the society's laws provided that each applicant should undergo a medical examination to be made by a commissioned medical examiner, and that when the examination had been approved by the supreme medical examiner, and the applicant had paid the initial assessment and certificate fee, and had been initiated into the lodge, then such person should be entitled to any benefits that might be due in the event of death under the terms of the certificate issued. The applicant paid her dues, but was not initiated. There was a question whether the certificate had been issued. It was held that if the certificate was issued the initiation was waived and that she became a member from the time of the delivery of the certificate to the local lodge.

In Fisher v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 190 Mo. App. 606, 176 S. W. 269, it appeared that a by-law provided as follows: "No benefit certificate shall be issued by the supreme secretary until after the medical examination shall have been approved by the supreme medical examiner, and the person has been initiated in some lodge of this order or obligated in the first degree." The applicant was not formally initiated, but he was given the oath and the secret work. He was treated as a member, and received his certificate, and paid his dues. He was held to be a member, the court saying: "The contention that it is necessary for Fisher to be 'initiated' in some way other than by being merely obligated cannot be sustained. It is argued that the testimony of O'Keefe shows that further 'initiatory ceremonies' were necessary in order to constitute Fisher a member. But plaintiff is not bound by everything that this witness may have said. Nor is there anything to make it appear that the further ceremonies thus referred to were in any wise necessary to membership in the order, or a prerequisite to the issuance of a benefit certificate. On the contrary the by-laws provide that no benefit certificate shall be issued until the applicant is initiated into some lodge of the order, or obligated in the first degree. It nowhere appears that the obligation taken by Fisher was not of the requisite 'degree'; and the membership certificate was issued on the strength of this obligation, as being a full compliance with the laws of the order, the applicant was thereafter treated as a member, and his dues and assessments received by defendant. Under the circumstances the defendant should not be heard to say that he did not duly become a member." In Wintergerst v. Court of Honor, 185 Mo. App. 373, 170 S. W. 346, it appeared that the applicant had complied with all the requirements except as to initiation. It was provided that if an applicant could not attend a meeting and be initiated within sixty days, he should sign a blank to that effect. The applicant was given the oath at his home by the proper officer. He later attended meetings and was told that he had complied with the requirements for membership. He paid his dues. It was held that he became a member. In Supreme Ruling, etc. v. Crawford, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 603, 75 S. W. 844, it was held that even though the applicant had never been initiated into the order, yet by receiving his dues and assessments with full knowledge of the circumstances, the order waived the initiation, and it could not question his membership. The order had also issued a benefit certificate to the applicant.

Certificate of Membership.

The majority rule is that where the rules of a beneficial association require the delivery of a certificate of membership, that delivery is a condition precedent to membership. Kohen v. Mutual Reserve Fund Assoc. 28 Fed. 705; Delaney v. Modern Accident Club, 121 Ia. 528, 97 N. W. 91, 63 L.R.A. 603; Patterson v. Supreme Commandery United Order, etc. 104 Me. 355, 71 Atl. 1016; Court of Honor v. Hering, 178 Mich. 377, 144 N. W. 843; Erickson v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, etc. 129 Minn. 264, 152 N. W. 537; Wilcox v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 76 Mo. App. 573; Crohn v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, etc. 170 Mo. App. 273, 156 S. W. 472; May v. New York Safety Reserve Fund Soc. 14 Daly (N. Y.) 389; Roblee v. Masonic L. Assoc. 38 Misc. 481, 77 N. Y. S. 1098; Home Forum Ben. Order v. Jones, 5 Okla. 598, 50 Pac. 165; McLendon v. Woodmen of World, 106 Tenn. 695, 64 S. W. 36, 52 L.R.A. 444; Modern Woodmen of America v. Owens (Tex.) 130 S. W. 858. In Kohen v. Mutual Reserve Fund Assoc. supra, it appeared that the application provided that under "no circumstances shall the certificate hereby applied for be in force until the actual payment to, and the acceptance of, the first annual dues by the association, and actual delivery of the certificate to the applicant, with a receipt for the payment of the first annual dues, signed by the president, secretary, or treasurer of the association, during the lifetime of the applicant." An application was made for membership and insurance. The application was filled out, the examination was had before the local physician, and the initiation fee, the annual dues, and the physician's fees were paid and receipted for. These papers were forwarded to the head office, but before the certificate was issued the applicant was shot. It was held that there was no liability. As to the time when the contract should take effect, the court said: "While it may be conceded that a contract was entered into between these parties, it was a contract to become operative upon the happening of a certain condition; and it is competent, of course, for parties to stipulate as to when their contract shall become operative. Suppose, for instance, that in this application it had been proposed by the applicant that the policy should become in force on the 20th of November. Such a policy, though issued by the company on the 10th, would not become operative until the time which the parties themselves had named; or if in the application had been a proposition that the policy should become operative ten days after its receipt at the home office in New York, then, although it were received on the 10th, and accepted on the 10th, the policy would not become operative as a contract of insurance until ten days thereafter. We all know that there have been cases in which, there being no stipulation of this kind in the application, there has been a question as to whether the insurance company had accepted the proposition, and uncertainty in the proof as to whether it had passed the final board of determination so as to constitute an acceptance, and therefore binding on the company. Doubtless, with that fact in view, this stipulation was incorporated into this application, so that there might be no question as to whether this officer or that officer had passed upon the application, and that the contract should not become operative until the certificate of insurance had actually reached the applicant." In Court of Honor v. Hering, 178 Mich. 377, 144 N. W. 843, it appeared that the by-laws of the association provided as follows: "No certificate of benefit membership shall be in force until the applicant shall have been initiated . . . and until he shall have signed and accepted said certificate. . . . And before the recorder shall deliver a benefit certificate the initiate must, in person, while in good health, sign the certificate in his presence." The applicant was initiated, but his certificate was delayed. Before it arrived the applicant was in a sanitarium and did not recover from his sickness. It was held that there was no liability on the certificate. In Wilcox v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 76 Mo. App. 573, the constitution of the defendant association provided that the liability of the order for the payment of benefits on the death of a member should not begin until his application had been accepted by the head physician, his dues and fees had been paid, he had been initiated, and his certificate had been issued and delivered to him. Those requirements were expressly made conditions precedent to the liability. The applicant was a charter member. His certificate was mailed to the local lodge and was held for several weeks. On the day appointed for it to be countersigned by the local officers he applied to the officer who told him that one of the officers had not yet signed. The applicant agreed to come back later for the certificate. He told the officer that he was then ready to pay for the certificate. Before the applicant returned, he was drowned. It was held that there was no liability on the certificate. The court said: "Whether or not the payment of the assessment and dues and the delivery of the policy were conditions precedent, the performances of all which were necessary to entitle the beneficiaries to share in the beneficiary fund, or whether or not these conditions were but mere requirements, the noncompliance with or nonperformance of which were an absolute bar to any claim on the beneficiary fund, the result in this case is the same, namely: that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover and therefore the judgment cannot be sustained; and especially so since the said requirements and the noncompliance therewith were specially pleaded in the answer. We think an examination of the authorities just adverted to will show that where a beneficial certificate embodies the conditions set forth in section 69 of the constitution and by-laws of the defendant, or where such conditions though contained in the constitution and by-laws are not set forth in the certificate, but are by the terms of such certificate made part thereof, the same though intrusted to the subordinate lodge or camp for delivery to the member applying therefor does not become operative as the contract of the parties if such conditions are not complied with. Until the performance of stipulated conditions like those enumerated in section 69, the certificate though in the custody of the clerk of the local camp does not become operative."

In Crohn v. Order of United Commercial Travelers, etc. 170 Mo. App. 273, 156 S. W. 472, the evidence showed that a by-law provided as follows: "The applications of all candidates shall be forwarded to the supreme secretary within ten days after each candidate has been initiated . . . and the secretary of the supreme council shall issue a certificate of membership and forward the same to the subordinate council to which said applicant may be attached, with instructions for its delivery to said member, unless the forwarding of such certificate be ordered withheld by the supreme executive committee." An applicant joined a lodge in Kansas, but the certificate was forwarded to him at his home in Missouri. It was held that according to the by-law the contract was not completed until the delivery in Missouri, and that it was therefore a Missouri contract. The applicant committed suicide. Under the Missouri law, this would not excuse payment of the policy, but in Kansas the opposite rule prevailed. Holding that the association was liable, the court said: "Turning to the laws of the society which were made a part of the proposal of the applicant we find they expressly provide that the contract of insurance should not become binding until the delivery of the certificate to the applicant. What other reasonable construction could be given the stipulation that 'the right of indemnity . . . is conditional on the issuance to him of a certificate of membership by the supreme executive committee?' The term 'issuance to him' must be given its usual significance to persons of ordinary intelligence and that significance was to send forth the certificate and put it in the hand of Crohn. [Perkins County v. Graff, 114 Fed. 1, c. 444 (52 C. C. A. 243); Brownell v. Greenwich (114 N. Y. 518) 4 L.R.A. 1, c. 691.] Was the certificate issued to Crohn as long as it remained in the possession of defendant subject to be recalled by the executive committee? We answer the question in the negative. Let us suppose that after the local secretary had mailed the certificate to Crohn he had received a telegram from the committee cancelling and recalling it; would not this act, if communicated to Crohn before he received the letter, have had the effect of preventing the creation of a contract of insurance, in view of the provisions that, in effect, made the manual delivery of the certificate a condition precedent to a contract of indemnity? We hold that it would."

In May v. New York Safety Reserve Fund Soc. 14 Daly (N. Y.) 389, it appeared that the company's agent made false representations, causing the plaintiff to join the defendant. The plaintiff thought that he was joining when he paid his advance fee. The receipt given for the fee contained a provision that if "the applicant" did not receive his certificate of membership within fifteen days he should notify the home office. It was held that the plaintiff could not be a member and an applicant for membership at the same time, and that the plaintiff did not become a member until he received his certificate of membership. In McLendon v. Woodmen of World, 106 Tenn. 695, 64 S. W. 36, 52 L.R.A. 444, it appeared that in an application it was agreed that the liability for the payment of benefits should not begin until after the application [for membership and participation in the benefit fund] should be accepted by the sovereign physician, a beneficiary certificate should be issued and personally delivered to the applicant, and until he should pay all fees, and should be duly initiated. The applicant was initiated, but the certificate was not delivered to him. Before it could be delivered, he died. It was held that the delivery was essential to membership. The court said: "We are of opinion that under the provisions of the application and certificate, as well as the constitution and by-laws of the order, plaintiff cannot recover under the facts in this record. The application signed by Mr. McLendon provides on its face that it, as well as the constitution and by-laws of the order, shall form the basis of the contract, and they enter into it and become a part of it as freely as if copied into it in so many words. . . . Under the terms of the application, certificate, constitution and by-laws the beneficiary certificate was not in force until, among other things, the certificate was delivered to the applicant. . . . And if the certificate, application, or constitution and rules so provide, he must at the time be in good health. . . . And if the applicant dies before delivery the certificate does not become binding by delivery to the beneficiary . . . and the unauthorized action of the local camp would not bind the order. . . . It is said there was unreasonable delay in returning the certificate, and it, having been actually signed and issued from the sovereign camp December 31, should be held to take effect at a prior date. It is only necessary to state that there does not appear to have been any delay arising out of bad faith on the part of the company. Neither the application nor the constitution and rules of the order prescribe any limit within which the certificate shall be returned and contract completed. Before the certificate was signed the applicant had become sick. Before it was ready for delivery he was dead. There does not appear to have been any unnecessary or unreasonable delay, but only such as was required to perfect the application and examination. Beneficial societies may decide for themselves whom and when they will admit as members. Until an applicant is accepted under the constitution, by-laws, rules, and stipulations of the contract he does not become a beneficiary member, nor entitled to insurance. Mere delay in passing upon his application will give him no rights, and afford no presumption of its acceptance." In Modern Woodmen of America v. Owens (Tex.) 130 S. W. 858, the evidence showed that the by-laws and the application declared that the certificate should not take effect until it was delivered to the applicant while in good health. The applicant was ill when the certificate was returned to the local lodge, and the clerk refused delivery. He delivered it to the widow, however, after the applicant's death. It was held that delivery to the applicant was a condition precedent to validity.

If the applicant is dead at the time the supreme officers take favorable action on his application, this action does not waive the necessity for the certificate. Thus, in Patterson v. Supreme Commandery United Order, etc. 104 Me. 355, 71 Atl. 1016, it appeared that the laws of the association prescribed the following steps in order to obtain membership: The application was balloted on. If "elected to receive the degree," the applicant was subjected to a medical examination by the examiner of the local lodge. If this examination was satisfactory, he was initiated with the ritualistic ceremony, after paying his dues. The application and the report of the medical examination were then forwarded to the supreme medical examiner. If he approved, the application was returned to the local lodge who then sent it to the supreme secretary, and the fees were sent to the supreme treasurer. It was further provided that no right of membership in the order should accrue by initiation nor should a certificate be issued until the application should be approved by the supreme medical examiner and sent to the supreme secretary. The plaintiff's son was initiated, and his medical examination was forwarded to the supreme medical examiner. This was approved but before the approval the applicant was killed. He was never reported to the supreme secretary as having been initiated. He was held not to be a member. The reasons for the decision were given as follows: "The defendant, if liable at all must be liable as upon a contract—a contract of insurance. The terms and conditions of the contracts of this defendant with its members are to be found, in part at least, in its constitution and laws. It had a right to impose terms and conditions upon those who sought membership. All applications must be held to have been made subject to those terms and conditions. In this case one of those terms and conditions was that the approval of the application by the supreme medical director should be a condition precedent to beneficial membership, and that until such approval neither the applicant nor his beneficiary should have any claim on the benefit fund. This was the sine qua non. The election was not sufficient, nor was a satisfactory medical examination by the local examiner. The initiation was not enough. It was a step, but it was only a step. It gave the applicant a certain status, as, if his medical examination was finally disapproved, the laws of the order gave him the option of remaining as a social member. Approval of the application by the supreme medical director was made essential. It was probably a wise requirement, but whether it was or not, it was one which the defendant had a right to make. Patterson died before this application was so approved. The intended contract was not completed in his lifetime. At the time he died the defendant was under no liability to his beneficiary." Similarly, in Erickson v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, etc. 129 Minn. 264, 152 N. W. 537, the applicant died before the supreme examiner had approved the application. The death was unknown at the time of the approval. In that association an applicant could not become a beneficiary member until his application had been approved by the supreme examiner. It was held that the death prior to the approval precluded membership. The court said: "Both the laws of the order and Erickson's application provided that no contract for insurance should exist until the chief medical officer approved Erickson's medical examination. This examination did not reach the grand officers until five days after Erickson's death. In ignorance of such death, it was, in form, approved and the usual certificate sent to the secretary of the local lodge. There is no provision that the insurance shall take effect as of the date of the application, but on the contrary there is an express provision that the applicant shall remain a nonbeneficiary member until the approval of his medical examination. Erickson's application was in substance a proposal to become a beneficiary member, which did not ripen into a contract until accepted by the society. His death before such acceptance operated to withdraw and annul the proposal; and its acceptance, in form, thereafter, was a mere nullity, for no contract had been entered into at the time of his death, and no contract can be entered into with a dead man. Both the subject-matter of the proposed contract, namely, the life of Erickson, and one of the proposed parties thereto had ceased to exist before action was taken upon the proposition by the other proposed party, and therefore the contract was never consummated." In Roblee v. Masonic L. Assoc. 38 Misc. 481, 77 N. Y. S. 1098, the evidence showed that the application contained the following provision: "It is also understood that my membership shall not be in force until a certificate has been delivered to me during my life, and in good health." The application was accepted, but the applicant died before the certificate was mailed. It was held that he did not become a member. The court said: "It is well established in this state that a general agent of an insurance company may waive stipulations and provisions contained in a policy with respect to conditions upon which it shall have inception and go into operation by delivering the policy with knowledge of all the facts and receiving the premium. Walsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 5; Forward v. Continental Ins. Co. 142 N. Y. 382, 37 N. E. 615, 25 L.R.A. 637; Wood v. American F. Ins. Co. 149 N. Y. 382, 44 N. E. 80, 52 Am. St. Rep. 733; Gray v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 155 N. Y. 180, 49 N. E. 675; Ames v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 40 App. Div. 465, 58 N. Y. S. 244. I see no reason why this rule should not have application to certificates of membership in benefit associations such as the defendant. The certificate issued by the defendant was in effect a policy of insurance upon the life of plaintiff's husband, and, if a delivery of the same to him had been effected at any time prior to his death, the question as to whether the defendant did or did not intend to waive its rights by making such delivery might very well be a question for the jury to pass upon. But in this case there was no delivery of the certificate to the husband of the plaintiff, or to any one for him during his life. There can be no delivery, either actual or constructive, to a person who is dead. Hence plaintiff's husband never became a member of the defendant association for the reason that the preliminary negotiations to that end were based upon the condition that his membership should not be in force until a certificate had been delivered to him during his life, and, as we have seen, he died before the defendant had performed any act tantamount to such delivery. In order to constitute a waiver of the condition contained in the application of plaintiff's husband, upon which he was to become a member of defendant's association, there must have occurred something, as between him and the defendant, by which such condition was waived and he constituted a member without any delivery of the certificate. But there is no fact or circumstance from which any such result may be inferred." In Home Forum Ben. Order v. Jones, 5 Okla. 598, 50 Pac. 165, it appeared that a by-law provided as follows: "Persons shall not become beneficiary members of this order until their examinations have been approved by the chief medical examiner, and they have paid one mortuary assessment, and received a certificate of membership." An applicant for membership was elected. He was examined by a local medical examiner and passed. He was initiated and paid his assessment. His application was not forwarded to the home office until after his death, nor was it passed on by the supreme medical examiner, who had the power to reject the application. On receipt of the application, the head office refused to issue the certificate of membership, because the applicant was already dead. It was held that the contract of membership was not complete at the time of the death.

Under some circumstances, however, the delivery of a certificate of membership is not a condition precedent to membership. Supreme Council, etc. v. Bailey (Ky.) 55 S. W. 888; Lorscher v. Supreme Lodge, etc. 72 Mich. 316, 40 N. W. 545, 2 L.R.A. 206; Perine v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 48 Minn. 82, 50 N. W. 1022; Baldwin v. Golden Star Fraternity, 47 N. J. L. 111; Lathrop v. Modern Woodmen of America, 63 Ore. 193, 126 Pac. 1002; Pledger v. Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 18, 42 S. W. 653. In Supreme Council, etc. v. Bailey, supra, it appeared that the members of the appellant were divided into an insured class and a social class. The appellee's husband applied for membership in the first class. He was initiated into the order and paid his assessments. He was subjected to a medical examination which was not required of the social candidates. Subsequent discovery of his physical infirmity caused the head office to order the local office not to accept any more assessments from him. The certificate of membership to the relief fund class was never delivered to him. It was held that he became a member of the insured class. In Lorscher v. Supreme Lodge, etc. supra, the evidence showed that in order to become a member of the defendant, the following steps were necessary: A candidate applied for membership. If he was found to be desirable, he submitted to a medical examination by the local examiner who made a certificate and forwarded it to the state medical examiner. If the latter officer approved, the candidate was initiated after paying the required dues. After initiation, the local lodge forwarded the application for beneficiary membership to the head office together with a fee for the certificate. The certificate was then sent to the local lodge where it was registered. That certificate completed the contract between the corporation and the members of the local lodges. An applicant complied with the requirements, but the local lodge did not deliver the certificate to him. It was held that the local officer held the certificate for him, and that the beneficiary could collect. In Perine v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 48 Minn. 82, 50 N. W. 1022, it appeared that an applicant joined the defendant's local lodge, and paid his dues and assessments. About a month later the local lodge was reorganized because of irregularities in the first organization. The applicant in question was not present at the reorganization, and no certificate was issued to him. He was recognized as a member and his dues were accepted. It was held that the defendant was estopped to deny his membership. In Lathrop v. Modern Woodmen of America, 63 Ore. 193, 126 Pac. 1002, it appeared that the applicant applied for beneficial membership. He was accepted and initiated and paid his fees. His policy was sent from the head office to an official of the local lodge. There was a provision that the local official was not the agent of the general order, and a provision that the policy was to be delivered to the applicant personally and while he was in good health. It was held that the local officer was the applicant's trustee, and that the applicant's membership was complete from the time that the officer received the certificate. The court said: "The clerk of the local camp is expressly declared by the by-laws not to be the agent of the head camp. He is a mere custodian of the policy for the purpose of exacting any dues or assessments that may be payable, and, if none are payable and the applicant is in good health, he is a mere, naked trustee for the applicant. We take it that from the date of its reception the applicant, whose current dues had been paid, was a full-fledged beneficial member, subject to all the liabilities and entitled to all the benefits of any other member, and that he would have been liable to the discipline of the camp, and perhaps to a civil action for the November dues had he failed to pay them before December 1st. The provision for delivering to him in person was intended (1) to secure the payment of current dues (which in this instance had been paid); and (2) to prevent the policy going astray by being placed in the custody of an improper person. The latter was for the protection of him and his beneficiary." In Pledger v. Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 18, 42 S. W. 653, it appeared that the constitution and by-laws provided that the liability of the head camp for the payment of benefits on the death of a member should not begin until after his application had been accepted by the head physician, his certificate issued, and he should have paid all dues and assessments, have been initiated, and the certificate had been delivered to him. The applicant was approved, paid all fees, and was initiated. His certificate was issued and was wrongfully withheld by the local clerk. The applicant died before the delivery. It was held that the delivery was not a condition precedent to recovery. The court said: "We do not think that the actual delivery of the certificate was made a condition precedent by the constitution and laws of the order, and we are borne out in this construction of section 69 by the language of section 70, in which it is stated that the noncompliance with or the nonperformance of any requirement in the preceding section on the part of the applicant should be an absolute bar to any claim on the beneficiary fund of the order. If it had been intended that the actual delivery of the certificate to the member was necessary, it could have been so stated. When the money was tendered, there remained nothing to be done on the part of Pledger, and it was the duty of the clerk to deliver the certificate. Equity will treat that as done which ought to have been done. Since there is no controversy about the facts, and as the facts authorize a recovery by the appellant, the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and judgment will be here rendered in favor of the appellant for the amount provided for by the certificate." The case last cited was distinguished by the Missouri court in Wilcox v. Sovereign Camp, etc. 76 Mo. App. 573, wherein the court said: "In Pledger's case, already referred to, there was an offer to pay the advance assessment and dues accompanied with a demand for a delivery of the certificate which being rejected there was a formal tender made and rejected. But here there was no tender at all, but only a willingness and ability expressed to pay the advance assessment and dues. At the time of the expression of such willingness and ability the certificate had not then been signed by the local officers of the camp whose duty it was to sign it. In the Pledger case the certificate had been signed by every officer required to do so by the constitution and by-laws, while here as has already been shown it was not so signed at the time the delivery was requested of the clerk. The Pledger case though much relied on by the plaintiffs, for the above reasons, lends very little support to their contention. If the certificate had been signed by the proper officers of the local camp and a payment, or even a tender, of the advance assessment and dues had been made, accompanied with a demand for the delivery of the certificate, a different case would have been presented and one that would have probably been entitled to a more favorable consideration at our hands."

In Somers v. Kansas Protective Union, 42 Kan. 619, 22 Pac. 702, it appeared that the application contained in small type the following provision: "Signature of the applicant. The applicant must personally sign, or the certificate, if issued, shall be invalid." Section 2 of the by-laws provided as follows: "Before a certificate of membership shall be issued, an application therefor, made upon a blank furnished by the union, must be . . . signed by the applicant by himself or herself." A husband applied for his wife's membership at her request. He signed the application for her, and she ratified it. The agent of the company knew of the circumstances, and he assured the husband that it was all right. The husband did not see the provision requiring the personal signature. The certificate was held to be binding.

It has been held that written acceptance of the certificate was unnecessary. Sovereign Camp, etc. v. Brown (Tex.) 88 S. W. 372.

Payment of Fee.

In some instances the payment of a fee is made a condition precedent to liability. National Aid Assoc. v. Bratcher, 65 Neb. 378, 91 N. W. 379, 93 N. W. 1122; Modern Woodman Acc. Assoc. v. Kline, 50 Neb. 345, 69 N. W. 943. In National Aid Assoc. v. Bratcher, supra, it appeared that an organizer told the plaintiff that he could give him and his wife a joint certificate of membership which would be good on the initiation of the husband, and that the wife could come in later. Apparently the organizer had unlimited power under such circumstances. In the application it was agreed that "under no circumstances shall the certificate hereby applied for be in force until . . . one assessment has been paid." The organizer was not empowered to receive dues. He owed the plaintiff money for horse hire and he agreed to pay it as the assessment. He did not pay until after the death of the wife. It was held that the payment to the local secretary was a condition precedent to membership, and, as the organizer did not make the payment until after the death, the wife was not a member. The reasons for the decision were given as follows: "In the case at bar, it was agreed that the applicants should not become members of the order, and the certificate in question should not be in force, until they were initiated into a local lodge and one as-essment had been paid. Bratcher was initiated into the local lodge, but his wife was not. If this were the only question involved in this action, we would feel constrained to hold that, under the circumstances, the fact that Mrs. Bratcher was not obligated in, and did not receive the mysterious secrets of the local lodge, would not require a reversal of the judgment of the lower court. Stover represented to Bratcher that if he was initiated at the time the lodge was instituted, his wife could come in later, and that the certificate, so far as that matter was concerned, would be good. Stover was the organizer for the association, and his authority was apparently unlimited so far as this requirement was concerned, and Bratcher had a right to rely on this statement. Again, in cases like this one, where the joint certificate is applied for at the formation of a new lodge, we do not construe the by-laws as requiring both of the joint beneficiaries to be initiated at the same time. If the assessments and registry fees had been paid to the local secretary, and the certificate had been signed and delivered by him, before the death of Mrs. Bratcher, the contract would have been complete, and the fact that she died without having been initiated would not have prevented a recovery herein. . . . But it will be observed that it was expressly agreed that the applicants should not become members and entitled to their certificate until the lodge was regularly organized by a duly appointed organizer, officers elected and qualified, and the certificate signed and delivered by the local secretary, and their first assessments and registry fees were paid to the local secretary. It was necessary that these conditions precedent should be complied with during the lifetime of the applicant, before there was any binding contract of insurance. The lodge was regularly organized by a duly appointed organizer, and the officers thereof were duly elected and qualified; but the advance or first assessments and registry fees of the applicants were not paid or even tendered to the local secretary until two days after the death of Mrs. Bratcher. . . . It is thus established beyond question that the date of payment was too late to authorize the local secretary to sign and deliver the certificate, and thus put the same in force and make Mrs. Bratcher a member of the association. She certainly never was a member of the order. Therefore the certificate never had any binding force." In Modern Woodman Acc. Assoc. v. Kline, 50 Neb. 345, 69 N. W. 943, the evidence showed that the certificate of membership contained the following provision: "In consideration of . . . the agreement on the part of the certificate holder to accept the conditions contained in his application and this certificate, as the basis of this contract, and in consideration of three dollars ($3) paid by . . . [the plaintiff], the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, does hereby constitute the said applicant a certificate holder of said association, . . . provided that this certificate shall not take effect until all assessments as aforesaid, and payable prior to the accident for which indemnity or benefit is claimed, are received by the association previous to such accident." The certificate was received by the insured on November 18, and was dated November 17. The plaintiff was injured on November 19. On November 30 he paid to the local official the amount owed for the issuance of the certificate. This sum amounted to the required sum from November 30. It was held that the certificate did not become in force until the payment.

But in Baldwin v. Golden Star Fraternity, 47 N. J. L. 111, it was held that the payment of the assessment was not a condition precedent to membership under a provision that each member, on becoming a member of the beneficiary fund, should pay to the financial secretary (of the subordinate council) the amount of one assessment.

Miscellaneous.

Where the charter of the association prescribes certain qualifications, such as age, or the like, for the members of the society, applicants must conform to those qualifications before they can become members. Sowersby v. Royal League, 159 Ill. App. 626; Alexander v. Chicago Bankers' Union, 187 Ill. App. 469. And the same rule has been laid down where the limitation was contained only in the association's constitution or by-laws. McCoy v. Roman Catholic Mut. Ins. Co. 152 Mass. 272, 25 N. E. 289. See also Pirrung v. Supreme Council, etc. 93 N. Y. S. 575. Compare Plattdeutsche Grot Gilde, etc. v. Ross, 117 Ill. App. 247.

Where a favorable medical examination is made a condition of beneficial membership, the examination has been held to be a condition precedent. Thus, in Asselto v. Supreme Tent of Knights, etc. 192 Pa. St. 5, 43 Atl. 400, it appeared that the defendant had two kinds of members, social and beneficial. An applicant joined as a social member of whom no medical examination was required. He applied for beneficial membership, and paid one assessment on condition that the money should be returned to him if he was not elected. To be a beneficial member, every applicant must submit to a medical examination. The applicant was never examined. He was held not to be a beneficial member. But in Burlington Voluntary Relief Dept. v. White, 41 Neb. 547, 59 N. W. 747, 43 Am. St. Rep. 701, it was held that the association could be estopped to demand the medical examination. In that case it appeared that the association required that there should be a written application for membership which should state the time at which the membership was desired to begin. A medical examination and the payment of a fee were required. A person applied for membership, and notices of his membership were sent to several officials. The amount of dues was deducted from his wages. He was taken sick before he could make the medical examination. On the day before his death, it was sought to declare that he was not a member. It was held that the association was estopped to deny the membership.

Where an association is disbanded, and subsequently a reorganization is attempted, the members of the old organization do not become members of the new association before its organization is completed even though they may pay dues to the new society. Sloan v. Loyal Fraternal Home Assoc. 139 Mo. App. 443, 123 S. W. 57. In that case, the court said: "Plaintiffs depend upon acts or promise of defendant as a corporation before there was a corporation. Those acts, as shown above, were principally in receiving payment of dues from Michael T. Sloan on September 6th and 26th, at which dates defendant had not come into existence, and it was without power or authority to accept the deceased beneficiary of the other company; or, as claimed by plaintiffs in the second count, to assume the payment of the certificate issued by the other company. . . . Under the law and rules of these statutory beneficiary associations, the benefit certificates are issued only to members of the association under certain prescribed conditions for initiation. [Hiatt v. Fraternal Home, 99 Mo. App. 105.] We do not find where the deceased ever became a member of the defendant body whereby he might have a right to claim its protection."

SHERMAN

HAVENS ET AL.

94 Kan. 654; 146 Pac. 1030.

Trusts — Spendthrift Trust — Creation.

The doctrine of "spendthrift trusts" approved by the majority of the American courts by which it is settled that it is lawful for a testator or grantor to create a trust estate for the life of the cestui que trust, with the provision that the latter shall receive and enjoy the income at times and in amounts either fixed by the instrument or left to the discretion of the trustee, and that such income shall not be subject to alienation by the beneficiary, nor liable for his debts, accords with the general policy which this state has always followed respecting the right of creditors and debtors. It deprives the creditor of no security to which he has the right to look, and it recognizes the right which the owner of property has to dispose of it, either by an absolute gift or by a conditional one, and to make provision for the object of his bounty, provided he gives the use only without the absolute title, and therefore the testator's intention in this respect, when clearly expressed, will be carried out.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A will contained the following clause: "To my brother, Arthur B. Havens, should he survive me, an annuity of one thousand dollars, and I direct my said executor trustees to pay him two hundred and fifty dollars quarterly in advance from my death until his; but should he predecease me, and in any event after his death, such annuity fund to be added to the trust estate hereinafter created for my said daughter Elizabeth and her issue."

Held, that proper construction of the will does not disclose an intention on the part of the testator to secure to his brother the life enjoyment of the income of the trust estate exempt from his brother's creditors.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Without deciding that a letter written by the testator three years after the execution of the will was admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the circumstances under which the will was executed, it is held that nothing contained in either the will or the letter shows that it was the testator's intention to protect the income from waste or dissipation, or to prevent the legacy from being subject to payment of the brother's debts.

Garnishment — Funds Subject — Funds in Hands of Executor or Administrator.

Section 228 of the code authorizing creditors to proceed by garnishment against "any person" who shall be indebted to, or have any property, real or personal, in his possession or under his control belonging to, the debtor, is sufficiently broad in its terms to authorize an action in garnishment against an executor or administrator after an order of final distribution.

[See 2 Ann. Cas. 921.]

Same.

It being one of the agreed facts in the present case that the estate of the testator is solvent and able to respond to the quarterly payments due to the beneficiary, and that they have made such payments to him in advance and recognized the provision, no order of distribution was necessary in order to authorize them to make the payments, and such quarterly payments are subject to attachment before final settlement.

Attorneys — Allowance of Fee.

Under section 247 of the code, the allowance by the court of $25 attorney's fee for the plaintiff was proper.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Leavenworth county: WENDORFF, Judge.

Action by Nellie A. Sherman, plaintiff, against Ernest F. Havens et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Certain defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

L. O. Carter and Arthur M. Jackson for appellants.

Benjamin F. Endres for appellee.

[655] PORTER, J.—The plaintiff is a judgment creditor of the defendant, Arthur B. Havens. The executors of the will of Paul E. Havens, brother of the defendant, are garnishees in a proceeding to reach, and apply in payment of plaintiff's judgment, the income of a trust estate bequeathed by the will to the defendant.

[656] Two questions are involved: First, does the will properly construed disclose an intention on the part of the testator to create a "spendthrift trust" in favor of his brother; in other words, to secure to his brother the life enjoyment of the income of the trust estate exempt from the creditors of his brother? Second, if a proper construction of the will discloses such intention, can it be made effectual?

It seems more appropriate to consider the second of these questions first, because, in determining what is essential to the creation of a spendthrift trust, it becomes necessary to refer to the history of the law in relation to such estates.

Paul E. Havens, the testator, was a brother of the defendant and died on the 6th day of May, 1913, leaving a last will dated February 18, 1908, which has been duly probated. The following is the clause of the will upon which the defendant and the garnishees base their contention that it was the testator's intention to create a spendthrift trust:

"To my brother, Arthur B. Havens, should he survive me, an annuity of one thousand dollars, and I direct my said executor-trustees to pay him Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars quarterly in advance from my death until his; but should he pre-decease me, and in any event after his death, such annuity fund to be added to the trust estate herein-after created for my said daughter Elizabeth and her issue."

Since the decision in Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. (Eng.) 429, 433, the English courts have uniformly followed the rule of the common law, that a donor creating a life estate cannot take away its incidents, among which are the powers of voluntary and involuntary alienation. In England, however, as well as in those states where the English rule has been adopted, it is held that if the gift or devise contains a condition of cessor upon the bankruptcy or insolvency of the beneficiary, or upon an attempted alienation, the restraint is valid. (Brandon [657] v. Robinson, supra; McKinster v. Smith, 27 Conn. 628; Tillinghast v. Bradford, 5 K. I. 205; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 138.)

The grounds upon which the English decisions rest are two: First, that the right of alienation is a necessary incident to an equitable estate for life; and second, that it is contrary to public policy that one should have the right to enjoy the income of property to the exclusion of his creditors.

In Sparhawk v. Cloon, 125 Mass. 263, the opinion contains an exhaustive discussion of the subject, and it is there stated that from the time of Lord Eldon, the rule has been in the English court of chancery that when the income of a trust estate is given to any person (other than a married woman) for life, the equitable estate for life is alienable by and liable in equity to the debts of the cestui que trust. (p. 266.)

The English rule has been rejected by most of the state courts in this country and by the supreme court of the United States. (Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 257; Shankland's Appeal, 47 Pa. St. 113; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 504; Lampert v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 439, 446, 9 S. W. 780, 9 Am. St. Rep. 358, 2 L.R.A. 113; Smith v. Towers, 69 Md. 77, 14 Atl. 497, 15 Atl. 92, 9 Am. St. Rep. 398.)

The rule adopted by the majority of the American courts is that "it is lawful for a testator or grantor to create a trust estate for the life of the cestui que trust, with the provision that the latter shall receive and enjoy the avails at times and in amounts either fixed by the instrument or left to the discretion of the trustee, and that such avails shall not be subject to alienation by the beneficiary nor liable for his debts. (26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 139.)

The argument upon which the American authorities are based is that a creditor of the donee has no right to look to the property of another man for the payment of his debts.

[658] "As to past debts, such creditors are no worse off after their debtor becomes the donee of a spendthrift trust than they were before, and as to future debts it is their own folly if they choose to rely upon a fund which by the very terms of its donation it is impossible for them to reach, of which fact they are advised actually or constructively by the registry laws of the United States. Moreover, it is not deemed against public policy for a testator to provide a support for a spendthrift child, since it is the interest of the public that such child shall not become a public burden. The rights of creditors are not deemed any more sacred than the right of property involved in the execution of the trust; or the right which a testator has that the will he made should be carried out, and not one that the court makes for him." (26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 141.)

See also Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 257; Steib v. Whitehead, 111 Ill. 247; Partridge v. Cavender, 96 Mo. 452, 9 S. W. 785; Moore's Estate, 198 Pa. St. 611, 612, 48 Atl. 884.

In Nichols v. Eaton, supra, Mr. Justice Miller said:

"Nor do we see any reason, in the recognized nature and tenure of property and its transfer by will, why a testator who gives, who gives without any pecuniary return, who gets nothing of property value from the donee, may not attach to that gift the incident of continued use, of uninterrupted benefit of the gift during the life of the donee. Why a parent, or one who loves another, and wishes to use his own property in securing the object of his affection, as far as property can do it, from the ills of life, the vicissitudes of fortune, and even his own improvidence, or incapacity for self-protection, should not be permitted to do so, is not readily perceived." (p. 727.)

It cannot be doubted that by the great weight of authority in this country it is settled that the founder of such a trust may secure the enjoyment of it to the objects of his bounty by providing that it shall not be alienable by them or become subject to be taken by their creditors, and that the testator's intention in this [659] respect when clearly expressed by him will be carried out. (Rife v. Geyer, 59 Pa. St. 303, 98 Am. Dec. 351; Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 504; Sparhawk v. Cloon, 125 Mass. 263; Lampert v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 439, 9 S. W. 780, 9 Am. St. Rep. 358; 2 L.R.A. 113; Smith v. Towers, 69 Md. 77, 14 Atl. 497, 15 Atl. 92, 9 Am. St. Rep. 398; Nichols v. Eaton, supra; Roberts v. Stevens, 84 Me. 325, 24 Atl. 873, 17 L.R.A. 266; Jourlmon v. Massengill, 86 Tenn. 81, 5 S. W. 719; Garland v. Garland, 87 Va. 758, 13 S. E. 478, 24 Am. St. Rep. 682, 13 L.R.A. 212; Wales v. Bowdish, 61 Vt. 23, 27, 17 Atl. 1000, 4 L.R.A. 819; Seymour v. McAvoy, 121 Cal. 438, 53 Pac. 946, 41 L.R.A. 544.)

The supreme court of Iowa has approved the American rule, with the qualification that creditors cannot deprive the beneficiary of the support provided for him out of such property "so long as it is in accordance with his station in life." (Merchants Nat. Bank v. Crist, 140 Ia. 308, 313, 118 N. W. 394, 132 Am. St. Rep. 267, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 526.)

The question is a new one in this state. There is no statute or decision upon the subject, but we see no reason why the rule adopted by the majority of the courts of this country should not apply here. As was said by the Massachusetts court in Broadway Nat. Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 504:

"We are not able to see that it would violate any principles of sound public policy to permit a testator to give to the object of his bounty such a qualified interest in the income of a trust fund, and thus provide against the improvidence or misfortune of the beneficiary." (p. 173.)

It accords not only with the weight of authority in this country and with sound reasoning, but also with the general policy which the state has always maintained respecting the rights of creditors and debtors as shown in the liberal provisions of our exemption laws. It deprives the creditor of no security to which he had the right to look, and it recognizes the right [660] which the owner of property has to dispose of it, either by an absolute gift or by a conditional one, and to provide for the object of his bounty, provided he gives the use only without the absolute title.

The first question is perhaps the more difficult one. Does the will properly construed disclose an intention on the part of the testator to secure to his brother the life enjoyment of the income of the trust estate exempt from the creditors of his brother? In Bennett v. Bennett, 66 Ill. App. 28, it was said of a spendthrift trust that the "provisions against alienation of the trust fund by the voluntary act of the beneficiary, or in invitum by his creditors, are the usual incidents of such trusts." (p. 37; see also 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 138.)

There is some conflict in the authorities as to what is essential to the creation of a spendthrift trust. It seems to be clearly established, however, that the intent need not be stated in express terms. (Baker v. Brown, 146 Mass. 369, 15 N. E. 783.) In that case the will gave to the daughters of the testator a devise or legacy on condition that they support their father, and it was held that he had no estate under the will which a creditor could reach.

In Wagner v. Wagner, 244 Ill. 101, 18 Ann. Cas. 490, 91 N. E. 66, it was held that it is not necessary to the creation of a spendthrift trust that the cestui que trust shall be denominated as spendthrift, or that the testator shall give his reasons for creating a trust, or that the will shall contain all the restrictions and qualifications incident to such trust, but if it appears from the whole will that the testator intended to create a spendthrift trust, that is sufficient.

In Roberts v. Stevens, 84 Me. 325, 24 Atl. 873, 17 L.R.A. 266, the question was whether such a trust was created in favor of the testator's son. The language of the will did not declare in so many words that the son's interest in the trust estate should be beyond the reach of his [661] creditors, but it was held that such express words were not essential to the creation of such a trust, and that the intention should be gathered from the whole instrument construed in the light of circumstances, and the intention to create a spendthrift trust was inferred in that case from the nature of the provisions annexed to the gift.

On the other hand, where a will created a trust for the benefit of a testator's son, directing the trustee to pay over the income at stated intervals to the cestui que trust, or to whomsoever he in writing might designate, it was held not to create a spendthrift trust, because the cestui que trust had the right of control of the income while in the hands of the trustee. (Decker v. Poor Directors, 120 Pa. St. 272, 13 Atl. 925.)

The trial court admitted in evidence a letter written by the testator to his brother, the defendant, under date of March 6, 1911, the material part of which reads as follows:

"You have reached that age when men ought to evade the worry and labor of business, and my thought is that you should pass the remainder of your days in quiet, and far from business cares. I am glad that I am able to assist you in doing so, and I will freely extend such aid as you require to that end, and your requirements will be responded to as you make them known to me.

"I know that you would do the same for me if conditions were reversed, and so there will be no obligation on your part for whatever you receive from me as long as I live, and provisions have been made in my will, in case you survive me."

It is the contention of the defendant that the will should be construed in connection with this letter, and that the letter itself is proof of the intention of the testator to provide support and maintenance for him, and that it establishes an intention to create a spendthrift trust. The letter was written three years after the execution of the will. Conceding, for the purposes [662] of the argument, that the letter is admissible to show the circumstances of the testator and his brother, there is no language in either the will or the letter showing that it was the testator's intention to protect the income from waste or dissipation, or to prevent the legacy from being subject to the payment of the brother's debts. In order for us to declare this to have been the intention of the testator, we must look beyond the language of both instruments. The case differs in only one respect from the case of Girard L. Ins. etc. Co. v. Chambers, 46 Pa. St. 485, 86 Am. Dec. 513. There the direction was to pay over the net income "unto the cestui que trust for his own use and benefit, or to such person as by his order in writing he may authorize to receive the same" (syl. ¶ 1), and upon his decease to convey the estate so held as he by his last will shall appoint. The question in that case was whether the income for life was subject to the claims of creditors. In the opinion it was said:

"In the present case the income for life could have been secured to the son by provisions against alienation and liability for debts, but this has not been done, and we are reluctantly obliged to defeat the intention of the mother to provide a maintenance for her son, by giving the income during the life of the son to the attaching creditor, who can receive from the trustees only what the son would be entitled to." (p. 492.)

In Underhill on the Law of Wills, it is said:

"The trust provision which is designed to secure the income of a fund against the creditors of the beneficiary, or to prevent him from assigning or pledging it, need not, in this country, be an express direction in terms prohibiting anticipation. The testator is never required to state expressly that income or principal is not to be assignable or transferable, or subject to mortgage or pledge by the legatee; and it would seem from many of the cases that he is not compelled to state that it shall not be liable for the debts of the beneficiary, or that it shall be free from the interference and control of his creditors, in order to create a valid spendthrift trust." (Vol. 1, § 529.)

[663] In the same section, however, the author says:

"Any expression clearly evincing an intention on the part of the testator to protect the income from waste and dissipation, and to secure its application to the support and maintenance of the beneficiary, is sufficient."

It was, of course, within the power of the testator, had he seen fit, to provide that the payments to his brother should be exempt from all claims of creditors of the latter, or should be paid into his hands alone, and not upon any order or assignment of his. While the letter may be said to manifest a desire to provide for the support of the brother during the remaining years of his life, it does not manifest an intention that he should not have the full control and ownership of the payments to use as he might see fit. Neither the will nor the letter, nor both taken together, disclose an intention to prohibit Arthur B. Havens from anticipating the income by assignment or transfer to another, and while there are many authorities which hold that no one of these particular things is essential to the creation of a spendthrift trust such a trust can be created only by the express language of the instrument itself, or by necessary implication from such language. The courts have no power to create such a trust or to make a will for the testator.

In Sears v. Choate, 146 Mass. 395, 15 N. E. 786, 4 Am. St. Rep. 320, it was declared that in order to give such a qualified estate "the language of the founder must be clear and unequivocal to that effect. The court held that the will in that case did not create such a trust. It differed from the one in the case at bar in only one respect; it contained no limitation over of the estate in any contingency to any other person. In the opinion it was said:

"There is no discretion given to the trustees, and there is no provision that the income or the estate shall not be alienable by the plaintiff or attachable by his creditors." (p. 397.)

[664] It is true in the present case there is a gift over of the estate to the daughter of the testator, but the trustees are given no discretion as to the amount they shall pay to the defendant, nor is there any provision that the income of the estate shall not be alienable by the brother, nor any provision that it shall not be liable for his debts. It will be found that in most of the instances where the rule has been declared that the intention to create such a trust need not be stated in express terms, there was language showing an intention that the fund, or the income from it, should be enjoyed for the support and maintenance of the beneficiary during his life or for a period of years. (Wagner v. Wagner, 244 Ill. 101, 18 Ann. Cas. 490, 91 N. E. 66; Stambaugh's Estate, 135 Pa. St. 585, 19 Atl. 1058.) The Pennsylvania court held that the intention of the testator to create a spendthrift trust might be ascertained from the will in the light of proof that the cestui que trust became insolvent a few months before the writing of the will, and that this intent should not be set aside because not clearly expressed by the scrivener, at least as between the trustee and the cestui que trust. The rights of creditors of the cestui que trust were not involved.

The case of Pickens v. Dorris, 20 Mo. App. 1, is directly in point. There the court, after approving the rule adopted by the majority of the American courts, as well supported by reason and the weight of authority, held that the testator's intention to withdraw his gift from the creditors of the devisee will not be presumed from surrounding circumstances of which the creditor has not record notice, where such intention is not expressed in or necessarily implied from the terms of the instrument creating the trust. In the opinion it was said:

"In this case, however, we are asked to go further, and are asked to declare that where the surrounding circumstances of a trust, of which circumstance no record notice is brought home to the creditor, are such [665] as lead to the inference that it was the intention of the deviser to withdraw his gift from the claim of the devisee's creditors, we shall give effect to such intention, although not expressed in the instrument itself nor necessarily implied from anything expressed therein. This we must decline to do. The will of George P. Dorris does not expressly exempt the property devised for the benefit of his son, Thomas, from the claims of the latter's creditors. There is nothing in the will itself which would indicate that the trust thus created was in the nature of a spendthrift trust; and to seek in the surrounding circumstances a reason for declaring it to be such, the authorities do not warrant and a sound policy forbids." (p. 5.)

In the case at bar it seems certain from the language of the will that the income was and is assignable by the defendant, to whom it was made payable. There is no provision to the contrary, nor words which intimate an intention of the testator that the income should not be assignable. Of course, if it be assignable, it is because it belongs, when due, to the defendant; and if it belongs to him, it is liable for his debts. To construe the will otherwise would compel us to say that in all cases where the income of a fund is given to another for life, it is neither capable of assignment nor liable for the debts of the annuitant. The supreme court of Maryland had under consideration the same question in Baker v. Keiser, 75 Md. 332, 23 Atl. 735. In the opinion the court used this language:

"Without importing words into that will which are not there, and imputing an intention to the testator of which he has given no intimation by any verbal expression, we cannot say that the income was not and is not assignable by the life tenant; and if it is, there was error in holding it to be beyond the reach of creditors. Any other construction of this will and ruling in this case would be in effect saying that all life estates of like character, given in trust, are incapable of being alienated. This court went as far as they could in Smith v. Towers, 69 Md. 77, 14 Atl. 497, to effect the intention of the testator which was so expressly declared; but proper adherence to the policy of the law in [666] the state will not allow the extension of the doctrine of the Towers' case beyond the limitations of that decision, nor to a case not falling clearly within its reasons and reasoning; and this case does not." (p. 339.)

The action here was brought under section 228 of the code, which provides:

"Any creditor shall be entitled to proceed by garnishment in the district court of the proper county against any person, excepting a municipal corporation, who shall be indebted to or have any property, real or personal, in his possession or under his control belonging to such creditor's debtor, in the cases, upon the conditions, and in the manner hereinafter described."

In Nelson v. Stull, 65 Kan. 585, 68 Pac. 617, 70 Pac. 590, it was held that an executor is not subject to garnishment under this section of the code before a final order of distribution. The court declined at that time to decide whether he would be subject to garnishment after such final order. The defendant makes the broad contention that an executor or administrator cannot be subject to garnishment in the absence of a special statute; and further, that under the decision just cited the executors are not liable to garnishment, because no order of distribution has been made. The code provision, supra, is broad enough in its terms to include executors and administrators after an order of distribution has been made. (Hardesty v. Campbell, 29 Md. 533; Baker v. Keiser, supra; Arbaugh v. Myers, 8 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 617, 9 Cinc. L. Bul. 64, 20 Cyc. 1028.)

The will expressly directs the executor-trustees to make the quarterly payments to Arthur B. Havens in advance; and it is conceded that they have recognized this provision and have made the payments accordingly. No order of distribution was necessary in order to authorize the executors to make the payments. The rule exempting executors and administrators from [667] garnishment process before the final order of distribution rests upon the assumption that it cannot be known until the estate is settled and the order made whether there will be any assets sufficient to pay debts and expenses of administration. The reason for the rule in the Stull case, supra, being absent, the rule fails. It is one of the agreed facts in the present case that the estate of Paul E. Havens is solvent and able to respond to these quarterly payments due to Arthur B. Havens, without jeopardizing the rights of any creditor of the testator. In Lorenz v. King, 38 Pa. St. 93, it was held that a legacy or distributive share is subject to attachment before final settlement, where assets are admitted by the representative, and where there are ample funds in his hands to pay a legacy after the discharge of all debts against the estate. An income for life from a trust estate is the absolute property of the beneficiary, and is therefore subject to garnishment by his creditors. (Girard L. Ins. etc. Co. v. Chambers, 46 Pa. St. 485, 86 Am. Dec. 513; Knefler v. Shreve, 78 Ky. 297; Pickens v. Dorris, 20 Mo. App. 1; Baker v. Keiser, 75 Md. 332, 23 Atl. 735; 20 Cyc. 993, Note; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 763, Note.)

Section 247 of the code provides for the allowance of an attorney's fee to the extent of $25 as costs of the plaintiff in garnishment proceedings, and the court properly allowed that sum as fees in the present case.

It follows that the judgment will be affirmed.

NOTE.

Sufficiency of Instrument to Create Spendthrift Trust.

Generally.

The earlier cases discussing the sufficiency of an instrument to create a spendthrift trust are reviewed in the notes to Kessner v. Phillips, 3 Ann. Cas. 1005; Wagner v. Wagner, 18 Ann. Cas. 490; and Garland v. Garland, 24 Am. St. Rep. 682. This note collates the recent cases on that point.

The various instruments passed on with respect to their sufficiency to create a spendthrift trust are of course widely variant in their phraseology, but the general rule deducible from the cases is that it is not necessary that the beneficiary should be denominated a spendthrift in the instrument creating the trust, or that all the qualifications and restrictions incident to such a trust should be expressly stated. That rule is recognized in the reported case, though it is held therein that the instrument under consideration disclosed no intention to create such a trust.

The view that it is not necessary that the instrument should specifically exempt the income from the beneficiary's debts was exemplified in Wallace v. Foxwell, 250 Ill. 616, 95 N. E. 985, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 632, wherein the court said: "True, the law favors the vesting of estates, but this rule will not be permitted to defeat the intention of the testator. To constitute a valid spendthrift trust it is not necessary that the will should specifically provide that the income shall not be subject to the payment of the debts and liabilities of the cestui que trust. It is sufficient if the will, considered as a whole and viewed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, discloses an intention on the part of the testator to provide for the support and maintenance of his child and to secure the fund against his improvidence. The testator had a legal right to dispose of his property in this manner if he desired to do so, and if such was his intention, as appears from the will, it is the duty of the court to give effect to such intention." In the same case the court further declared that the denomination of the cestui que trust as a spendthrift was not indispensable to the creation of such a relation, saying in that regard: "To create a valid spendthrift trust it is not necessary that the cestui que trust should be denominated a spendthrift in the will or that the testator should give his reasons for the creation of it, nor is it necessary that the will shall in express terms contain all the restrictions and qualifications incident to such trusts. If, upon a consideration of the will, it appears the intention of the testator was to create such a trust, effect will be given to that intention. Baker v. Brown, 146 Mass. 369." In O'Hare v. Johnston, 273 Ill. 458, 113 N. E. 127, it was declared that while it was not necessary to the creation of a spendthrift trust that the beneficiary should be designated a spendthrift it was essential that the settlor should be of the opinion that he was of that description. The court said: "But it is further argued that the entire fourth clause of the will is a spendthrift trust provision for the testator's children and grandchildren for a period of thirty years, and that this fact argues strongly in favor of contingency of the gift. A spendthrift trust is created with a view of providing a fund for the maintenance of another and at the same time securing it against his own improvidence or incapacity. Directions against alienation by the voluntary act of the beneficiary or through legal process by creditors are the usual incidents of such trusts. (Steib v. Whitehead, 111 Ill. 247; Wagner v. Wagner, 244 Ill. 101, 18 Ann. Cas. 490, 91 N. E. 66; Wallace v. Foxwell, 250 Ill. 616, 95 N. E. 985, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 632.) There is nothing in the wording of the will itself as to this trust that indicates that it is of a spendthrift character. We find no restraint on alienation and no discretion as to the payment of income or principal. It is true there is evidence tending to show that the testator had expressed doubts as to the son settling down to business and as to whether he would be able to take care of himself, and stated that the daughter, while in school, had been accustomed to spend a good deal of money which the father had provided; that she was under age at the time the will was drawn and that both the son and daughter had depended on their father for support. But it is also true that this fund referred to the grandchildren as well as the children, and the testator, naturally, could not form any idea as to whether they would need the protection of a spendthrift trust. It is the intention of the testator that decides, under the authorities, the character of the trust. If it is shown that his intention indicates a spendthrift trust, the court will not inquire whether the beneficiary is, in fact, a spendthrift. (Wagner v. Wagner, supra.) The will does not indicate that the testator thought his children were spendthrifts. He gave to each of them valuable real estate and a large amount of other property. In addition to this he gave them the income from the trust fund, which tends strongly to show that he had no suspicions or apprehensions as to their ability to handle their own property. The reasoning of this court on a somewhat similar question in Black v. Jones, supra, lends strong support to the argument that the giving of large sums directly to them indicates that the trust was not of a spendthrift character. There is another reason that could be urged against the view that the testator considered this a spendthrift trust. He would hardly have appointed his son one of the executors if he had considered him a person not to be trusted with business matters. We think the conclusion might well be drawn that the reason for creating this trust was based on the desire of the testator to keep his property in his own descendants and prevent it from going, in the next generation, to strangers to his blood. This trust was certainly an appropriate method for bringing about this result." To the same effect see Hoffman v. Beltzhoover, 71 W. Va. 72, 76 S. E. 968, wherein the court said: "It is not necessary that an instrument creating a spendthrift trust should contain an express declaration that the interest of the cestui que trust in the trust estate shall be beyond the reach of creditors, providing such appears to be the clear intention of the testator or donor as gathered from all parts of the instrument construed together in the light of the circumstances. The court will look to the intention disclosed by the whole instrument, rather than to the language employed in any particular clause of it. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 141-142." Illustrations.

In Anderson v. Williams, 262 Ill. 308, Ann. Cas. 1915B 720, 104 N. E. 659, affirming 179 Ill. App. 398, a codicil, wherein the testator directed that one-sixth of the proceeds of his estate should be invested by certain persons named as trustees and executors and that the net income should be paid to his daughter semiannually during her life, was construed to create a spendthrift trust.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—26.

In Hoffman v. Beltzhoover, 71 W. Va. 72, 76 S. E. 968, it was held that a testator who by his will left certain land to his son subject to the provision that if the land should be sold after the son's majority there should be left in the hands of the purchaser the sum of $2,500, as a lien on the land, the interest on which was for the sole use and support of the son during his natural life, created a spendthrift trust.

In Leary v. Kerber, 255 Ill. 433, 99 N. E. 662, the court construed the following provision in a will: "Third—After the death of my said wife I give and bequeath the rest, residue and remainder of all of my estate, both personal and real, to my children who may be then living, in equal shares, except as to my daughter Anna Leary, now married to William Leary, and as to her share it is my will that her said equal share shall be paid over and placed in control of my son Mathias Kerber, as her trustee, for her. And I hereby give and bequeath to my said son Mathias Kerber, as trustee for said Anna Leary, one equal undivided share of my estate, both real and personal after the death of my said wife, to be by him held for her as her trustee, and collect rents and profits thereof and to pay the same over to her during her natural life, free from any act or control of her said husband, William Leary; and at the death of my said daughter Anna, then the said share shall be paid over to her children, and if she should die without leaving any heirs of her body, then the said share so left in trust shall be turned over to the heirs of my body then living, to be distributed according to the statutes of the state of Illinois." It was held that this clearly created a spendthrift trust in favor of the testator's daughter, Anna Leary, the purpose being to protect the daughter's interest against dissipation by the husband.

In Cady v. Lincoln, 100 Miss. 765, 57 So. 213 wherein it appeared that a testator in one portion of his will devised certain property to a trustee for the purpose of applying the rents and profits for the use of the testator's son and grandson, and in another part of his will authorized the sale of the residue of his property and ordered that after the payment of certain debts one-fourth of the proceeds should be used in the same manner as the other property theretofore referred to, and directed other distribution of the remaining undisposed of portion of the residue, it was held that the directions as to the use and disposition of the funds to be set aside for his son and grandson constituted a spendthrift trust as to them.

In Devin v. McCoy, 48 Ind. App. 379, 93 N. E. 1013, it appeared that a testator left certain property to his two grandchildren and then appointed a trustee to manage the same and apply the proceeds to the education and support of the children, subject to the condition that if either should die without issue surviving them such share was to go to the other, and if both died without issue then their share was to go to the testator's children. It was held that the testator did not intend to tie up the property of the grandchildren during their entire lives to prevent the property from going to others than his direct lineal descendants and therefore did not intend to create a spendthrift trust. The court said: "To our mind the provisions of the will under consideration do not evince an intention on the part of the testatrix to create a spendthrift trust. We do not think it was her intention to tie up the property in the hands of the trustee during the life of her grandchildren, for the purpose of providing for their maintenance, and at the same time securing it against their extravagance or improvidence. The provisions of item seven seem rather to indicate that it was her purpose to control the ultimate disposition of her property, so that it might not go to strangers or depart from those of her own blood, and that she created this trust for the purpose of securing this end. The provisions of this item in her will indicate that she contemplated that one or both her grandchildren might marry and die without issue, and that the property, if given to them absolutely, would go to the surviving husband or wife, to the exclusion of the kindred, who were of the blood of the testatrix. To prevent this result, she placed the property willed to her grandchildren in the hands of a trustee, and provided that he should take, hold and manage it until the happening of a contingency which would prevent this result." But compare McCoy v. Houck, 180 Ind. 634, 99 N. E. 97.

In Millard v. Beaumont (Mo.) 185 S. W. 547, it appeared that a testator made the following provision: "Second: I give, devise and bequeath to my nephew Homer S. Millard, during his life, the house, household furniture and grounds and all the appurtenances thereto belonging which constitute my home place, where I now reside in Houston, Texas county, Missouri, to have, hold, occupy and enjoy during his natural life; but without the power of incumbrance or alienation, and it is my will that he have full use and benefit of the same to occupy as his home if he so desires, and if not, to have the rents and income therefrom during his lifetime, and at his death, it is my wish and I hereby direct that said property real and personal shall pass to and become vested in the bodily heirs of the said Homer S. Millard, but without the power to encumber, alienate, lease or otherwise transfer or burden the title to said property until after the expiration of twenty-one years after the death of the said Homers S. Millard."

It was held that this did not create a spendthrift trust. The court said: "The decree just mentioned narrows too much the plaintiff's interest in the property covered by the insurance policy in question. We think the will clearly gives a life estate in such property to plaintiff, with remainder to his bodily heirs. The will attempts to deprive the life tenant, this plaintiff, of all power to encumber or alienate his interest in this property. But whether such restrictions be void or not, the plaintiff is given a vested life estate. His interest in this land, under the will, is more than that of a beneficiary of a spendthrift trust. Here the life tenant has title and ownership, and is given the possession of the property and the right to collect the rents and receive the income, and no trustee is appointed. There is no trust estate created, and the restrictions as to alienation or incumbrance of his interest in the property are void. Kessner V. Phillips, 189 Mo. 515, 524, 88 S. W. 66, 107 Am. St. Rep. 368, 3 Ann. Cas. 1005."

NICHOLSON PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Louisiana Supreme Court—June 7, 1915.

137 La. 588; 68 So. 964.

Libel and Slander — What Constitutes Malice.

The "malice" imputed to a publisher of a libel is not personal ill will, but merely legal malice implied from wilfully and wantonly doing an unlawful act which results in injury to another.

[See 15 Am. St. Rep. 337.]

Interpretation of Defamatory Language.

Where a newspaper published an article concerning plaintiff, who was a resident of New Orleans and an international vice-president of a labor union, and who used his influence at Washington to assist San Francisco to obtain the Panama Fair as against New Orleans, stating that he was a traitor and a dangerous and suspicious character and should be driven out of town and given the cold shoulder by all self-respecting Orleanians, the words must be construed in the connection in which they were used, and not given the meaning they ordinarily possess.

Privilege — Comment on Matter of Public Interest.

Where plaintiff, a resident of New Orleans, and an international vice-president of a labor union, used his influence at Washington to aid San Francisco to secure the Panama Fair as against New Orleans, which contest attracted great public interest in New Orleans and in the state, severe comment on such acts, which included a designation of plaintiff as traitor by a New Orleans newspaper, was privileged as comment on a news matter of general public interest and on the acts of one who had in that connection made himself a public figure subject to such attack.

Appeal from Circuit District Court, Parish of Orleans: PARKER, Judge.

Action by Thomas Flanagan, plaintiff, against Nicholson Publishing Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Buck, Walshe & Buck for appellant.

Caffery, Quintero, Gidiere & Brumby for appellee.

[589] PROVOSTY, J.—While the contest between New Orleans and San Francisco was going on in Washington before Congress for being chosen as the place where the Panama Exposition should be held, and at the moment when the contest was at its hottest and bitterest, Mr. R. E. Lee, one of the New Orleans delegates for conducting the contest in Washington, a representative more especially of the labor interests of New Orleans, met the plaintiff at the American Federation of Labor headquarters in Washington, and, in the course of a discussion which then took place between them on the question of the Exposition, the plaintiff expressed himself as favoring San Francisco, giving as his reason that the labor organization in [590] that city was better paid, and that its getting the Exposition would benefit labor more. Plaintiff was, at that time, the second vice president of the International Brotherhood and Helpers, which is a branch of the American Federation of Labor, and his influence as such was thought to be more or less potent in Washington with certain members of Congress. In view of that fact, and as he was a resident of New Orleans, and more or less a representative of the New Orleans labor organizations, the news of this attitude of his caused quite a commotion among the New Orleans delegation in Washington and excited a good deal of angry feeling. On that same day, as we understand, the plaintiff and Messrs. Lee and Harrison, the latter representing in Washington the labor interests of New Orleans in the endeavor to secure the Exposition for New Orleans, met in the room of the two latter at the hotel, and while they were discussing this hostile attitude of plaintiff, and seeking to bring him over to the side of New Orleans, Mr. Denechaud, another of the New Orleans delegates, came into the room. Plaintiff was introduced to him as "the man who was knocking New Orleans," and Mr. Denechaud joined forces with Messrs. Lee and Harrison in the endeavor to bring him over. Plaintiff became violently angry; abused New Orleans in language too vile to be even orally repeated, let alone written; and announced his liberty of action and his determination to favor San Francisco. He denies all this on the witness stand, but the proof is positive from the other three. This hostile meddling of plaintiff in the fight was considered to be an ugly feature in the situation, and, naturally, was at once reported to the New Orleans papers; and the defendant company's paper, the Daily Picayune, in its issue of the next morning, January 20, 1911, referred to it in its column of Washington news as follows:

[591] "One of the embarrassing reports turned into the New Orleans headquarters today was that M. Flanagan, international vice president of the blacksmiths' order, whose home is in New Orleans, but who is on the road much of the time, is working in behalf of San Francisco among the laboring men. He was met in the lobby during the meeting of the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor today by New Orleans workers, and was heard to boast of his work for Mayor McCarthy, the labor mayor of San Francisco.

"It is feared that but one of the labor Congressmen in the House will come to the support of New Orleans when the vote is taken on the Estopinal bill."

One of the things said to plaintiff by Messrs. Lee, Harrison and Denechaud, in the course of their discussion, was that if plaintiff persisted in his hostile attitude to New Orleans he would certainly be written up by the New Orleans papers; and, sure enough, The Daily Picayune in its issue of January 20, 1911, contained the following, which appeared in a section of the paper devoted to the said contest going on in Washington: "

"Many of the prominent local labor unionists of the city of New Orleans are up in arms over the alleged glaring disloyalty to his home town of Tom Flanagan, international vice president of the Blacksmiths' and Helpers' Union, who, it is said, while in Washington, worked tooth and nail in the interest of San Francisco in the fight for the Panama Exposition, and even went so far as to flaunt in the faces of the gentlemen of the local committee the declaration that he was with Mayor McCarthy, of the city of the Golden Gate.

"There were many labor unionists spoken to yesterday who had a good word for Flanagan, and one man who is recognized as a leader in labor's ranks said that he was quite certain that some action would be taken by the organization in New Orleans to call Flanagan to account for his action.

"Another prominent leader spoke of Flanagan as the rankest kind of traitor, and accused him of being in the service of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, for which big corporation the men of the union worked in Algiers.

"Flanagan's antecedents were traced back as far as possible. It was discovered that he was born in this city, and lived the better part of his life in the First and Tenth wards. He was notoriously opposed to Mayor Behrman and all the leaders of the regular Democratic party, and carried his opposition to extreme ends, even declaring himself against the city in which he was born and where he made his living.

"A recognized leader in the local labor movement said last night that Flanagan should be driven out of town and given the cold shoulder by all self-respecting Orleanians.

"Why, the Central Trades and Labor Council, the Building Trades Council, the Deck and Cotton Council and nearly every separate labor organization in the city have come out openly and loyally in an advancement of our home town,' said the leader; 'and now here comes this fellow and tries to discredit us in the eyes of our people. If I had my way with him, I'd pull him as a dangerous and suspicious character when he dares to show his brazen face in our midst again, and give him a term in jail.'

"As Flanagan's union is not affiliated with the central bodies in New Orleans, it is not thought that the unions can take any action against him in the way of expulsion or censure.

"Flanagan formerly lived in Magnolia street, near Erato; but now resides in Claiborne street, above Felicity, in the Tenth ward. The man spends much of his time on the road organizing unions, and was last here about four weeks ago."

And in the issue of the same paper on the next day appeared the following:

"A committee representing Local No. 229, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, denounced Thomas J. Flanagan, fourth vice president of the union, last night. Frank Heuer, president of the local, said that Flanagan had no authority to represent the local in Washington.

"The members of our local have always been in favor of New Orleans, and we have indorsed the city in resolutions,' he said. 'The disloyalty of Flanagan is distasteful to every true union man in the United States, and I am sure that he hurt the cause of San Francisco rather than assisted it. A traitor can not help any cause.'

"The committee also denied the statement that the local was of little consequence, and was almost nonexistent. President Heuer said that the local is in the best possible condition. There are seventy-five members in good standing, and the delegates have great influence in labor councils.

"The committee which denounced Flanagan was composed of Frank Heuer, George W. Creher, secretary, and T. J. Casey."

Messrs. Heuer and Creher, here named, deny that they made the statements attributed to them in the second paragraph of this last excerpt; but the city editor of the paper, and one of its local reporters, who was called [593] in for taking down the statements of the said committee, testify that the statements were taken down as made, and were read to the gentlemen in order to make sure of the correctness of the report. The third committeeman, Mr. Casey, did not testify. The reason of the committee calling was for procuring the correction of that part of the publication of the 21st where it was said:

"Flanagan's union is not very strong in New Orleans; in fact, it is practically nonexistent on this side of the river."

Plaintiff charges that the publications were a libel upon him, and sues in damages.

The answer, after denying that said publications were false or malicious, proceeds as follows:

"Defendant avers, on the contrary, that the statements made in said articles were true and correct, and were published without any malice or ill will toward the plaintiff.

"Defendant specially denies that it was actuated by any malice or ill will toward the plaintiff in publishing said article, and it avers that said plaintiff is not personally known to it, and that he has not been affected or injured in any degree or in any way by the said publications.

"Defendant further specially avers that the said article was published for the information and advantage of the public; that the statements therein contained were derived from responsible persons to whom and in whose presence the plaintiff had indulged in an awful tirade of abuse against the city of New Orleans, declaring, among other things, as follows:

"I don't owe New Orleans anything, and I'll work as hard as I ——— please for San Francisco. To hell with New Orleans.'

"And defendant in said article did report and comment on said acts of plaintiff without malice toward the plaintiff, but in such terms as such acts naturally call forth.

"Defendant avers that the campaign between New Orleans and San Francisco for the Fair in celebration of the opening of the Panama Canal took on proportions of a mimic war, in which the spectacle of a resident of New Orleans openly opposing his own city was unique, and was an item of special news interest calling for fitting and defensive comment; that respondent, in its function of giving to public sentiment a voice, had a certain freedom and latitude, which it by no means exceeded, in dealing with the surprising and almost solitary stand taken against his home city by the plaintiff herein, who, by his attitude, made himself a public figure, subject to becoming animadversion and comment; that respondent imputed to [594] plaintiff nothing which was actually derogatory, but that, as a live and progressive newspaper, and as the leading advocate of the Exposition among the newspapers of the city, it devolved upon respondent to wit any Orleanian for not giving to New Orleans, over San Francisco, the benefit of the sentiment laid down in Scott's works, verbo 'Fatherland,' as follows:

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said:

This is my own, my native land?
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned
As home his footsteps he hath turned From wandering on a foreign strand?"

Referring to the second of the above-transcribed excerpts, the petition of the plaintiff alleges:

"That said publication, under guise of pretending to repeat what other persons whose names are not given, wickedly, maliciously and unlawfully without cause or justification attacks the personal character of petitioner for honesty; describes him as 'the rankest kind of a traitor' as influenced by improper motives in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company: 'that he should be driven out of town and given the cold shoulder by all self-respecting citizens;' describes him as 'this fellow'—whom the undisclosed commentator 'if he had his way would have (him) pulled as a dangerous and suspicious character.'

"That from these expressions, and from the tenor of the entire article, it is manifest that the same was written and published in spite and malice; that it was so published for the express purpose to suggest dishonest motive (if the main charge were true, which is denied), to humiliate petitioner as a man, discredit him as a citizen and generally to cast upon him obloquy and contempt."

And in another paragraph the petition refers to the headline of the publication of January 22d, to wit, "Flanagan's own union here denounces him as a traitor," and charges that the same constituted a libel.

In the brief of plaintiff's learned counsel, it is said that the accusation against plaintiff of his having favored San Francisco is founded upon nothing but the idlest of rumor—not traced to any source—and that it is, as a matter of fact, false; and the case is summed up as follows:

"If the plain text of the articles and the great recklessness with which they were paraded in flashy headlines do not strike the fair and impartial mind with the conviction that unwarranted liberty was taken upon the name and person of this plaintiff, no refinement of definition [595] would assist to find the right solution. The obvious purpose was primarily to hold up the plaintiff to ridicule, scorn, contempt, and humiliation, and behind and within this there is an attack on his common honesty and worth as a man. The 'rankest kind of a traitor' . . . in the service of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, etc. . . . 'Everybody knows that the S. P. R. Co. wanted San Francisco to get the Exposition.' The inference is self-evident: 'For which corporation Flanagan is alleged to work,' i. e., in getting the Exposition.

"And now here comes this fellow: ' . . . If I had my way with him I'd pull him as a dangerous and suspicious character when he dares to show his brazen face in our midst again and give him a term in jail.' 'The man (?) spends much of his time on the road organizing unions and was last here four weeks ago.'"

In the same brief, plaintiff is referred to as follows:

"The plaintiff, Thomas Flanagan, is a 'blacksmith by trade.' He has evidently distinguished himself among his 'Fellows,' for they advanced him to high office, viz., to that of vice president of 'The International Brotherhood and Helpers,' which is a 'Branch of the American Federation of Labor.' And thus he has been lifted from the soot and fire of the furnace and the clang of the hammer and anvil to the higher domain where mind and spirit and sympathy struggle to relieve hardships and ameliorate distress. This duty calls him from the workshop to council chambers and he is almost constantly 'abroad,' traveling from place to place, wherever called by co-workers or superiors, completely absorbed in his work.

"This is not a fancy sketch; it is one taken from the Record."

The malice imputed to the defendant company is not personal ill will, but merely legal malice, or that deduced by the law from the willfully and wantonly doing of an unlawful act resulting in injury to another.

The words "traitor," "dangerous and suspicious character," and "fellow," and "should be driven out of town and given the cold shoulder by all self-respecting Orleanians," do have a very disparaging meaning; and their appreciation to a man of standing in a community, especially by a newspaper of large circulation in that community, is no doubt calculated ordinarily to injure. But the connection in which words are used control their signification, and the expressions [596] here in question might well be used in a connection altering their ordinary meaning; and we think they were so used in the present case. Their sum and substance in the present case amounts to nothing more than to the charge that the plaintiff, being in Washington and occupying there a position of influence which he might have used in the interest of New Orleans, his home town, chose to use it on the contrary in the interest of her rival in the bitter contest going on between them. This conduct appeared to the newspaper to be deserving of the condemnation thus visited upon it, and to call for the expression in question; and, doubtless, a majority of the people of New Orleans felt in the same way.

That words are to be understood in the connection in which they are used, and are not to be attributed a signification other than that which the context would show them to have, is abundantly established in the law of libel and slander.

"The leading English case on this subject is one cited in Lord Cromwell's Case (1578) 4 Rep. 13, 14: 'If a man brings an action, on the case calling the plaintiff murderer, the defendant will say that he was talking with the plaintiff concerning unlawful hunting, and the plaintiff confessed that he killed several hares with certain engines; to which the defendant answered and said, "Thou art a murderer" (innuendo the killing of the said hares). . . . Resolved by the whole court, that the justification was good. For in case of slander by words, the sense of the whole words ought to be taken, and the sense of them appears by the cause and occasion of speaking of them, for sensus verborum ex causa dicendi accipiendus est et sermones semper accipiendi sunt, secundum subjectum. . . . And it was said, God forbid that a man's words should be by such strict and grammatical construction taken by parcels against the manifest intent of the party upon consideration of all the words which import the true cause and occasion which manifest the true sense of them; quia quae ad unum finem loquenda sunt, non debent ad alium detorqueri; and, therefore, in the said case of murder the court held the justification good; and that the defendant should never be put to the general issue when he confesses the words and justifies them, or confesses the words and by special matter shows that they are not actionable.' Shipley v. Todhunter, 7 C. & P. 680, 32 E. C. L. 685; Odgers on L. & S. 109." Newell on Slander and Libel, p. 275.

"But where the words complained of are, 'Thou art a thief, for thou tookest my beasts by reason of an execution, and I will hang thee,' no action lies, for it is clear that the whole sentence taken together imports only a charge of trespass. Wilk's Case, 1 Roll. Abr. 61; Smith v. Ward, Cro. Jac. 674; Sibley v. Tomlins, 4 Tyrw. 90." Newell on Slander and Libel, p. 276.

The rule is generalized, and is thus laid down by Newell:

"Defamatory words which are apparently actionable, but which are susceptible of an explanation by reference to some particular transaction to which they are known by those in whose presence they were spoken to refer, are to be construed accordingly and with reference to such transaction." Newell on Slander and Libel, p. 292.

Newell also cites a case in illustration of the foregoing proposition.

"The declaration charging the defendant with speaking the following words: 'John Keating is as damned a rascal as ever lived, and all who joined his party and procession on the Fourth of July (meaning the said plaintiff, John Van Rensselaer, and the party and procession in which the said John Keating acted as captain on said Fourth of July) are a set of black-hearted highwaymen, robbers, and murderers.' At the trial the words were proved to have been spoken as alleged. On the part of the defendant it appeared that on the day previous to the speaking of the words there had been a public procession to a church in Lansingburgh, where the parties resided; and that Keating commanded an artillery company, which formed a part of the procession, attended with music; that a Mr. Bird claimed one of the instruments used, and went to the church to demand it. It was not given up, and a fray ensued, in which Mr. Bird was dangerously wounded. It also appeared that the conversation in which the words were spoken was understood by those who heard it to relate to the transactions of the preceding day, and that the terms 'highwaymen, robbers, and murderers' were used in reference to the treatment of Mr. Bird in withholding the instrument and wounding him. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, on appeal to the Supreme Court it was held that, as the words spoken by defendant were clearly understood to apply to the transactions of the preceding day, and as these were known not to amount to charge which the words would otherwise import, the verdict was set aside." Van Rensselaer v. Dole, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 279 (1800).

A case which goes even further than this is that of Artieta v. Artieta, 15 La. Ann. 48, where the court said:

[598] "The plaintiff's conduct in calling the defendant, his brother, a 'rogue,' within the hearing of some bystanders, is certainly very reprehensible. But as this was done in a moment of irritation, and in reference to the defendant's unwillingness to reimburse what had been disbursed for his account, and as no injury appears to have resulted, or could have resulted, from his transient expression of angry feeling, the alleged case of defamation is not actionable."

Doubtless, the expressions were very forcible, but as said by this court in the case of Tate v. Nicholson Pub. Co. 122 La. 479, 47 So. 776:

"In determining the question of the liability of the defendant, it is our duty to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case. We should give weight to every fact having a legal bearing on the publication. We must consider the occasion on which it is made, to ascertain how far, in view of that occasion and of everything that was then said by the defendant with reference to the matters published, whether the publication should, as to its character, be held to be libelous or not. Our conclusion must be based upon the situation taken as a whole."

These publications were made at a time of great public excitement when exaggerated expressions were rather to be expected. Plaintiff himself says of the situation, in his petition:

"The city of New Orleans was an ardent and earnest applicant—her people expending much money and under sanction of a constitutional amendment, the people of the entire state of Louisiana had voted to tax themselves to provide means satisfactory to the government of the United States for holding said Exposition, . . . and much interest and excitement prevailed about the matter. Large delegations of the citizens of New Orleans at great expense went personally to the city of Washington, to protect and advance officially before the committees of Congress and by personal influence with members of Congress, the interests of the city of New Orleans in the premises. The entire public press of this city, and practically the state, manifested great interest, and all the newspapers were filled daily with news, comments, interviews, etc., concerning the progress of affairs at the Capital, in Congress before committees and executive officers."

In fact, the two Houses of the General Assembly as a whole adjourned over to Washington as a delegation or lobby committee.

These circumstances explain and go towards excusing the severity of the language used. The public mind was wrought up, and [599] plaintiff, a citizen of New Orleans, and a representative of her labor organizations, was using his position of vantage in Washington against New Orleans.

In the case of Mihojevich v. Bodechtel, 48 La. Ann. 618, 19 So. 672, this court said:

"Slanderous epithets are not always actionable. An exception to the general rule is found in the case of a single woman, eighty years of age, suffering from a real or fancied wrong, who makes use of vile epithets as a means of defense. The damages occasioned thereby are more seeming than real, and the cause of action may be appropriately relegated to the domain of damnum absque injuria."

"True it is that such words as 'dirty rat' and 'thief,' and 'swindler,' 'thief,' and 'rat,' are bad enough in their way, and little suited to ears polite; but, under all the circumstances surrounding this case, we do not feel disposed to give them the significance that is claimed for them by plaintiff's counsel. On the contrary, we are disposed to regard them as the irate and impulsive utterances of an old woman, whose only means of defense against a fancied or real wrong, which she had suffered at the hands of the plaintiff, was an unruly and mischievous tongue."

A similar question having arisen in Simons v. Lewis, 51 La. Ann. 327, 25 So. 406, the court again laid the rule down as follows:

"In suits for damages for slander, the defendant is entitled to the modification the words receive from the accompanying statements showing the meaning intended and understood by those to whom the words were addressed. Newell on Slander, p. 292 et seq."

"On the issue of malice, in such cases, as well as to mitigate damages, testimony is admissible to show the occasion, the sense of wrong, and other circumstances attending and prompting the expressions alleged to be slanderous. Gilbert v. Palmer, 8 La. Ann. 130; Artieta v. Artieta, 15 La. Ann. 48."

Be the foregoing as it may, however, there can be no doubt in this case that the publications were made from no wrong motives, or ill will towards the plaintiff, but simply in furtherance of the campaign that was then being carried on; and that, if not entirely justified, they were privileged.

Although plaintiff's mission in Washington was not connected with this particular campaign, yet the evidence shows that he was taking part in it; and, as he was the known [600] representative of labor organizations, he was not occupying an entirely private position. His status was more or less that of a public man, and entailing upon him a degree of public responsibility which privileged the public press to comment upon his acts. Oftentimes what is said or done by persons so situated—quasi public, as it were—becomes a matter of public concern. Thus:

"The action of a priest in the discharge of his duties and office, in conducting the public functions of his calling, is the proper subject of comment in the public press, for which, within proper limits, an action of libel will not lie." Klos v. Zahorik, 113 La. 161, 84 N. W. 1046, 53 L.R.A. 235.

"And such comments are privileged, no matter how severe, when made in support of some public contention, and in good faith." Odgers, Libel and Slander, 34-36.

"The editor of a newspaper has the right, if not the duty, of publishing, for the information of the public, fair and reasonable comments, however severe in terms, upon anything which is made by its owner a subject of public exhibition, as upon any other matter of public interest; and such a publication falls within the class of privileged communications for which no action can be maintained without proof of actual malice." Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 238, 23 Am. Rep. 322.

The article complained of being a privileged one, does it contain anything that is libelous per se? "Words ordinarily slanderous may not be so spoken by the party in the performance of public or official duty, upon a just occasion, and without malice." Mayo v. Sample, 18 Ia. 306.

The following subjects have been held to be legitimate subjects of newspaper comment and criticism:

A book and its author's views. Cooper v. Stone, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 434.

The manager of an Italian opera. Fry v. Bennett, 28 N. Y. 324.

A clergyman in his ministerial duties. Shurtleff v. Stevens, 51 Vt. 501, 31 Am. Rep. 698.

A teacher of stenography who advertised publicly for pupils. Press Co. v. Stewart, 119 Pa. St. 584, 14 Atl. 51.

The projector of a railway and his work. Crane v. Waters, 10 Fed. 619.

The "Cardiff Giant," a stone image of a [601] man, exhibited to the public. Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322.

A public dinner served by a caterer. Dooling v. Budget Pub. Co. 144 Mass. 258, 10 N. E. 809, 59 Am. Rep. 83.

A public building being erected by a city. Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446.

A flower show. Green v. Chapman, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 92, 33 E. C. L. 288, 5 Scott 340.

In a case from Iowa, the following criticism of a theatrical performance was held to be within the bounds of legitimate criticism:

"Effie is an old jade of fifty summers, Jessie a frisky filly of forty, and Addie, the flower of the family, a capering monstrosity of thirty-five. Their long, skinny arms, equipped with talons at the extremities, swung mechanically, and anon waved frantically at the suffering audience. The mouths of their rancid features opened like caverns, and sounds like the wailing of damned souls issued therefrom. They pranced around the stage with a motion that suggested a cross between the danse du ventre and fox trot—strange creatures, with painted faces and hideous mien.

Effie is spavined, Addie is springhalt, and Jessie, the only one who showed her stockings, has legs with calves as classy in their outlines as the curves of a broom handle."

In passing upon the above article, the court said:

"One who goes upon the stage to exhibit himself to the public, or who gives any kind of a performance to which the public is invited, may be freely criticized. He may be held up to ridicule, and entire freedom of expression is guaranteed dramatic critics, provided they are not actuated by malice or evil purpose in what they write. Fitting strictures, sarcasm, or ridicule, even, may be used, if based on facts, without liability, in the absence of malice or wicked purpose. The comments, however, must be based on truth, or on what in good faith and upon probable cause is believed to be true, and the matter must be pertinent to the conduct that is made the subject of criticism. Freedom of discussion is guaranteed by our fundamental law and a long line of judicial decisions. As said in the Gott Case, 122 Mass. 238, 23 Am. Rep. 322, the editor of a newspaper has the right, if not the duty, of publishing, for the information of the public, fair and reasonable comments, [602] however severe in terms, upon anything which is made by its owner a subject of public exhibition, as upon any other matter of public interest; and such a publication falls within the class of privileged communications, for which no action will lie without proof of actual malice. See also Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 347; Paris v. Levy, 9 C. B. N. S. 342, 99 E. C. L. 342; Donaghue v. Gaffy, 53 Conn. 43, 2 Atl. 397; Carr v. Hood, 1 Campb. (Eng.) 355, note. Surely, if one makes himself ridiculous in his public performances, he may be ridiculed by those whose duty or right it is to inform the public regarding the character of the performance. Cooper v. Stone, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 434. Mere exaggeration, or even gross exaggeration, does not of itself make the comment unfair. It has been held no libel for one newspaper to say of another, 'The most vulgar, ignorant, and scurrilous journal ever published in Great Britain.'" Cherry v. Des Moines Leader, 114 Ia. 298, 86 N. W. 323, 54 L.R.A. 855, 89 Am. St. Rep. 365.

A similar ruling is found in Cleveland Leader Printing Co. v. Nethersole, 84 Ohio St. 118, 95 N. E. 735, Ann. Cas. 1912B 985.

The privilege rests on two distinct grounds:

(1) It was within the province of the newspaper to comment on the incident as a matter of news and of general public interest.

(2) The appearance of plaintiff in the arena at Washington as a champion of San Francisco made him, pro hac vice, a public figure subject to such attack, condemnation, and ridicule as is appropriate and necessary in a campaign where public opinion is sought to be molded.

The contention is made that after all has been said the circumstances can only mitigate defendant's conduct, and not justify it; and that therefore, even if punitive damages cannot be recovered, there should, at any rate, be awarded actual damages, such as for the injury to plaintiff's feelings. We think the publications were, under the circumstances, privileged; and therefore not actionable at all.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Introductory.

The present note in dealing with the question of comment on matters of public interest in the law of defamation excludes cases involving certain phases of that subject which have been treated in previous notes. It concerns itself principally with a consideration of the privilege or immunity accorded by the law to comment on the particular classes of matters of public interest which come within its scope, with an incidental consideration of the actionable or nonactionable qualities of certain particular comments where this question arises in the cases otherwise within the scope of the note. The present note excludes cases dealing with the following subjects:

—literary criticism, which is discussed in the note to Triggs v. Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. 1 Ann. Cas. 326;

—dramatic criticism, which is discussed in the note to Cleveland Leader Printing Co. v. Nethersole, Ann. Cas. 1912B 978; —political criticism, which is discussed in the note to Black v. State Co. Ann. Cas. 1914C 989; —charge of burning or of arson, which is discussed in the note to Greer v. White, 17 Ann. Cas. 270;

—charge of robbery, which is discussed in the notes to Flaacke v. Stratford, 5 Ann. Cas. 854, and Wooten v. Martin, Ann. Cas. 1912B 407;

—disparagement of property or manufactured goods, which is discussed in the notes to Victor Safe, etc. Co. v. Deright, 8 Ann. Cas. 809; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Bridwell, Ann. Cas. 1914B 837; and Marino v. Di Marco, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1149;

—comment on judicial or official proceedings, which is discussed in the notes to the following cases; Nixon v. Dispatch Printing Co. 11 Ann. Cas. 161; Gazette Printing Co. v. Shallow, 15 Ann. Cas. 610; Flues v. New Nonpareil Co. Ann. Cas. 1915A 33; Meeker v. Post Printing, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1915A 126; and Stockman v. Leddy, Ann. Cas. 1916B 1052, 1065; —imputation on statement by clergyman, which is discussed in the notes to Cole v. Millsbaugh, 20 Ann. Cas. 717, and Hassett v. Carroll, Ann. Cas. 1913A 333;

—comment to or on public officers, which is discussed in the notes to Byrne v. Funk, 3 Ann. Cas. 647; Miller v. Nuckolls, 7 Ann. Cas. 110; Logan v. Hodges, 14 Ann. Cas. 103; Jozsa v. Moroney, 19 Ann. Cas. 1193; and Farr v. Valentine, Ann. Cas. 1913C 821;

—constitutional liberty of speech and press, which is discussed in the notes to Ex p. Harrison, 15 Ann. Cas. 1, and Schwartz v. Edrington, Ann. Cas. 1915B 1180;

—imputation on lawyer, which is discussed in the note to Montgomery v. New Era Printing Co. Ann. Cas. 1912A 375; —imputation of ignorance, incompetence, etc. to physician, dentist or druggist, which is discussed in the note to Rood v. Dutcher, 20 Ann. Cas. 480.

The note also excludes cases treating of the privilege attaching to communications made in a matter of common interest, as distinct from public interest, and does not attempt to cover the question of the quantum of damages.

In view of the difference of opinion among judges and writers as to whether the right to comment on a matter of public interest is strictly a privilege, it has been deemed advisable to refer to this right, in classification of the cases, by the term defeasible immunity rather than by the term qualified privilege.

II. Defeasible Immunity of Comment.

1. IN GENERAL.

The practically unanimous rule to be drawn from the cases is that comment on a matter of public interest is the subject of a defeasible immunity, which renders it not actionable in the absence of unfairness or express malice in the publication of the comment. The presence of those elements, however, will defeat the immunity.

Whether an occasion is such as to give this defeasible immunity or qualified privilege is a question of law for the court. Henry v. Moberly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981, second appeal 23 Ind. App. 305, 51 N. E. 497; Ingram v. Reed, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 550, 41 W. N. C. 123. Compare Cox v. Feeney, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 13, wherein the court left it to the jury to decide as a matter of fact whether the publication was privileged, first, as being with regard to a matter of public interest, and second, as having been published with the honest desire to afford the public information. In the course of his charge, Cockburn, C. J., said: "Put it to yourselves, and see whether you can discover anything of the malicious and vindictive spirit which is imputed to him; and if you do this, and find that, instead of having published the report with an eye to the public good, he had published it from sinister motives, then your verdict will be for the plaintiff; but if you cannot see your way safely to that view—if you see it was a matter of public concern that the result of an inquiry like that of Mr. Martin's should be communicated to the public, and that it has been done honestly by the defendant, your verdict will be for him."

Since the privilege or immunity accorded to fair comment on a matter of public interest is not absolute but qualified only, actual malice in the making of the comment removes the privilege and makes the comment actionable if defamatory. Brinsfield v. Howeth, 107 Md. 278, 68 Atl. 566, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 583; Robinson v. Coulter, 215 Mass. 566, 102 N. E. 938.

Whether the publication is malicious is a question for the jury. Bodwell v. Osgood, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 379, 15 Am. Dec. 228. But the fact that a comment contains defamatory matter which the publisher of the comment knows to be false, is conclusive of such actual malice as will remove the qualified privilege or defeasible immunity. Bodwell v. Osgood, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 379, 15 Am. Dec. 228.

2. THEORY ON WHICH IMMUNITY IS BASED.

The cases universally concede the right to make fair comment on matters of public interest and the general principle of the immunity of one making such a comment so long as it is fair and without malice. There is no such unanimity, however, on the question of the theory on which the immunity accorded such comment is predicated, and the variety of the attempts to formulate a scientific theory has left the law on this point in some confusion. See the cases cited in the foregoing subdivision.

For practical purposes it seems a great many of the cases treat this immunity from liability for fair comment on matters of public interest as a part of the general principle of qualified privilege which renders non-actionable in the absence of malice words spoken in pursuance of a duty to communicate, or in a matter in which the defendant has an interest to communicate and the person to whom the communication is directed has a corresponding interest. In other words, these cases consider the right to comment on matters of public interest as simply one application of the technical qualified privilege. Henwood v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. P. (Eng.) 606, 41 L. J. C. P. 206, 28 L. T. N. S. 938, 20 W. R. 1000; Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 347; Macdonnell v. Robinson, 12 Ont. App. 270; Wilcocks v. Howell, 5 Ont. 361; Crane v. Waters, 10 Fed. 619; Hoover v. Jordan, 27 Colo. App. 515, 150 Pac. 333; Barry v. McCollom, 81 Conn. 293, 70 Atl. 1035, 129 Am. St. Rep. 215; Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 36 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446; Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322; Smith v. Higgins, 16 Gray (Mass.) 251; Com. v. Featherston, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 594, 29 Leg. Int. 125. See also Fay v. Harrington, 176 Mass. 270, 57 N. E. 369; Com. v. Murphy, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 399. In Bearce v. Bass, supra, the court said: "Every one has a right to comment on matters of public interest and concern, provided he does so fairly and with an honest purpose. Such comments or criticisms are not libelous, however severe in their terms, unless they are written maliciously. Thus it has been held that books, prints, pictures and statuary publicly exhibited, and the architecture of public buildings, are all the legitimate subjects of newspaper criticism, and such criticism, fairly and honestly made, is not libelous, however strong the terms of censure may be, without the aver-ment and proof of special damage, unless it goes further and attacks the individual."

Other cases, however, attempt to separate the defense of fair comment from that of qualified privilege and to treat them as different principles. Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 B. & S. 769, 113 E. C. L. 769, 9 Jur. N. S. 1069, 32 L. J. Q. B. 185, 8 L. T. N. S. 201, 11 W. R. 569; Plymouth Mut. Co-operative, etc. Soc. v. Traders' Pub. Assoc. [1906] 1 K. B. 403; Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446; Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L.R.A. 97. And text writers on the subject have treated fair comment under a separate head and as distinct from qualified privilege. Odgers on Libel and Slander, pp. 34, 196-263; Townshend on Slander and Libel, p. 296 et seq., and p. 449 et seq. The subject of comment on matters of public interest is, however, treated as a part of the law of qualified privilege by Starkie. See Starkie on Slander and Libel, p. 233 et seq. And comment is regarded as privileged in Newell on Defamation, Slander and Libel, p. 564, § 1.

According to one view the question of fair comment vel non is really a question of libel or no libel, there being no libel if the comment is fair, whereas in the case of strict privilege, the privilege extends to words which are actually libelous but excuses them in the absence of malice. Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 B. & S. 769, 113 E. C. L. 769, 9 Jur. N. S. 1069, 32 L. J. Q. B. 185, 8 L. T. N. S. 201, 11 W. R. 569, wherein it was said, per Crompton, J.: "The first question is, whether the article on which this action is brought is a libel or no libel—not whether it is privileged or not. It is no libel if it is within the range of fair comment, that is, if a person might fairly and bona fide write the article; otherwise it is. It is said that there is a privilege, not to writers in newspapers only, but to the public in general, to comment on the public acts of public men, provided the writer believes that what he writes is true; in other words, that this belongs to the class of privileged communications, in which the malice of the writer becomes a question for the jury; that is, where, from the particular circumstances or position in which a person is placed, there is a legal or social duty in the nature of a private or peculiar right, as opposed to the rights possessed by the community at large, to assert what he believes. In these cases of privilege there is an exemption from legal liability in the absence of malice; and it is necessary to prove actual malice. But there is no such privilege here. It is the right of all the Queen's subjects to discuss public matters; but no person can have a right on that ground to publish what is defamatory merely because he believes it to be true. If this were so, a public man might have base motives imputed to him without having an opportunity of righting himself. Therefore it is necessary to confine privilege, as the law has always confined it, to cases of real necessity or duty, as that of a master giving a servant a character, or of a person who has been robbed charging another with robbing him. Though the word 'privilege' is used loosely in some of the cases as applied to the right which every person has to comment on public matters, I think that in all the cases cited the real question was whether the alleged libel was a fair comment such as every person might make upon a public matter, and if not there was no privilege. In the present case it is clear, as found by the jury, that the article is beyond the range of fair comment, and, this not being a case within the rule as to privilege, the only other available mode of defense was by proving the truth of the article." See also Patten v. Harper's Weekly Corp. 93 Misc. 368, 158 N. Y. S. 70.

The distinction has been made that the right of fair comment is not a right to make false statements, whereas qualified privilege may excuse words actually untrue if made bona fide. Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446; Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L.R.A. 97. In Bearce v. Bass, supra, it was said: "It is sometimes said that fair and honest criticism in matters of public concern is privileged. But this is not true in a strict legal sense. The distinction between fair and reasonable comment and criticism, and privileged communications, is this: That in the latter case, the words may be defamatory but the defamation is excused or justified by reason of the occasion; while in the former case, the words are not defamatory of the plaintiff, and hence not libelous—the stricture or criticism is not upon the person himself, but upon his work." In that case, however, the court held comment on the character of the construction of a public building to be privileged. And in Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L.R.A. 97, it was said: "But there is an important distinction to be noticed between the so-called privilege of fair criticism upon matters of public interest, and the privilege existing in the case, for instance, of answers to inquiries about the character of a servant. In the latter case, a bona fide statement not in excess of the occasion is privileged, although it turns out to be false. In the former, what is privileged, if that is the proper term, is criticism, not statement, and however it might be if a person merely quoted or referred to a statement as made by others, and gave it no new sanction, if he takes upon himself in his own person to allege facts otherwise libelous, he will not be privileged if those facts are not true. The reason for the distinction lies in the different nature and degree of the exigency and of the damage in the two cases. In these, as in many other instances, the law has to draw a line between conflicting interests, both intrinsically meritorious. When private inquiries are made about a private person, a servant, for example, it is often impossible to answer them properly without stating facts, and those who settled the law thought it more important to preserve a reasonable freedom in giving necessary information than to insure people against occasional unintended injustice, confined as it generally is to one or two persons. But what the interest of private citizens in public matters requires is freedom of discussion rather than of statement. Moreover the statements about such matters which come before the courts are generally public statements, where the harm done by a falsehood is much greater than in the other case. If one private citizen wrote to another that a high official had taken a bribe, no one would think good faith a sufficient answer to an action. He stands no better, certainly, when he publishes his writing to the world through a newspaper, and the newspaper itself stands no better than the writer."

The view of the foregoing cases is that there can be fair comment only when the comment is true, or in other words that if a plea of justification or of truth could not be maintained there could not be fair comment. This view, however, is contrary to the ruling made in the case of Dakhyl v. Labouchere, 96 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 399, wherein it was held to be reversible error for the judge to direct the jury that they must find for the plaintiff unless the defendant proved the justification of truth and that, unless that justification was proved, the assertion could not come within the range of fair comment. The court said: "In the second place, the defendant was, in my opinion, entitled to have the jury's decision as to the plea of fair comment, whether or not, in all the circumstances proved, the libel went beyond a fair comment on the plaintiff and on the system of medical enterprise with which he associated himself, as a matter of public interest treated by defendant honestly and without malice. The plea of fair comment does not arise if the plea of justification is made good, nor can it arise unless there is an imputation on a plaintiff. It is precisely where the criticism would otherwise be actionable as a libel that the defense of fair comment comes in. But the learned judge put aside that defense, and told the jury that unless a justification was proved they were bound to find a verdict for the plaintiff, and that, unless justified, the libel is not fair comment and cannot come within the region of fair comment." And in the case of Hunter v. Sharpe, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 983, 15 L. T. N. S. 421, Cockburn, C. J., vigorously declared that where the occasion is privileged for comment as being a matter of public interest, one commenting honestly and with bona fides is still privileged although he may exceed the limits of strict truth in the fact or inferences. The comment involved in that case was a stricture on the system of advertisement of a physician who claimed to have a specific for consumption. The court said: "But suppose you cannot go that length, that will not conclude the case. It will bring the defendant to his second ground of defense, which, in that event, you must consider. Under that head of defense, he says that it was a matter of public interest and public concern; that the plaintiff, by his advertisements, invited people to submit to his system of treatment; and that if he, the defendant, really believed it to be a delusion, then he had a right to maintain that it was so; and that even if, in drawing inferences of imposture and bad intention, he fell into error, yet if he wrote honestly, and with the intention of exercising his vocation as a public writer fairly and with reasonable moderation and judgment, he is entitled to the verdict. And I entirely agree in that view. Here is a man challenging public criticism by bringing forward what professes to be a new system of treatment, and inviting the public to adopt it as the only means of curing the most destructive disease known among us. In doing this he challenges public criticism, and if a public writer, using a reasonable degree of temper and moderation, as behooves any one who makes imputations upon others—if a public writer, thus discussing the subject in the exercise of his vocation, falls into error as to the facts or the inferences, and goes beyond the limits of strict truth, he is nevertheless privileged. The occasion is a privileged one, and if the privilege is exercised honestly, faithfully, and with reasonable regard to what truth and justice require, then, though he may exceed the limits of what he can legally prove to be the truth, he is protected from liability. It is not, therefore, necessary that the justification should appear to you to be made out, if you think that the defendant, or the writer, was in the reasonable and honest exercise of his vocation as a public writer, even although he was not fully warranted in drawing the inferences he did as to the conduct of the plaintiff, and though it may be that he was not entirely justified by the absolute truth. . . . And if the writer of the article was satisfied in his own mind—as you cannot doubt he was—that the plaintiff's system was delusive, and that he himself was a pretender and a quack, then we cannot wonder that in his honest indignation he should have put gall into the ink when he wrote to expose the conduct which he denounced. It was not the case of a man sitting down to gratify personal spite or professional malice, but a man writing honestly to denounce what he honestly believed to be a system of quackery and imposture, and to vindicate the honor and the character of the profession of which he was a member, and to do his duty to the public, in whose interest he was writing."

The view that the defense of fair comment is simply a defense of no libel, that there can be no libel if the comment is fair, and that unfair comment is necessarily libelous, was discountenanced in Winnipeg Steel Granary, etc. Co. v. Canada Ingot Iron Culvert Co. 22 Manitoba 576, wherein the court said: "It has been said that a fair comment on a matter of public interest is no libel. This, however, does not mean that the words are not defamatory, i. e., not injurious to the reputation. If they were not defamatory, of course no action would lie. It is only when the words do tend to injure the reputation that the question arises: Can they be excused as being a fair comment on a matter of public interest? The words may be in themselves libelous, but as soon as they are shown to be a fair and bona fide comment on a matter of public interest they cease to be actionable. Odgers Ib. 'It is precisely where the criticism would otherwise be actionable as a libel that the defense of fair comment comes in.' Per Lord Loreburn in Dakhyl v. Labouchere [1908] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 327 [note]."

The conflict between the two foregoing views may be partially reconciled on the ground that, granting that fair comment is a part of technical privilege, the reason privilege in general may cover false statements, while fair comment may not, is because the only comment that is privileged as such is fair comment, and only comment based on true statements is fair. The dispute seems to be largely a verbal one. If fair comment is a technically separate and substantive defense in itself, the qualified immunity which it gives is removed, in the first place, by proof that the comment is unfair, and it is unfair if it is based on a false statement of facts, or if it exceeds the realm of comment, as by making a personal attack. But if, on the other hand, the qualified immunity granted by the defense of fair comment is simply the immunity of qualified privilege, the rules governing it are, as a practical matter, the same. For the defense of privilege is defeated by proof of actual malice, by proof that the publication was in excess of the privileged occasion, and, as heretofore suggested, by proof that facts were falsely stated, in the case of the privilege of comment, because only fair comment is privileged, granting that it is a question of privilege, and only comment on true facts is fair. See Thomas v. Bradbury [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 627, 6 Ann. Cas. 135, which, though not strictly within the scope of this note, being a case involving literary criticism, is one of the few cases in which the view is elaborated that there is no practical difference between the defenses of fair comment and of qualified privilege. It was said therein, per Collins, M. R.: "Proof of malice may take a criticism prima facie fair outside the right of fair comment just as it takes a communication prima facie privileged outside the privilege. . . . If the analysis be strictly carried out it will be found that the two rights whatever name they are called by, are governed by precisely the same rules. The only practical difference is that in an action based on a criticism of a published work the transaction begins by the admission on the part of the plaintiff, implied from the averment by him of publication of the work criticised, that the comment came into existence on a protected occasion. There is not even any decision that the word privilege, as used in Hehwood v. Harrison to which Lord Esher was himself a party, is not as good a word as any substitute that can be suggested to express the right by which, in certain circumstances, writings defamatory of another person may be published with impunity, because the presumption of malice is negatived. For the reasons I have given the difference is one of words only, and could not be a matter of legal decision."

One practical objection to the attempted reconciliation of these two views was pointed out, however, in Winnipeg Steel Granary, etc. Co. v. Canada Ingot Iron Culvert Co. 22 Manitoba 576, wherein the distinction was made that the burden is on the plaintiff to show express malice, where words were spoken on a privileged occasion, but that where the defense of fair comment is interposed, the burden is on the defendant to prove that his comment was fair, and, in doing so, to prove that it was made without malice. The court said in that case, quoting Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. XVIII. p. 707: "A statement made on a qualified privileged occasion from feelings of spite or from some other wrongful and indirect motive is an abuse of the privilege and is not protected though there be no intrinsic evidence of actual malice in the actual words used. So, too, it may be said that the existence of malice in the mind of a commentator at the time of the publication of the comment suggests that the comment may not really have been made in the exercise of the right of fair comment on a matter of public interest, but to gratify personal spite; or, in other words, may have been an abuse of the right, though the words used are not intrinsically unfair. In short, the abuse, whether of the right of comment or of a qualified privileged occasion, arising from a wrong state of mind actuating the publication, may avoid the defense of fair comment or privilege, though the language used is not intrinsically unfair in the one case nor in excess of the occasion in the other. The analogy, however, is far from close. The burden is on the plaintiff, by proving express malice, to rebut the protection prima facie arising as if words are spoken or written on a privileged occasion; whereas, on a defense of fair comment, the burden is on the defendant to show that the comment is fair and in so doing to negative the writing or publication of the comment being actuated by an unfair state of mind."

3. FAIRNESS OF COMMENT.

In order to be accorded this defeasible immunity, the comment on a matter of public interest must be fair. Unfair comment has no immunity or privilege. See Sandwith v. Cowper, 4 Sask. L. Rep. 12, 17 West. L. Rep. 1, and other cases cited infra in this subdivision.

When the defense of fair comment is interposed to an action for libel, the fairness of the comment is put in issue, and on that issue the information which the defendant had, and on which he based his comment, is material, but the question from whom he obtained the information is not material. Plymouth Mut. Co-operative, etc. Soc. v. Traders' Pub. Assoc. [1906] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 403.

Comment is not unfair simply because it is vigorous or is made in somewhat rough terms, and such comment on a matter of public interest is still privileged so long as it is conceived in a fair and honest spirit. Hedely v. Barlow, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 224; Hunter v. Sharpe, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 983.

Comment is not unfair simply because it uses the medium of ridicule, provided it is not intemperate or malicious. Soane v. Knight, M. & M. 74, 22 E. C. L. 255, 31 Rev. Rep. 714.

It is not fair comment to publish false statements of facts, and therefore comment on a matter of public interest containing such false statements is not privileged even though it is made in the honest belief that they are true. Digby v. Financial News [1907] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 502; Morrison v. Belcher, 3 F. & F. (Eng.) 614; Crow's Nest Pass Coal Co. v. Bell, 4 Ont. L. Rep. 660; Sandwith v. Cowper, 4 Sask. L. Rep. 12, 17 West. L. Rep. 1; Dandurand v. La Publicite, 12 Que. Pr. 330; Lever v. Daily States Pub. Co. 123 La. 594, 49 So. 206, 131 Am. St. Rep. 356, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726; Perret v. New Orleans Times Newspaper, 25 La. Ann. 170; Sheckell v.

Jackson, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 25; Haynes v. Clinton Printing Co. 169 Mass. 512, 48 N. E. 275; Hubbard v. Allyn, 200 Mass. 166, 86 N. E. 356; Kelly v. Independent Pub. Co. 45 Mont. 127, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1063, 122 Pac. 735, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1160; Schwarz Bros. Co. v. Evening News Pub. Co. 84 N. J. L. 486, 87 Atl. 148; Hearst v. New Yorker Staats Zeitung, 71 Misc. 7, 129 N. Y. S. 1089; Fenstermaker v. Tribune Pub. Co. 13 Utah 532, 45 Pac. 1097, 35 L.R.A. 611. See also Clair v. Battle Creek Journal Co. 168 Mich. 467, 134 N. W. 443; Butler v. News-Leader Co. 104 Va. 1, 51 S. E. 213. In Hubbard v. Allyn, supra, the court said: "The right of the defendant was not to make false statements of fact because the subject-matter was of public interest, but only to criticise, discuss and comment upon the real acts of the plaintiff and the consequences likely to follow from them, or upon any other aspect of the case in a reasonable way. This may be done with severity. Ridicule, sarcasm and invective may be employed. But the basis must be a fact, and not a falsehood."

A false statement of fact made accidentally, through a typographical error, is nevertheless unfair comment although unintentionally made, and is not privileged. McLean v. New York Press Co. 64 Hun 639 mem. 19 N. Y. S. 62, wherein recovery was had for the publication in a newspaper of a map on which the plaintiff's house was marked as a disorderly house by mistake, the intention having been so to designate another house. The court said: "Therefore the public press may comment fully and freely upon all questions and matters of great public interest, provided they keep themselves within the limits of an honest intention to discharge a public duty. But in the case at bar the publishers of the newspaper did not believe that the house in question was a disorderly house. On the contrary, they say that they had no intention of referring to this house, but to some other house in the neighborhood. It has nowhere been decided, as yet, that where either an individual or a public newspaper, intending to refer to B, makes a slanderous attack upon A, it is a privileged communication. The plea of typographical error does not in any respect alter the situation. It may go to the question of exemplary damages; but, to the right of the plaintiff to recover, typographical errors form no answer. And this view of the case is strengthened when we consider the fact that as privileged communications are exceptions to the general rule, which implies malice in a libelous publication, it rests with the person claiming the privilege to show that the case comes within the exception."

It has been held, however, that where comment is made on such a matter of public interest as makes the comment conditionally privileged, the author or publisher is not held to prove the exact truth thereof and the soundness of its inferences, provided there are reasonable grounds for the inferences, and provided he is not actuated by express malice. Risk Allah Bey v. Whitehurst, 18 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 615; Crane v. Waters, 10 Fed. 619.

And it has been held that in order to find for the defendant on a question whether the alleged libel was privileged as fair comment on a matter of public interest, the jury need not find that the inferences of fact in the comment were strictly true, but must be satisfied not only that the defendant honestly believed them to be true but also that he had such fair grounds for his imputation that his inference was not reckless. Morrison v. Belcher, 3 F. & F. (Eng.) 614, wherein the alleged libel imputed to the plaintiff that he had taken money for a fraudulent exhibition of a "magic chrystal."

A comment is unfair, and is hence without privilege, if it goes further than the occasion or the acts commented on warrant, or if it makes unfair exaggerations. Ryan v. Wood, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 735; South Hetton Coal Co. v. Northeastern News Assoc. [1894] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 133, 58 J. P. 196, 63 L. J. Q. B. 293, 69 L. T. N. S. 844, 9 Rep. 240, 42 W. R. 322; Cooke v. O'Malley, 109 La. 382, 33 So. 377. In Ryan v. Wood, supra, it was held that, although a public writer would be privileged to comment in severe terms on a system whereby musical critics secure the services of eminent artists gratuitously, as tending to bias criticism, the privilege is lost by a publication which so far exceeds the occasion as to brand an individual critic as a charlatan, and to accuse him of blackmailing the artists of the musical profession into giving him their services by threats of adverse criticism. For the publication with which this case is concerned see infra, subdivision IV. 2, Words Held Actionable. The court said: "If it had simply stated that 'Mr. Ryan has acquired the office of public critic, he writes in journals of extensive circulation, he criticises the performance of musical artists at concerts or at operas, and he is in the habit year by year of inviting the leading artists to sing gratuitously at concerts for his own benefit, and such a system is calculated to prevent the possibility of his excuse of a fair, free, and impartial judgment upon their performances, or indirectly on those of others—for, from a natural sense of gratitude he will be disposed to be favorable to those who render him such gratuitous services, and there will be at least a danger of his writing favorably of those who do not do so; and granting that he does not intend to do that which is partial and corrupt, the system is bad; but it must tend to engender a partial disposition in his mind, and also to engender a suspicion in the profession, when its existence is known, that criticism is unjust, and that either the censure or the praise which is meted out is undeserved.' If the libel had been limited to observations of this kind, upon the character of the system and its probable consequences, no one could have complained of the spirit of the tone of the article. But, unfortunately in this instance, the writer has gone much further. He has not satisfied himself with pointing out the bad consequences of the system which the plaintiff has adopted, but he has imputed to him that he does, in fact, mete out his criticism, favorable or unfavorable, according as these services are rendered to him or not; and that by this means, through the influence of his criticisms upon those artists who dread them if they do not submit to his demands, he is enabled to levy 'blackmail' upon them, and thus to be a kind of 'highwayman of the press.' Such being the scope of the libel, it assumes, as I have said, a serious character."

As a general rule comment is fair only when it confines itself to things, or to the acts or conduct of persons, and comment going so far as to attack personal character, or to impute immoral or corrupt motives, is unfair and not privileged. Snyder v. Fulton, 34 Md. 128, 6 Am. Rep. 314; Curtis v. Mussey, 6 Gray (Mass.) 261; Barnes v. Campbell, 59 N. H. 128, 47 Am. Rep. 183. See also Kelly v. Independent Pub. Co. 45 Mont. 127, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1063, 122 Pac. 735, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1160. In Snyder v. Fulton, supra, the court said: "The proposition which they [the cases] maintain is, that any man, editor or private citizen, has a right honestly to discuss all matters of public interest, and to comment on and criticise fairly the public acts of official persons. Such a proposition we do not for a moment question. So far as the publication before us was confined to the statement of the riotous and violent assaults upon passengers, and reflected upon the delinquency of the police authorities and other officials, if made in good faith and upon reasonable grounds of information, the case comes within well-recognized principles, and the publication is, to that extent, privileged. But such privilege does not extend to the right of charging the plaintiff, a private citizen, with having been in collusion with the ruffians and wrongdoers, and aiding them in selecting the victims of their intended violence, by 'spotting the Republicans' for that purpose."

But it has been said that a personal attack may be a part of privileged fair comment on a matter of public interest if the facts as commented on are true, and if the personal attack can be reasonably inferred from those truly stated facts; and that whether it can be reasonably inferred from the facts is a question of law for the court, but that whether it should so be inferred is for the jury. Dakhyl v. Labouchere [1908] 2 K. B. 325 note, 96 L. T. N. S. 399, wherein the court said: "A personal attack may form part of a fair comment upon given facts truly stated if it be warranted by those facts; in other words, in my view, if it be a reasonable inference from those facts. Whether the personal attack in any given case can reasonably be inferred from the truly stated facts upon which it purports to be a comment is a matter of law for the determination of the judge before whom the case is tried, but if he should rule that this inference is capable of being reasonably drawn, it is for the jury to determine whether in that particular case it ought to be drawn."

It should be noticed, parenthetically, that these rules do not apply strictly to comments or criticism on persons who stand in a peculiarly public relation to their fellowmen. Cases as to public officers have not been included, not being within the scope of this note. For cases regarding some other classes of public persons see infra, subdivision III. 1, Comment on Public Person.

Comment cannot be fair if it is made with express malice, to gratify the malice rather than the public interest. Marcotte v. Bolduc, 30 Quebec Super. Ct. 222.

Whether the limits of fair criticism have been transcended or whether the privileged occasion has been used for the utterance of a false and defamatory statement of fact present a question for the jury. Cooney v. Edeveain, 14 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 34; Jenner v. A'Beckett, L. R. 7 Q. B. 11, 41 L. J. Q. B. 14, 25 L. T. N. S. 464, 20 W. R. 181; South Hetton Coal Co. v. North Eastern News Assoc. [1894] 1 Q. B. 133, 58 J. P. 196, 63 L. J. Q. B. 293, 69 L. T. N. S. 844, 9 Rep. 240, 42 W. R. 322; Wilcocks v. Howell, 5 Ont. 360; Hearst v. New Yorker Staats Zeitung, 71 Misc. 7, 129 N. Y. S. 1089. But where the occasion has been used for the utterance of conceded misstatements of material facts, defamatory in character, the court should rule as a matter of law that the privilege of fair comment has been exceeded. Hearst v. New Yorker Staats Zeitung, 71 Misc. 7, 129 N. Y. S. 1089.

4. NEWSPAPER COMMENT.

It is well settled that a newspaper or other printed publication has, as such, no peculiar privilege in commenting on matters of public interest. It has no greater privilege with respect to such comment than has any private person. Commercial Pub. Co. v. Smith, 149 Fed. 704, 79 C. C. A. 410; Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 606, 44 Pac. 241; Republican Pub. Co. v. Conroy, 5 Colo. App. 262, 38 Pac. 423; Delaware State, F. etc. Ins. Co. v. Croasdale, 6 Houst. (Del.) 181; Washington Herald Co. v. Berry, 41 App. Cas. (D. C.) Ann. Cas. 1917B.—27.

322; Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655; Ott v. Murphy, 160 Ia. 730, 739, 141 N. W. 463; Perret v. New Orleans Times Newspaper, 25 La. Ann. 170; Snyder v. Fulton, 34 Md. 128, 6 Am. Rep. 314; Sheckell v. Jackson, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 25; Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. 154 Mass. 238, 28 N. E. 1, 13 L.R.A. 97; Haynes v. Clinton Printing Co. 169 Mass. 512, 48 N. E. 275; McAllister v. Detroit Free Press Co. 76 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. 431, 15 Am. St. Rep. 318; Johnson v. St. Louis, Dispatch Co. 65 Mo. 539, 27 Am. Rep. 293; Arnold v. Star Sayings Co. 76 Mo. App. 159; Kelly v. Independent Pub. Co. 45 Mont. 127, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1063, 122 Pac. 735, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1160; Smart v. Blanchard, 42 N. H. 137; Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605; Barnes v. Campbell, 59 N. H. 128, 47 Am. Rep. 183; Schwarz Bros. Co. v. Evening News Pub. Co. 84 N. J. L. 486, 87 Atl. 148. See also Dexter v. Spear, 4 Mason 115, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,867. In McAllister v. Detroit Free Press Co. supra, the court said: "Nor was any care shown by the newspaper. It was, as far as the record shows, published as handed in by the reporter, without thought of verification. It is argued that a newspaper in this day and age of the world, when people are hungry for the news, and almost every person is a newspaper reader, must be allowed some latitude and more privilege than is ordinarily given under the law of libel as it has heretofore been understood. In other words, because the world is thirsting for criminal items, and the libel in a newspaper is more far-reaching and wide-spread than it used to be when tales were only spread by the mouth, or through the medium of books or letters, there should be given greater immunity to gossip in the newspaper, although the harm to the person injured is infinitely greater than it would be if published otherwise. The greater the circulation the greater the wrong, and the more reason why greater care should be exercised in the publication of personal items. No newspaper has any right to trifle with the reputation of any citizen, or by carelessness or recklessness to injure his good name and fame or business. And the reporter of a newspaper has no more right to collect the stories on the street, or even to gather information from policemen or magistrates out of court, about a citizen, and to his detriment, and publish such stories and information as facts in a newspaper, than has a person not connected with a newspaper to whisper from ear to ear the gossip and scandal of the street. If true, such publication or such speaking may be privileged, but if false, the newspaper as well as the citizen must be responsible to any one who is wronged and damaged thereby."

A defamatory publication in a public journal cannot be said to have been privileged simply because it related to a subject-matter of public interest, and was published in good faith, without malice, and from laudable motives; but, while there is in such a case no privilege which will require proof of express malice by the plaintiff, the publisher, in order to rebut the presumption of malice, should be allowed the fullest opportunity to show the circumstances under which the publication was made, the sources of information, and the motives which induced the publication. Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 363, wherein the court said: "Nor can a defamatory publication in a public journal be said to be privileged simply because it relates to a subject of public interest, and was published in good faith, without malice, and from laudable motives. No adjudicated case, that I am aware of, has ever gone so far. But whilst such publications cannot be deemed privileged, so as to require proof of express malice, the publisher, in order to rebut the presumption of malice, should be allowed the fullest opportunity to show the circumstances under which the publication was made, the sources of his information, and the motives which induced the publication. The public interest, and a due regard to the freedom of the press, demands that its conductors should not be mulcted in punitive damages for publications on subjects of public interest, made from laudable motives, after due inquiry as to the truth of the facts stated, and in the honest belief that they were true. On the other hand, if the rule were further relaxed, so that such publications in respect to private persons would be deemed privileged, thereby shifting the burden of proof from the defendant to the plaintiff, in respect to malice, there would be but little security for private character. It is easy for the publisher to show the circumstances under which the publication was made, the sources of his information, and the motives for the publication, and thus to rebut the presumption of malice. But if the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, it would often, and perhaps generally, be very difficult, if not impossible, to prove express malice. I think the present rule, which allows to the publisher the fullest opportunity to rebut the presumption of malice, secures to him all the protection which is consistent with a due regard to the safety of private character."

The publication of defamatory matter by a newspaper is not privileged by reason of the fact that it is copied from another publication, or that it comes through the regular channels of news collection, without any notice of its falsity, and the newspaper publishing it is liable in damages to the person libeled, in the absence of other justification. Edwards v. Kansas City Times Co. 32 Fed. 813; Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 606, 44 Pac. 241; Morse v. Times-

Republican Printing Co. 124 Ia. 707, 100 N. W. 867; Haynes v. Clinton Printing Co. 169 Mass. 512, 48 N. E. 275. See also Long v. Tribune Printing Co. 107 Mich. 207, 65 N. W. 108; Auburn v. Berthiaume, 23 Quebec Super. Ct. 476.

Nor is its publication justified by reason of the fact that it is published not as news but as a paid advertisement. Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655; Perret v. New Orleans Times Newspaper, 25 La. Ann. 170. In the case first cited, the court said: "A newspaper is a great power. There will doubtless appear no greater factor in the progress and development of our common country. Some men owe to the press the respect they exhibit for religion and morality; they fear its lash. The newspaper should discriminate; upon its lofty pedestal it should command respect for its high-toned thought, its justice, its conservatism and its moderation. The press should be free; it should not be deterred from its legitimate work. It leads thought; it moulds public opinion; it thinks for the people. Some men have illustrated this great calling; they have appreciated its duties and obligations; they have lent an ear to the right; their endeavors have kept time to the needs and necessities of the great millions who exemplify the virtue, religion and morality of this country. The man that sits in this high place, athirst for greed and gain, whose opinions depend upon the amount of money he gets in his wallet, who attacks private character when he is paid to do so, is a usurper and a public enemy. As well might Judas Iscariot exhibit the price of his perfidy as an excuse for his crime, as for a libeller to set up that he published the libel complained of for money."

But, although not a justification, the manner of acquirement and publication of the item, as that it was copied bona fide from another newspaper, may be considered in mitigation of the damages. Edwards v. Kansas City Times Co. 32 Fed. 813.

Where one assails another in the public press, the assailant impliedly invites the person attacked to answer to the public, and this answer is privileged. Wilson v. Deane, 3 Alberta L. Rep. 186, wherein it was said: "Where one assails another in the public press, the assailant impliedly invites the person attacked to answer to the public who then acquire an interest in contemplation of law, in the subject-matter of the original communication, and this constitutes a privileged occasion such as to constitute a defense if the person attacked confines himself to vindicating honestly and without malice his conduct or character though incidentally he may reflect upon that of his assailant."

And where one procures the publication in a newspaper of articles commendatory and laudatory of himself, he subjects himself to fair criticism by other newspaper writers, which criticism is privileged if fair and without malice. Thompson v. Matthiasen, 150 App. Div. 739, 135 N. Y. S. 796.

It is not fair comment for a newspaper to publish statements without having made an adequate effort to discover whether they are false or true, and comment published under such circumstances is not privileged. Ingram v. Reed, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 550, 41 W. N. C. 123; Auburn v. Berthiaume, 23 Quebec Super. Ct. 476. In the case last cited it appeared that a false report implicating the plaintiff, an entirely innocent person, in the commission of a murder had been published by the defendant's newspaper without any inquiry. Holding that the defendant was liable in substantial damages, the court said: "A person in Quebec told some newspaper men, who, in turn, told defendant's correspondent, that he, the informant, had received from plaintiff a despatch, stating that the latter had been arrested, charged with being implicated in the crime in question. Having received this information and seeing that a Quebec paper was also publishing it, defendant's correspondent, without a word of further inquiry, without ever seeing the original informant (who, as has been said, subsequently denied having given the information, though it is fair to state it is proved he did give it) still less asking to see the alleged despatch, rushed the news off to Montreal for publication. As he tells us himself, this was all done 'à la course.' His, to himself at least, all sufficient justification for this highly reprehensible conduct is, that he got the news at the last moment, that if he did not send it on at once it would be too late for that day's issue of defendant's paper. When the despatch arrived here, it was at once printed and published. No pretense of inquiry was made. The same justification is offered. It was the last moment before the 'forms' of the day's papers were closed. If this defamatory, and, as it proved, absolutely mendacious item of news, this 'brutale rumeur,' as defendant's editor himself calls it, when he finds it necessary to apologize, was not published at once, there might actually elapse another twenty-four hours before it could be served up to the readers of defendant's paper. Under these circumstances defendant's witnesses and employees evidently consider that no one could expect them to stop to inquire. A trifle such as the possible ruin of an innocent man's reputation, of course weighs nothing in the balance, when against it is the desire of being first in the field with a 'sensational' bit of news."

The immunity granted to newspaper comment on matters of public interest does not extend to publications made maliciously, to gratify a personal malice or vengeance.

Filiatrault v. La Patrie, 28 Quebec Super. Ct. 380; Marcotte v. Bolduc, 30 Quebec Super. Ct. 222. In the case last cited the court said that the law permits the publishing in public journals of all the facts it can be within public interest to become acquainted with, however damaging they may be to any person, but that this is on condition that they are published exclusively with the aim of being useful to the public, and not with the aim of satisfying the vengeance or malice of him who publishes them.

As to newspaper comment in particular classes of cases, see the following subdivision.

III. Application to Particular Occasions.

1. COMMENT ON PUBLIC PERSON.

a. In General.

Comments on the acts of persons who stand in such a relation to the public or to public affairs that their acts affect, or are of interest to, the general public, are accorded a defensible immunity or qualified privilege within the rules hereinbefore set forth. Mangena v. Wright [1909] 2 K. B. 958, 78 L. J. K. B. 879, 100 L. T. N. S. 960, 53 Sol. J. 485, 25 Times L. Rep. 534; Macdonell v. Robinson, 12 Ont. App. 270; Reg. v. Brazeau, 3 Can. Crim. Cas. 89; Crane v. Waters, 10 Fed. 619; Crane v. Boston Advertiser, 13 Rep. 650, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,352a. And see the reported case. In Mangena v. Wright, supra, it was held that comment by a public officer on the conduct of one who had made himself of public interest by agitations in a rebellious colony, the comment being based on facts appearing in a parliamentary report, was privileged. The court said, per Phillimore, J.: "It is admitted by the defendant that there is no case where the privilege has been put exactly in the way in which he seeks to put it. This publication may be considered as a communication by a person having a social or public duty, the agent-general for Natal having a duty to communicate, in the interest of the colony which he represents and of union and harmony between it and the mother country, facts concerning the career of one who comes from Natal or its neighborhood and is not known in England, and who is interposing in England between the government of Natal and the government of the mother country. Or it may be considered as a communication by a person having a common interest to others having a like interest even though the community of interest is one shared with all the subjects of the King or all those in the mother country. If it is a public matter and one concerning a man taking for the time a public part, I think this may be so. It may come within the language cited by Lopes, L. J., when delivering the judgment of the court in Allbutt v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration (1): 'The publication of a matter of a public nature and of public interest and for public information was privileged, provided it was published with the honest desire to afford the public information and with no sinister motive.' I think that, at any rate where the communication is made by a public servant as to a matter within his province, it may be the subject of privilege in him, and if in him, then in The Times, because Sir William Arbuckle could only make the communication through some such medium. I think, therefore, that the defendant may go to trial upon this and the other pleas."

In Crane v. Waters, 10 Fed. 619, 13 Rep. 650, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,352a, it was held that a constructor and manager of railroads was a public person within this rule. The case involved the liability of a newspaper for an article intimating that the plaintiff intended to secure control of certain railroads by bringing them to bankruptcy and then buying them in. The court said: "The modern doctrine, as shown by the cases cited for the defendants, appears to be that the public has a right to discuss, in good faith, the public conduct and qualifications of a public man, such as a judge, an ambassador, etc., with more freedom than they can take with a private matter, or with the private conduct of any one. In such discussions they are not held to prove the exact truth of their statements, and the soundness of their inferences, provided that they are not actuated by express malice, and that there is reasonable ground for their statements or inferences, all of which is for the jury. . . . Some of the affairs of a railroad company are public and some are private. For instance, the honesty of a clerk or servant in the office of the company is a matter for the clerk and the company only. The safety of a bridge on the line is a subject of public moment. The public, in this sense, is a number of persons who are or will be interested, and yet who are at present unascertainable. All the future passengers on the road are the public, in respect to the safety of the bridge, and as they cannot be pointed out, you may discuss the construction of the bridge in public, though you thereby reflect upon the character of the builder. . . . Perhaps the right of legislative interference may be taken as a fair test of the right of public discussion, since they both depend upon the same condition. The legislature cannot interfere in the purely private affairs of a company, but it may control such of them as affect the public. It cannot be doubted, I apprehend, that the legislatures of Connecticut and Massachusetts would have power to permit or to prohibit or to modify a scheme such as is now in question. It interests the public, consisting of the unascertained persons who will be asked to take shares in it, and those through whose land it will pass or whose business will be helped or hindered by it, that such a line should be well, and even that it should be honestly, laid out, built, and carried through. For this reason the character of the plaintiff, as a constructor and manager of railroads, seems to me to be open to public discussion when he comes forward with so great and important a project affecting many interests besides those of the shareholders of one road; and that, therefore, the defendants, or any other persons, have the qualified privilege which attaches to discussions of public affairs. The distinction is this: that when a railroad is to be built, or a company to build it is to be chartered, the question whether it shall be authorized is a public one; when the company is organized and the stock is issued, anything which merely affects the value of the stock is private."

But the qualified privilege of commenting on the acts of a public man does not extend to the justification of a distinct false charge of crime, made against such a man, even though made in good faith and with an honest motive. Smith v. Tribune Co. 4 Biss. 477, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,118, wherein it was said: "It is not an answer to that to say that he is a public man; that he affects to be an educator of the youth of the nation, and that the defendants are the publishers of a newspaper, and that they can criticise his acts in the way that the declaration alleges that they did. Undoubtedly they can criticise his acts. They can hold him up to ridicule so far as they are justified in doing so by his public acts, by anything that he has done or said, but they have no right in doing so to make a distinct charge against him that he has committed a crime, and that, in order to avoid the consequences of it, he has feigned insanity. That would be allowing the license of a public journalist to go further, I think, than any adjudicated case would warrant. We all desire the entire freedom of the press, but it has never been understood as authorizing the bringing of charges against a man of his having committed a crime, unless those charges were true."

There is no privileged occasion in defamatory comment on the private character of a private person, there being no proper public interest therein. Joynt v. Cycle Trade Pub. Co. [1904] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 292, 73 L. J. K. B. 752, 91 L. T. N. S. 155; Farmer v. Hamilton Tribune Printing, etc. Co. 3 Ont. 538; Morse v. Times Republican Printing Co. 124 Ia. 707, 100 N. W. 867; Harriman v. New Nonpareil Co. 132 Ia. 616, 110 N. W. 33; Tryon v. Evening News Ass'n, 39 Mich. 636;

Allen v. Pioneer Press Co. 40 Minn. 117, 41 N. W. 936, 12 Am. St. Rep. 707, 3 L.R.A. 532; Trebby v. Transcript Pub. Co. 74 Minn. 84, 76 N. W. 961, 73 Am. St. Rep. 330; Pfister v. Milwaukee Free Press Co. 139 Wis. 627, 121 N. W. 938.

b. Educator or Teacher.

Where a person holds himself out as the head of a school for the instruction of the youth, he lays himself open to fair comment on his school as a public institution and a matter of public interest, and such comment is privileged if fair and without express malice. Press Co. v. Stewart, 119 Pa. St. 584, 14 Atl. 51, wherein the court stated the facts as follows: "The plaintiff brought an action on the case against the defendant below, The Press Company, Limited, to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel in 'The Press,' a daily paper of the city of Philadelphia. The plaintiff had leased rooms in the vicinity of Thirteenth and Market streets, and fitted them up as a school for clerks, salesmen, and reporters, and he professed to be a teacher of shorthand writing, typewriting, and phono-scribing. The outside of his rooms appears to have been alluringly placarded with signs, and various devices in the way of circulars were scattered broadcast in the community calling attention to the merits of his system, and urging the young to engage with him as pupils. It must be conceded that some of these circulars were of a very extravagant nature. It so happened that the attention of the city editor of The Press was attracted by the peculiarity of the plaintiff's signs, and he detailed a reporter upon the staff of that paper to visit the establishment and ascertain its character. He did so, and The Press next day contained the report of the interview. It is this report which forms the subject of the alleged libel." Holding the article to be privileged the court said: "We are of opinion that the article in question is privileged, not absolutely but in a qualified sense; in that sense, however, which makes it the duty of the court to instruct the jury that it is privileged, and that because of such privilege no presumption of malice arises from the mere fact of publication, but malice must be proved as a fact in the cause before the plaintiff can recover. If we are asked why this article is so privileged, I answer, because it was proper for public information. This plaintiff was holding himself out to the world as a teacher and guide of youth; he was seeking to attract them to his place by signs, placards, and advertisements, some of them at least of an extraordinary nature. This gave him a quasi-public character. Whether he was a proper person to instruct the young, and whether his school was a proper place for them to receive instruction, were matters of importance to the public, and The Press was in the strict line of its duty when it sought such information and gave it to the public. And if that information tended to show that the plaintiff was a charlatan and his system an imposture, the more need that the public, and especially parents and guardians, should be informed of it. Aside from this we do not regard the article as a libel. At most it is a harmless bit of pleasantry in which the reporter has succeeded in making himself somewhat ridiculous. The matter has been very much magnified and an importance attached to it which it does not deserve. An actionable libel cannot be created out of nothing."

The head of a college is such a public man that bona fide comment on his moral character, based on sufficient justification, is not actionable. Lebreton v. Elie, 31 L. C. Jur. 54, wherein the plaintiff sued to recover as for libel for statements made of him by the defendant, a taxpayer, urging that the plaintiff should be discharged as head of a college because of his immoral character. The court said that considering the shamelessness which the plaintiff had been proved to have shown on the subject of the animals of his farm and their reproduction, his lack of respect for pregnant and confined women, the licentious conversations which he held frequently, not to say habitually, conversations which would be shocking in the mouth of a layman but which become revolting in that of a clergyman and educator of the youth, these facts, which had spread rapidly in the public of La Baie and had been related to the defendant, constituted for the defendant in his capacity as the father of a family and a taxpayer a valid reason for opposing the engaging of the plaintiff by the commissioners of schools and justified him in saying in support of his opposition that which he had said against the plaintiff.

The character of a school teacher is of vital interest to the public, and comment on the character of a teacher by patrons of the school or other citizens, seeking the removal of, or to prevent the appointment of, that teacher, is conditionally privileged. Hoover v. Jordan, 27 Colo. App. 515, 150 Pac. 333; Tanner v. Stevenson, 138 Ky. 578, 128 S. W. 878, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 200; Spears v. McCoy, 155 Ky. 1, 159 S. W. 610, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1033; Malone v. Carrico, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 155; Wieman v. Mabey, 45 Mich. 484, 8 N. W. 71, 40 Am. Rep. 477; Harwood v. Keech, 4 Hun (N. Y.) 389; Decker v. Gaylord, 35 Hun (N. Y.) 584; Nolan v. Kane, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 520; McIntire v. McBean, 13 U. C. Q. B. 534. See also Vallery v. State, 42 Neb. 123, 60 N. W. 347. In Tanner v. Stevenson, supra, the court said: "Considering the case, then from the standpoint that Tanner was acting merely in his capacity as a good citizen, interested in the welfare of the public schools of the state, let us see what his rights and privileges were. Upon this point we are of the opinion that he or any other good citizen of the state who has knowledge affecting the moral character of an applicant for a teacher's certificate may in good faith, based upon reasonable information, communicate what he knows to the person or board to whom the application is made or convey it to trustees who contemplate employing the person in the public schools, and in so doing he will be protected, unless it can be shown that he was actuated by express malice. This privilege finds ample support in the conviction that it is of the highest importance to the youth of the state who attend the public schools that their teachers shall be persons of good moral character. A person not of good moral character, holding the close and confidential relations to children that teachers do, has opportunities without number to poison the mind of the child at its most impressionable age and make a lasting influence for evil upon those put under their care. Outside of the home there is no person who has so much to do with inculcating in young minds sentiments of virtue and honor as the teacher. The state is deeply interested in the moral training and education of all her children, and is vitally concerned that they shall be brought up under clean and good influences, so that they will grow into men and women with pure ideals and high aspirations. In the welfare and usefulness of the common school system every citizen of the state should be personally interested. Whatever hurts the system in one place in the state injures it in a more or less degree in all other parts of the state. It is a piece of machinery in which every individual in the state is a part. . . . And so any good citizen, in good faith and upon reasonable grounds to believe that what he writes or speaks is true, if free from malice or ill will and actuated solely by his interest in the common schools, may safely bring to the notice of those who hold any place as officials in the system any information that will enable them to perform with more efficiency their duties, and he will be protected as coming within the scope of qualified privilege, although the communication may be false as well as prima facie libelous. But if the person making the publication is prompted by actual malice or ill will towards the person concerning whom it is written or spoken, then the fact that it was believed to be true, or the fact that it was made in good faith, or the fact that it was made under circumstances that except for this notice would make it privileged, will not be allowed to save the person making the publication from the consequences of his act." In McIntire v.

McBean, 13 U. C. Q. B. 534, it was said: "We look upon this case as one of very great importance in a public point of view. Nothing can be of more consequence to the community than that the teachers of youth should be men of temperate habits, and in other respects of good moral character. We know that there is a disposition in many people to be indulgent in the notice they choose to take of the vice of intemperance, so long as the person subject to the habit keeps within any tolerable bounds. Men are seen to be employed and trusted in almost every description of business who are notoriously intemperate, provided they have so much control over themselves as to be sober at times. Whether this disposition to overlook what is something worse than mere infirmity be fortunate or unfortunate, there is one thing very clear, that the instructors of youth in our public schools are required by positive law to be men of strictly temperate habits and good moral character; and no one who thinks at all upon the subject can doubt that it may have a most pernicious effect upon the character of young persons, if they see a person who is in authority over them, and to whom they look up for instruction and example, intoxicated in school while he is in discharge of his duty, and scarcely less pernicious as an example if they should see him habitually intoxicated while he is out of school, for in either case it must be destructive of discipline, by diminishing their respect for their master. One cannot but admit most readily that the parents of any children who have the misfortune to be placed under such a teacher, or any other of the inhabitants of the school division who are rated to the support of the school, are doing a commendable thing when without loss of time they bring any such case under the notice of the proper authority, in order that the public evil may be redressed; and if, under an erroneous impression, they should happen to address their complaint to the wrong quarter, they are safe from any prosecution at the instance of the party of whom they are complaining, so long as it appears that the representation was well founded, or that they had good reason to believe it was, and that they acted in sincerity and good faith, not maliciously and without just cause or excuse. We do not wish it indeed to be understood that any inhabitant of the province, even though he should have no interest in that particular school district, would not be regarded as privileged in making a communication of this nature to the proper quarter, if done in a proper spirit, and for the purpose of preventing a public evil. It is not necessary, however, to go into that question."

This privilege applies to a petition for the removal of a school trustee. Morah v. Steele, 157 App. Div. 109, 141 N. Y. S. 868.

And the qualified privilege likewise attaches to comment on the character of a teacher, by a superior or superintendent or by a member of the school board, made in an official connection. Barry v. McCollom, 81 Conn. 293, 70 Atl. 1035, 129 Am. St. Rep. 215; Rausch v. Anderson, 75 Ill. App. 526; Henry v. Moberly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981, second appeal 23 Ind. App. 305, 51 N. E. 497; Finley v. Steele, 159 Mo. 299, 60 S. W. 108, 52 L.R.A. 852, Galligan v. Kelly, 31 N. Y. S. 561, 64 N. Y. St. Rep. 197. See also Barth v. Hanna, 158 Ill. App. 20.

But there is no privilege to attack the character of a school teacher and to publish the attack to the community in general. Harwood v. Keech, 4 Hun (N. Y.) 389.

c. Other Classes of Persons.

If an employer of workmen causes to be printed articles which picture him as a model employer and a benefactor toward his employees, he so brings himself into public attention that he becomes not only the object of the commendation which he seeks, but of criticism and adverse comment, and such comment is not actionable if fair and based on facts substantially true. Reg. v. Brazeau, 3 Can. Crim. Cas. (Quebec) 89.

The manager of an opera company is such a public man that his acts in the conduct of the company may be subjected to fair comment which will be privileged, only in so far, however, as it confines itself to the acts of the manager, but will not be privileged if it goes further and attacks his private character and motives. Fry v. Bennett, 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 54.

But an officer in a private mining company is not such a public man as to bring comment on his acts within the foregoing rule. Edwards v. San Jose Printing, etc. Soc. 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70.

And an insurance agent is not one in whom and in whose character there is such a public interest as will give a privilege to comment on him. Morse v. Times-Republican Printing Co. 124 Ia. 707, 100 N. W. 867, wherein the court said: "The utmost extent to which these cases go is that where a person, knowing or honestly believing that a candidate for public office is guilty of conduct affecting his fitness for the position to which he aspires, communicates that knowledge or belief to the electors whose support the candidate seeks, acting in good faith in the discharge of his duty to the public, the communication is privileged—a doctrine the correctness of which we need not now consider. But there is no moral or legal duty resting upon any person to publish to the world defamatory matter affecting the character or reputation of one whose only relation to the public is that of a private citizen in the pursuit of a lawful private business; and if one assumes the responsibility of proclaiming such matter from the housetops, or through the public print, the law affords him no defense except upon proof of the truth of the publication. An insurance agent as such is not a public officer, nor is his character a matter of general public interest, except as the public has an indirect interest in the private character and conduct of every member of society, but this interest is not sufficient to invoke the privilege of which we are speaking. To hold otherwise would be to destroy at one sweep the effectiveness of all law against slander and libel."

A physician is not, by reason of the public nature of his profession, such a public person that his character and abilities may be subjected to comment as a matter of public interest. Sandwich v. Cowper, 4 Sask. L. Rep. 12, 17 West. L. Rep. 1; Rood v. Dutcher, 23 S. D. 70, 20 Ann. Cas. 480, 120 N. W. 772. See also Marcotte v. Bolduc, 30 Quebec Super. Ct. 222. And he does not become a public person within the law of fair comment, simply because he advertises himself as a specialist in the treatment of certain diseases. Rood v. Dutcher, 23 S. D. 70, 120 N. W. 772, 20 Ann. Cas. 480, wherein the court said: "However, the more important question is whether newspaper articles concerning the professional conduct of a practicing physician should be regarded as privileged communications merely because of the relation of the physician as such to the general public in the territory to which his practice extends. So far as applicable to this question, a privileged communication is defined by our civil code to be one 'made, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent.' Rev. Civ. Code, § 31. This court has held that this definition embraces newspaper articles relating to the official conduct of public officers and candidates for public office. Boucher v. Clark Pub. Co. 14 S. D. 72, 84 N. W. 237; Myers v. Longstaff, 14 S. D. 98, 84 N. W. 233; Ross v. Wood, [14 S. D. 240, 85 N. W. 182, 86 Am. St. Rep. 746]. Does it also embrace newspaper articles relating to the professional conduct of physicians? We think not. The relation of a public officer to the public is substantially different from that of the physician. All are or may be affected by the official conduct of the former, and therefore are interested in any communication in relation thereto, while only such persons as desire to employ the latter are interested in communications relating to his professional conduct. Hence neither the proprietor of a newspaper nor any other person owes any duty to give information concerning the same unless requested to do so by someone desiring to employ the physician. Indeed, no reason exists for extending the presumption of innocent motive to false statements regarding a physician which would not apply with equal force to a minister of the Gospel, an attorney at law, a banker, merchant, or other person whose vocation involves voluntary transactions with people generally in the community in which such person resides. Therefore the article involved in the case at bar should not have been regarded as a privileged communication, and the circuit court's instructions on the subject clearly were erroneous."

2. COMMENT ON CRIME OR CRIMINAL CHARGE.

a. In General.

It is within the qualified privilege of a newspaper to publish in good faith as current news all such matters as involve open violation of law or public misconduct such as justifies police interference, and matters in connection with and in aid of the prosecution of inquiries regarding the commission of a crime, even though the publication may reflect on the actors and tend to bring them into public disgrace or contempt. Washington Post Co. v. Wells, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 495; Tilles v. Pulitzer Pub. Co. 241 Mo. 609, 145 S. W. 1143; McGeary v. Leader Pub. Co. 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 35. In Tilles v. Pulitzer Pub. Co. supra, it was held that the defendant was privileged in publishing an article commenting on the violations of laws against race track gambling which at the time were of intense interest to the public, and in saying in that comment that "these men [race track bookmakers] are engaged in the commission of an open felony and the owners of the race track [the plaintiff and others] are equally guilty with the bookmakers under the statute." The court said: "Defendant contends that the matter published is privileged. It is urged that action was being taken by both the executive and legal departments of the state against the conduct of the Delmar Jockey Club. That the whole matter was of extreme public interest and for that reason the defendant was justified in publishing what the governor and attorney general said about the situation. To our mind there is much substance in this contention. The law under which the plaintiff and others, through the corporate entity of the Delmar Jockey Club, had been acting, had been repealed. Its repeal was effective June 16, 1905. It would seem that the Delmar Jockey Club was loath to give up the privileges and emoluments theretofore enjoyed. The situation had become so acute that the governor of the state had publicly indicated that the militia of the state would be used to suppress gambling, if such existed at the Delmar race track. Not only so, but the governor had called upon the attorney general and held conference with him as to the enforcement of the law. It was upon an occasion of this kind that the article was published. The article truthfully represents the expression of the governor and also the expressions of the attorney general. Some quibble is made that the language quoted from Attorney General Hadley is not his language, but the evidence shows that it is substantially reported as by that official stated. The evidence discloses that the place at the race track would accommodate five thousand or more people and that it was generally filled. These visitors no doubt were from all parts of the state, as well as from other states. The governor of the state had investigated the facts and the attorney general and his assistant had likewise investigated the same. Conferences between these officials were being held, and contemplated action was pending. The public press had been for some time discussing conditions at Delmar race track. If the law was being violated, and gambling permitted, the public had an interest in knowing the facts. If contemplated action of any kind affecting this place of public amusement was about to be taken the public was entitled to know of such contemplated action. . . . Under these circumstances, we think that there was a privilege or at least a qualified privilege in the publication of the article containing this opinion of the chief law officer of the state."

A newspaper is privileged to publish the actual facts as to the commission of a crime, and the facts as to the arrest and charges made against a person suspected of the crime, provided the article does not go farther than a mere report of the news by making charges, directly, or by inference, insinuation, or assumption, that the person arrested is guilty of the crime. Whitney v. Janesville Gazette, 5 Biss. 330, 5 Chicago Leg. N. 469, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17, 590; McClure v. Review Pub. Co. 38 Wash. 160, 80 Pac. 303. But if the account goes beyond a mere narration of the transaction recounted and makes injurious reflections on the private or business character of a party to the transaction, it is actionable, if untrue. Whitney v. Janesville Gazette, 5 Biss. 330, 5 Chicago Leg. N. 469, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17, 590. In McClure v. Review Pub. Co. 38 Wash. 160, 80 Pac. 303, an action for libel alleged to be contained in a newspaper report of the arrest of the plaintiff on a charge of burglary, the plaintiff having been afterwards released on failure of proof that she was the person wanted, the court said: "It would be profitless to enter into a minute analysis of any or all of these articles. The law of libel is well understood. The only question to be determined is whether there has been a sufficient charge of crime here to constitute the articles libelous. It will be seen, by a perusal of the articles, that there was no statement on the part of the newspapers of whether or not the said plaintiff was guilty of the crime with which she was charged; nothing which can be construed as imputing to her the commission of the crime; but that it only purported to be a statement of the acts and theories and representations of the officers of the law in relation to the pursuit, arrest, trial, and acquittal of the plaintiff; and while undoubtedly certain expressions in each of the publications, if construed without relation to the rest of the articles in which they appear, would be libelous, yet, if construed as they must be with reference to the whole text, the libelous character cannot be established. The articles are undoubtedly qualifiedly privileged. That being true, they are not libelous per se, and no express malice being alleged, and there being nothing in the articles themselves, or in the circumstances surrounding their publication, to indicate malice—the desire evidently being only to publish sensational news in a sensational and somewhat flamboyant and embellished style, the publishers are not legally responsible in damages.”

This privilege, however, does not extend to the gratuitous dragging in of the name of one not charged with the crime, Washington Post Co. v. Wells, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 495; or to the repeating of pure suspicions connecting the name of a person with the commission of a crime, Haynes v. Clinton Printing Co. 169 Mass. 512, 48 N. E. 275; or to garbled extracts and false reports, Arnold v. Star Sayings Co. 76 Mo. App. 159.

When a newspaper publishes an article as current news charging that a person has been arrested for, or in connection with, an indictable offense, in addition to showing that the matter was one of public interest and that it therefore had one element of qualified privilege, the newspaper must further show that there was reasonable or probable cause for the charge. McGeary v. Leader Pub. Co. 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 35, wherein the action was based on a news item imputing to the plaintiff the crime of kicking a pregnant woman causing the death of the unborn child. The court said: “So far as the question of privileged occasion is concerned, there is little difficulty. It is within the bounds of legitimate journalism for a newspaper to publish as current news all such matters as involve open violation of law or public misconduct of such character as justifies police interference, even though the doing so may reflect upon the actors and thus tend to bring them into public disgrace or contempt. . . . But in such case it is not enough that the occasion supplied on element of the immunity of privilege, and that that privilege was not exceeded by the manner of publication; it is still incumbent on the defendant to prove that he has reasonable or probable cause.”

Therefore, although a newspaper may chronicle and comment on the arrest of a person charged with crime, if to the fact of arrest and the fact of the charge there are added by way of comment words which amount to an accusation that the charge is true, or comment which assumes the guilt of the person arrested, by headlines or otherwise, the mere fact of the actual arrest on the charge stated is no justification for the words imputing guilt, and they are libelous and actionable. Commercial Pub. Co. v. Smith, 149 Fed. 704, 79 C. C. A. 410.

It is actionable libel for a newspaper to publish a news item falsely charging a person with the commission of crime, and such a publication is not privileged though it is made without express malice and in honest belief of its truth. Edwards v. Kansas City Times Co. 32 Fed. 813; Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 606, 44 Pac. 241; Republican Pub. Co. v. Conroy, 5 Colo. App. 262, 38 Pac. 423; Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655; Mallory v. Pioneer Press Co. 34 Minn. 521, 26 N. W. 904; Barnes v. Campbell, 59 N. H. 128, 47 Am. Rep. 183; Hearst v. New Yorker Staats Zeitung, 71 Misc. 7, 129 N. Y. S. 1089; McGeary v. Leader Pub. Co. 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 35; Democrat Pub. Co. v. Jones, 83 Tex. 302, 18 S. W. 652; Auburn v. Berthiaume, 23 Quebec Super. Ct. 476. In Cox v. Strickland, supra, it was held that a newspaper had no privilege to charge a person with being connected with acts of arson in the county on the ground that he had been accused of having been connected with such acts in another county. The court said: “The right to publish through the newspaper press such matters of interest as may be properly laid before the public does not go to the extent of allowing the publication concerning a person of false and defamatory matter, there being no other reason or justification for so doing than the mere publication of the news. But false assertions, when they impute the commission of crime, are actionable; and when not based upon any facts legally tending to prove the crime imputed, the publication cannot be said to be privileged. It will not do to say that such a publication was made with reasonable care, however good the motive may have been.” In Mallory v. Pioneer Press Co. 34 Minn. 521, 26 N. W. 904, the court said: “It is claimed that the publication was privileged because made in good faith, as an item of news, and also because it was in aid of legal proceedings for the arrest of a person charged with crime. Upon neither of the grounds thus suggested can the defense of privilege be sustained. The right to publish, through the newspaper press, such matters in interest as may be thus properly laid before the public, does not go to the extent of allowing the publication, concerning a person, of false and defamatory matter, there being no other reason or justification for doing so than merely the purpose to publish the news." In Hearst v. New Yorker Staats Zeitung, 71 Misc. 7, 129 N. Y. S. 1089, it was held that there was no privilege in a newspaper to publish a speech by a public officer in which the latter accused a newspaper owner of being a forger and falsifier although the facts on which the charge was made were fully set out and were not sufficient to constitute the crime of forgery.

Although there is a qualified privilege for a newspaper to comment on acts which amount to a public offense or crime, there is no such privilege to comment on the domestic occurrences of a private household, so long as they do not rise to the magnitude of crimes or breaches of the peace. Com. v. Murphy, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 399; Fenstermaker v. Tribune Pub. Co. 13 Utah 532, 45 Pac. 1097, 35 L.R.A. 611. In the case first cited, it was held that a newspaper article accusing a father of cruelty in the treatment of his seventeen-year old daughter was not privileged. The court said: "The subject-matter is not one proper for public information and discussion. Subjects that are proper for public information and discussion are only those in which the community has a public interest. The fact that a large number of people may have a private interest in the matter will not make it a matter proper for public investigation. If it were once admitted that every person, including those who publish newspapers, and who have not one particle more right than any other citizen, can penetrate into every man's house and family, and lay open to the public view the private griefs, passions, infelicities and dissensions, the petty wrongs and worriments of every household, then the public press, from being one of the strong supports of our liberties and brighteners of our homes, will become an instrument of oppression beyond any that has ever been known and will darken men's lives with constant dread of disgrace or public ridicule. Comment and disclosures upon such matters deserve no more respectable name than that of meddlesome gossip, utterly unjustifiable because it panders to a morbid curiosity of however great a number of persons. Nothing that happens in the privacy of a man's family, short of a crime, that calls for public interference, can justify the publicity of accusations or comment in the columns of a newspaper. The proper method of righting any minor wrong is by the legal course of information lodged with a magistrate whose duty it is to look after such matters. The father of a family has an undoubted right to dictate with whom his child shall associate and with whom not; and he has an undoubted right to enforce obedience to his orders by such discipline as he may, in his honest judgment, think necessary, whether it be by chastisement by corporal punishment, or by confinement to the house or a particular portion of the house. Whatever may be said of the good taste or propriety of whipping a girl between seventeen and eighteen years of age, the fact remains, that so long as she is under twenty-one, and in his family, he has the legal right, if he thinks necessary, in his honest judgment, to do it, and he can be called to account only where he abuses the right in a flagrant way." In Fenstermaker v. Tribune Pub. Co. 13 Utah 532, 45 Pac. 1097, 35 L.R.A. 611, it was held that a newspaper was not privileged to publish an article relating wholly to the private acts of a family, in the cruel treatment of a child, the court saying in the course of the opinion: "Counsel for the respondent upon the rehearing insisted that the article alleged by plaintiff to be libelous, and fully set forth in the former opinion, is of the class termed 'privileged publications,' and therefore no action for its publication can be maintained, in the absence of an allegation of malice in fact, and proof thereof. This point was not passed upon in the former opinion, and if tenable, it would be necessary to consider the nature and extent of the privilege, whether absolute or qualified, and the effect upon damages, whether to bar recovery entirely or otherwise. But it is unnecessary to decide these questions, for the reason that an extended examination of standard text books and of the cases on this branch of the law of privileged communications fails to reveal any authority for extending the doctrine relied upon to a case where the alleged libel is based upon charges against a private individual acting in a private capacity, or, as in this case, a family acting in private matters, notwithstanding that the public might have much interest in the publication as a matter of news. The publication in a newspaper of false and defamatory matter is not privileged because made in good faith as a matter of news."

b. Rule in Michigan.

The rule granting conditional privilege to bona fide comments made in the public interest in connection with the exposure of wrongdoing and crime, is not recognized in Michigan. Owen v. Dewey, 107 Mich. 67, 65 N. W. 8, wherein the court said: "The doctrine that the publication by a newspaper of false and defamatory matter respecting an individual may, by reason of public interest in the exposure of wrong doing and crime, be so far privileged as to relieve the publisher from responsibility, or that it is a sufficient answer, to an action based upon such publication, to prove that the publisher had reason to believe the allegations to be true, or that there was probable cause to believe them to be true, or that he, acting in good faith, supposed them to be true, has not been recognized in this state. On the contrary, it has repeatedly been held that publishers, in this class of cases, must be held responsible for the truth of what is published."

But, although in that state the circumstances of the publication, honesty of purpose, good faith, the sources of information and the reliability of such sources, and belief in the truth of the allegations made, will not give a qualified privilege, they are admissible as evidence to rebut the presumption of malice and to reduce the damages. Foster v. Scripps, 39 Mich. 376, 33 Am. Rep. 403; Owen v. Dewey, 107 Mich. 67, 65 N. W. 8. In Scripps v. Foster, 41 Mich. 742, 3 N. W. 216, the court said: "In this state it is the settled doctrine that in an action like the present, where the plaintiff seeks to recover exemplary damages, the defendant on the trial may introduce facts and circumstances tending to show that he acted in the matter complained of in good faith, and that after using all proper precaution he had good reason to believe that the facts as published were true. In considering the question of good faith and reasonable belief for the publication of such an article as the one complained of, evidence of the publication thereof, upon the assurance of a third person that the facts stated therein are true, when standing alone would not be so likely in many cases to carry conviction to the mind of the ordinary juror, as though accompanied by previous facts and circumstances pertaining to the same subject-matter, and the tendency of which led in the same direction. In many instances it would be very difficult indeed to satisfy a juror that a distinct wrong had been done by a particular individual, or that any one could have had reason to believe such a person capable of committing such an act, upon proof of the direct evidence relating thereto. The reputation of the individual complained of and the nature of the act charged may be sufficient to overcome what in the case of some other individual might be considered more convincing proof. And yet in either case, when considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the previous acts and utterances of the person charged would be sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt upon the subject."

It has been held in Michigan that there is no privilege, in comment, to make a false statement of fact imputing the commission of a crime. Maclean v. Scripps, 52 Mich. 214, 17 N. W. 815, 18 N. W. 209; Peoples v. Detroit Post, etc. Co. 54 Mich. 457, 20 N. W. 528; McAllister v. Detroit Free Press Co. 76 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. 431, 15 Am. St. Rep. 318; Owen v. Dewey, 107 Mich. 67, 65 N. W. 8. In Peoples v. Detroit Post, etc. Co. supra, it was held to be actionable libel to publish of the plaintiff that he had murdered a girl, that he had committed fornication with her, that he had had a confederate steal a sack to put the body in, that he had given his wife to understand that the girl had been murdered to get rid of her, and that his wife had left him because he confessed adultery. The court said: "There can be no question at this late day but the public newspaper has the right (whether it shall be regarded as its duty or not) to discuss those matters which relate to the life, habits, comfort, happiness and welfare of the people. In doing so it may state facts, draw its own inferences and give its own views upon the facts. It may err in its deductions, and if they are false they are not actionable unless special damages can be shown; but false assertions when they impute the commission of crime are actionable, and when not based upon any facts legally tending to prove the crime imputed the publication cannot be said to be privileged, and such I think is shown to be the case in this record so far as it is sought to connect the plaintiff with the alleged murder. It will not do to say that such a publication was made with reasonable care, however good the motive may have been. The public welfare never required any such reckless disregard of the sacred right of enjoyment of a pure and spotless reputation, which no amount of property can command and which it often takes its possessor a lifetime to secure." In McAllister v. Detroit Free Press Co. 76 Mich. 338, 43 N. W. 431, 15 Am. St. Rep. 318, an action was brought for libel alleged to be contained in the following two articles of news: "A week ago, it will be remembered that a safe was cracked in Bothwell, and that $2,000 in money and about $30 worth of stamps were stolen. Yesterday two hard-looking citizens canvassed the entire business part of Windsor, in the effort to sell stamps at half price. They at last tried to sell the stamps to Postmaster Wigle, who had them arrested. They were searched at the station, and upon one of them was found $30 worth of stamps. They gave their names as Edward H. McAllister and Lester B. French. Chief Bains will hold them to await developments." "Edward H. McAllister and Lester B. French, the men who were arrested on Saturday for trying to dispose of stamps at half price, have been released, as there was no evidence to show that they are the men who are wanted at Bothwell." It appeared that the articles were untrue in several particulars and the court held that there was no privilege, saying: "It requires but a glance to discover a vast difference between the actual facts of this transaction, and the story as published. A true account would have shown the arrest of two reputable American citizens for the offense of selling stamps without a license, discharged by the magistrate of such offense as soon as the complaint was read, because the postmaster was satisfied that they meant no intentional violation of the law, but kept by the chief of police of Windsor for three hours afterwards, and treated by him with gross indignity; that he had suspicions that they were connected with the Bothwell robbery, because of the stamps and gold coin found upon their persons, but he refused to let them communicate with their friends or counsel in Detroit, and did not release them until he was obliged to by the order of the magistrate, although he had learned that they were all right—in short, an inexcusable outrage by the chief of police upon honest men, guilty of no crime, and innocent of any intentional wrong. The publication shows a couple of tramps, trying at every business place in Windsor to sell postage stamps at half price, having the same amount in their possession that was stolen at Bothwell the week before. At last they try the postmaster, who has them arrested. 'Chief Bains will hold them to await developments.' Before or about the time it was handed to the city editor, who, it seems, took no steps to ascertain its truth, these men had been discharged; and, when it was being read by people on Sunday in the Free Press, French and the plaintiff were at home in Detroit, as free from any restraint of the law, and from any suspicion of wrongdoing, except for this article, as the reporter who wrote it. If it were not possible, as contended, that a true statement of the whole of the facts could have been published at that time, certainly a little inquiry on Monday afterwards by this same reporter might have set the matter aright. But it was a matter of so small consequence to him that 'it had slipped his mind,' and he contents himself with the statement of a patrolman on the streets of Windsor, and the paper on Tuesday has an item that French and the plaintiff have been discharged because there was no evidence that they were the men wanted at Bothwell. In other words, it is published, not that they were discharged because their innocence was established, which was the fact, but because the charge or suspicion that they were concerned in the Bothwell robbery was 'not proven.' If the reporter had contented himself with stating that these men had been arrested, and a complaint made against them for selling stamps without a license, and that the fact of their offering to sell the stamps, and having them in their possession when searched, led the chief of police to think that they might be connected with the Bothwell robbery, and that Chief Bains was holding them to await developments, it might have been privileged, although not true at the time it was published, and not the whole truth at any time, which the reporter had the means and opportunity to discover, but did not. But as the case stood, it was not privileged, and the only question for the jury was one of damages."

3. COMMENT ON OTHER MATTERS OF PUBLIC INTEREST.

The privilege of comment on matters of public interest extends to comment on property, as well as comment on the acts and conduct of persons, if the property is the subject of a public interest. Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 347; Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322. In the case first cited the alleged libel commented on certain statues purporting to have been exhumed from the Thames and to be antiquities, the comment declaring them to have been of recent fabrication. The court said: "But further, I am of opinion that this is no libel, for that it is protected by the privilege of fair discussion on a matter of public interest, it not appearing that it was malicious." In Gott v. Pulsifer, supra, the privilege was held to apply to an article published in a newspaper in humorous style purporting to expose as a hoax and fraud a colossal monument, the "Cardiff Giant," represented by its owner as being an antique.

The sanitary condition of cottages rented by the owners of a coal mining company to their workmen is a matter of public interest, and fair comment thereon is not actionable. South Hetton Coal Co. v. North Eastern News Assoc. [1894] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 133, 58 J. P. 196, 63 L. J. Q. B. 293, 69 L. T. N. S. 844, 9 Rep. 240, 42 W. R. 322.

A proposal to the admiralty regarding the conversion of an old wooden line of battle ships of the navy into iron-clad turret ships, being a proposal concerning a vital question of naval policy, is a matter of public interest and fair comment thereon is privileged. Henwood v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. P. (Eng.) 606, 41 L. J. C. P. 206, 26 L. T. N. S. 938, wherein it was said by Willes, J., writing for the majority of the court: "It was admitted at the trial, and upon the argument before this court, that the defendant acted in fact bona fide, and without malice; and no suggestion was made or evidence given of malice against the plaintiff at the admiralty or elsewhere; but it was insisted on the part of the plaintiff that the occasion was not a privileged one, and that, in spite of his honesty and the absence of malice, the defendant was nevertheless liable, because the statement complained of was calculated, or might be thought by a jury to be calculated, to throw doubt upon the plaintiff's previous experience in the particular line of naval architecture upon which he assumed to give advice, which doubt (so far as it is expressed) constitutes the whole sting of the expressions complained of in the controller's letter. And the plaintiff insisted that good faith and absence of malice, however they might affect the amount of damages, did not justify or excuse the prima facie libelous matter. The learned judge, Brett, J., however, nonsuited the plaintiff, not upon the ground that the defendant was the Queen's printer, nor that he had acted in the ordinary course of business, nor that he had authority from a public department, nor upon the ground that the report was to be presented to parliament, and would at all events become public in a few days—all which palliations would, as was argued, have been insufficient; but upon the ground that every man has a right to discuss freely, so long as he does it honestly and without malice, any subject in which the public are generally interested—to state his own views and to advance those of others for the consideration of all or any of those who have a common interest in the subject; and that, whilst he does so, he has a privilege attaching to such right of free discussion, of the same character which has been held to attach in numerous instances in which liberty of speech has been allowed upon grounds of public and social convenience, where the speaker or writer and the person or persons addressed have had a duty or interest in common, the existence of which it held to rebut the inference of malice. . . . The principle . . . is a universal one, that the public convenience is to be preferred to private interests, and that communications which the interest of society require to be unfettered may freely be made by persons acting honestly without actual malice, notwithstanding that they involved relevant comments condemnatory of individuals. . . . That decision necessarily involves the conclusion that the fair and honest discussion of or comments upon a matter of public interest is in point of law privileged, and that it is not the subject of an action, unless the plaintiff can establish malice."

Although one who makes a public exhibit of flowers in a floricultural show, making a bid for the award of prizes, subjects himself to fair comment and criticism on his exhibit the privilege so to comment does not extend to reflections on the personal character of the exhibitor. Green v. Chapman, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 92, 33 E. C. L. 288.

Whether, by petitioning the legislature to abolish quackery in the medical profession, the petitioner lays himself open to the shafts of comment on his petition, qualified privileged as discussing a matter of public interest, was left in doubt in the case of Dunne v. Anderson, 3 Bing. 88, 11 E. C. L. 43, 10 Moo. 407, R. & M. 287, 21 E. C. L. 440, 28 Rev. Rep. 591, wherein it was, however, held that whether such privilege exists or not, it does not extend to a matter which goes beyond the petition itself to attack the petitioner and accuse him of ignorance in his profession.

Where a medical practitioner inaugurates a wide campaign of advertisement claiming that he is possessed of a specific for the cure of a disease considered by the medical profession as quite incurable, his claims become a matter of public interest, and comment thereon is privileged if made honestly and in reasonable moderation, even though the language of the comment is vigorous. Hunter v. Sharpe, 3 F. & F. (Eng.) 983, 15 L. T. N. S. 421.

The efficacy of a widely advertised patent medicine is a legitimate subject of fair newspaper comment. Willis v. O'Connell, 231 Fed. 1004, wherein the court said: "Has not the defendant the right to question the efficacy of plaintiff's remedy—to expose it as a nostrum, if it be a nostrum? The plaintiff, on his side, informs us that he is spending large sums of money for advertising his remedy in the newspapers, and that he intends to continue this method for increasing the sale of the same. This he has a right to do, and the medicine may not be a nostrum; and it may be true that, if properly used in some cases, the medicine will prove of benefit to suffering men and women. In short, the plaintiff may be in every good sense rightfully earning such money; and the defendant may be endeavoring to injure, and may intend to continue to injure, the plaintiff in his right to accumulate a fortune by the sale of the medicine. But the plaintiff has questioned the right of the defendant to criticise the remedy, to make statements as to its therapeutic value; and the plaintiff has also questioned the right of the defendant to criticise the testimonials in laudation of his remedy, and, in connection with the criticisms of such laudations, to say something touching the personal history and habits of those who give such testimonials. May not a newspaper publisher expose, if he can, the plaintiff's medicine—if it be a quack medicine? May he not in good faith tell the public of the dishonesty and fraud practiced upon the public? Is there anything so sacred about proprietary medicines, or those who co-operate in a plan to further their sales and increase the profits of the vendor, that a newspaper man shall be required to cease publishing what he believes to be the truth, or cease to attack the business methods of medicine vendors, when and where he believes the co-operating testimonials, in the furtherance of the scheme to sell such medicine, are sinister and not founded in truth? I think he may do so, but within the limits of the law which prescribes penalties, civil and criminal, for libelous publications." Compare Patten v. Harper's Weekly Corp. 93 Misc. 368, 158 N. Y. S. 70.

The work of an architect is a matter of public interest, and fair comment thereon, however mistaken it may be in point of artistic taste, is not actionable unless it is intemperate or malicious. Soane v. Knight, M. & M. (Eng.) 74, 22 E. C. L. 255, 31 Rev. Rep. 714, wherein it was said: "This publication professes in substance to be a criticism on the architectural works of the plaintiff. On such works, as well as on literary productions, any man has a right to express his opinion, and however mistaken in point of taste that opinion may be, or however unfavorable to the merits of the author or artist, the person entertaining it is not precluded by law from its fair, reasonable, and temperate expression. It may be fairly and reasonably expressed, although through the medium of ridicule. In the present case the censure is certainly strong, nevertheless, if you think the criticism fair, reasonable, and temperate, although it may not be correct, the defendant will be entitled to your verdict; if you think it unfair and intemperate, and written with the intention and for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his profession, by imputing to him that he acts on absurd principles of art, you will find for the plaintiff."

The circulation and position of a newspaper are not matters of public interest, and a comment on the subject is not privileged if libelous. Latimers v. Western Morning News Co. 25 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 44.

The methods employed in a public solicitation of subscriptions for an entertainment is a matter of public interest, and fair comment on such methods is not actionable. Wiles v. Victoria Times Printing, etc. Co. 11 British Columbia 143.

A trade circular, given such wide publication that it becomes a matter of public interest, is a proper subject of comment by a rival trading company, especially where the circular is written with particular reference to contracts of municipalities, and fair comment thereon without malice is privileged. Winnipeg Steel Granary, etc. Co. v. Canada Ingot Iron Culvert Co. 22 Manitoba 576, 22 West L. Rep. 387, 7 Dominion L. Rep. 707.

The publishing in a public journal of an advertisement makes it a matter of public interest to such an extent that it may be subjected to fair comment, and where the newspaper publishing a comment knows that the advertisement is going to appear in another paper, the fact that the advertisement commented on actually appears contemporaneously with the comment thereon, and hence is not strictly public property when the comment is written and published, does not remove the privilege from the comment. Graham v. McKimm, 19 Ont. 475. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff had brought an advertisement to the defendant to be printed in the defendant's paper, that the defendant refused to publish it, deeming it unfit, whereupon the plaintiff stated that he would have it published in another paper; that the defendant thereupon published an adverse comment in his paper which appeared at the same time that the advertisement commented on appeared in the other paper. The court said: "The objection to the charge of the learned judge at the trial was that at the time the article complained of was written the plaintiff's advertisement had not become public property by having been published, and that the defendant was therefore not entitled to criticise it. I confess to having been strongly impressed upon the argument with this view of the matter, but further consideration has induced me to adopt as correct the view taken by my brother Falconbridge in his judgment. It is true that the advertisement commented upon had not been published at the time the article complained of was written, and that it is not identified in the article complained of as the article which appeared in the rival newspaper on the same day; but the identity of the advertisement actually published with that to which the comments related was not in fact disputed, and the defendant appears to have had ample reason for believing that it would appear in the other newspaper contemporaneously with his own article. It is not different in principle from a criticism upon a book the advance sheets of which had been shown to the critic with the information that the book was to be immediately published; if, in such a case, the criticism and the book had appeared simultaneously the author could hardly complain that the critic had not waited until the following day before publishing his remarks."

A petition to licensing commissioners praying them not to grant a liquor license to the plaintiff because his tavern was one of the worst drinking places in the county, was disorderly, and because the plaintiff was himself very much given to drinking, has been held to be a publication regarding a matter of public interest and the comment contained therein was held to be the subject of qualified privilege and not actionable in the absence of malice. Wilcocks v. Howell, 5 Ont. 360.

Fair comment on the character of the contracting work in the erection of a public building is conditionally privileged as being comment on a matter of public interest. Bearce v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446, wherein it was said: "Upon a careful consideration of the circumstances attending the publication of the article in question, as disclosed from the evidence offered at the trial, we feel warranted in the conclusion that the occasion was one that rendered the publication justifiable and privileged. The defendants were citizens, taxpayers and publishers of a newspaper in Bangor. The city building was then in process of construction. It had not been accepted by the city. There was indubitable evidence that the mason work was of poor quality and not in conformity to the contract; that the mortar used in the construction of certain parts of the building and the foundation walls was poor and lifeless and in many instances the bricks were loose, on account of the inferior quality of the mortar. The building was of a public nature in which not only the defendants but every citizen of Bangor was interested. It was a legitimate subject of criticism by those interested in its construction. The people have a right to know how their municipal affairs are being conducted; how the money which they have contributed by way of taxes is being expended; and they have a right to know how the duties of those whom they have intrusted with the expenditure of such money are being performed, and it is one of the privileges of newspapers to give the people this information; and if the information so given is true, or if the publishers act in good faith, without malice, believing it to be true, and have reasonable and probable cause for so believing, the law protects them."

Newspapers, it seems, are privileged to discuss the means which should be employed to prevent the spread of a contagious disease. Scripps v. Foster, 41 Mich. 742, 3 N. W. 216, wherein the court said: "It would seem as though the public newspapers of the present day had not only the right, but that it was their duty to take part in the discussion of those matters which relate to the health, welfare, comfort and happiness of the people. The wisdom and propriety of the action taken by the public authorities, and the means and instruments to be adopted to check the spread of a malignant disease would seem to be of sufficient public importance as to be deemed a matter proper for comment and criticism."

When an artist and illustrator submits his work to the public he subjects his work to comment and criticism and such comment is privileged so long as it confines itself to a fair criticism of the work and does not go further and attack the artist personally. Outcault v. New York Herald Co. 117 App. Div. 534, 102 N. Y. S. 685.

The privilege of fair comment on the work of a scientific investigator does not extend to an imputation that his investigations are a cloak for the gratification of lascivious desires. MacDonald v. Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. 111 App. Div. 467, 98 N. Y. S. 118.

Where an attorney who had just successfully conducted a personal injury litigation, resulting in a large verdict, gave an interview to a newspaper which was published as a highly commendatory article, lauding the skill and ability with which the litigation had been conducted, it was held that he thereby so brought himself into public notice and so invited criticism that a privilege of fair comment and criticism on his conduct was given the public; and, the limits of fairness in such comment being only barely crossed if at all, it was held that a verdict for merely nominal damages rendered in an action for libel by the attorney against the publisher of the comment would not be disturbed. Thompson v. Matthiasen, 150 App. Div. 739, 135 N. Y. S. 796, wherein the court said: "If a newspaper should originate an inquiry into the relations between an attorney and his client and criticize his charges and his relations with his client, quite a different question would be presented for decision. But here an article was published which was inspired in part, at least, by the plaintiff concerning himself and the Holm action, and commending his conduct with respect to the case, and conveying the erroneous impression that he was actuated by charitable motives and had 'won' $20,000 for his client, when in fact he was to receive one-third for his services, and it became a fair subject for public comment and criticism. There is no basis upon which it can be said that the plaintiff was entitled to a substantial verdict, for it is not at all certain that he sustained injury by the article. It is peculiarly a case in which the verdict of the jury for nominal damages should not be disturbed."

It has been held that newspaper comment on the sanitary condition of the kitchen of a restaurant is not privileged by reason of the public interest in keeping such places clean and sanitary to protect the public health. Wilson v. Sun Pub. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 442.

IV. Application to Particular Words.

1. QUESTION FOR JUDGE OR JURY.

Whether words spoken in comment on a matter of public interest are defamatory is a question sometimes for the court and sometimes for the jury. The rule is that if, when the whole comment is read and construed together, its meaning is so unambiguous as reasonably to bear but one interpretation, it is for the court to say whether that signification is defamatory; but if, on the other hand, it is capable of two meanings, one of which would be libelous and actionable and the other not, it is for the jury to say, under all the circumstances surrounding its publication, which of the two meanings would be attributed to it by those to whom it is addressed or by whom it may be read. Dakhyl v. Labouchere [1908] 2 K. B. 325, note (Eng.) 96 L. T. N. S. 399; Commercial Pub. Co. v. Smith, 149 Fed. 704, 79 C. C. A. 410; Whitney v. Janesville Gazette, 5 Biss. 330, 5 Chicago L. N. 469, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,590; Washington Herald Co. v. Berry, 41 App. Cas. (D. C.) 322; Morse v. Times-Republican Printing Co. 124 Ia. 707, 100 N. W. 867; Fay v. Harrington, 176 Mass. 270, 57 N. E. 369; Brinsfield v. Howeth, 107 Md. 278, 68 Atl. 566, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 583; MacDonald v. Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. 111 App. Div. 467, 98 N. Y. S. 118; Outcault v. New York Herald Co. 117 App. Div. 534, 102 N. Y. S. 685. In Commercial Pub. Co. v. Smith, supra, the following item published in a newspaper was declared by the innuendo to have charged the plaintiff with being a murderer: "Murderer Arrested. Augusta, Ark., Feb. 10th.—Sheriff Marshall Patterson arrested Fred Smith, camped in a tent ten miles north of Augusta, on White river. Smith is wanted at Kennett, Mo., for killing old man F. E. Porch, the incentive being robbery. The state of Missouri offered $300, the county $200, and the citizens of Malden $600, for Smith's arrest. Smith does not deny being the man wanted, but claims he did not do the killing." It was held that the trial judge should not have ruled as a matter of law that the words were libelous per se, but should have left it to the jury to decide whether the words had a defamatory meaning. The court said: "The publication here involved was not so free from reasonable doubt as to its meaning and signification as to justify the learned circuit judge in ascribing to it as matter of law the signification sought to be put upon it by the innuendo. There was room for the jury, taking into consideration the display line and all other parts of the dispatch, and all the circumstances in evidence, to conclude that it would only convey to the readers of the paper the information that the plaintiff had been arrested under the charge of being the person accused with the murder of Porch, and for whom a reward was offered, and that plaintiff had admitted that he was the person wanted by the sheriff who made the arrest, but that he denied that he was the murderer of Porch." In Whitney v. Janesville Gazette, 5 Biss. 330, 5 Chicago Leg. N. 469, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,590, the court said, charging the jury: "Whether the particular publication which is the subject of this inquiry is within the rules which we have laid down for your guidance, and therefore libelous, is a question upon which you are to exercise your judgment, and pronounce your opinion as a question of fact. The whole article is to be taken together in determining the character of it. It sets out with an account of a serious affray, in which the plaintiff and one Tompkins were concerned, and which produced great excitement in the community of Janesville. The writer then says that this man Whitney (the plaintiff in this action) has figured rather conspicuously for some time past, to the disadvantage of the business interests of Janesville, and then proceeds to give an account of Whitney's dealings with S. C. Spaulding, Mr. Denell, W. L. Gookins and Tompkins, upon whom the assault was made, and after stating that Tompkins, while Whitney was absent, locked the store door, to prevent Whitney from packing up the goods until some sort of a settlement was effected, says: 'This was the occasion of the assault which produced great excitement for a time, as the sympathies of the public are with the victims of this professional swindler.' The article winds up as follows: 'Mr. Whitney is a resident of New York city, and has his headquarters on Broadway. We understand that his ways are not as light as are those of good and honest men.' The account given by the writer of the occasion and circumstances attending this assault and battery are not complained of, and the evidence relating thereto offered by the defendant was excluded by the court, as not pertinent to the issue. This account, as an item of local news, if correctly given, could not be complained of. It may be that Whitney may have been the aggressor in this assault, and may have violated the law, and behaved badly; but this did not authorize the writer to go outside of this transaction and compose an article reflecting injuriously upon Whitney's personal and business character unless the strictures were true. It is for the statements contained in the portion of the article that the plaintiff sues. Taking the whole article together, what does it mean, and what would men of ordinary intelligence understand by it? It is for the jury to say. Do the words used convey the meaning that Whitney was guilty of dishonest practices in his business dealings with the several persons mentioned? If so, unless they are true, the plaintiff has suffered, and is entitled to compensation for publication." In MacDonald v. Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. 111 App. Div. 467, 98 N. Y. S. 118, the court held it to be a question for the jury whether an article was libelous which charged that a scientific investigator "carried his enthusiasm for the investigation of abnormal femininity to the extent of entrapping young girls and foolish married women by means of a personal advertisement, leading them on to the disclosure of their most intimate affairs of the heart or of sexual propensities, sometimes by letter to him and sometimes at a personal interview which he arranged and then publishing their confidences in a book advertised by him for sale at fifty cents a copy through a lock box in the Washington post office," and further charged, by insinuation, that he carried on measurements of school children because of a lewd desire for manual contact with girls of over fourteen years of age.

The truth of the facts on which a comment is based is a question for the jury, and if the comment is fair, on a matter of public interest, and based on what the jury finds to have been a truthful representation of facts, the words of the comment are not actionable. Reg. v. Brazeau, 3 Can. Crim. Cas. (Quebec) 89. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff, a cigar manufacturer, had discharged all his employees, later agreeing to hire them again at reduced wages; that he caused a gratuitous distribution of 100 turkeys to be made among them and caused this fact to be recorded in a complimentary fashion in the public press; that the defendant then published an editorial in which he accused the plaintiff of humbugging his employees, and showed that the plaintiff had made a saving of from $1 to $2 on the already low wages of his employees and added: "How many of you would like to be presented once a year with a turkey which cost you $50 to $100?" Leaving it to the jury to determine whether the facts alleged in the editorial were true, the court said: "If it is true, as alleged by the defendant in his plea of justification, and the court at this stage of the proceedings is bound to admit this allegation as true that Fortier himself caused the publication of the several articles in the daily press signalizing his great liberality towards his employees, in order to win to himself admiration and public sympathy thereby in his fight against the union and its members, it seems to me that the union and the defendant were quite justified in resorting to publicity for the purposes of their own defense. In placing himself before the public as a public benefactor and a model master, the complainant has provoked criticism as well as admiration. If the criticism is proved to be unfair, malicious and founded on false representations, his vindication will be the more complete. If on the contrary it be fair and reasonable, and founded on a statement of facts substantially true, the complainant will have to bear with it. Odgers (on Libel, 3rd ed. page 56) says: 'Whoever seeks notoriety or invites public attention is said to challenge public criticism, and he cannot resort to the law courts if that criticism is less favorable than he anticipated.'"

In Hubbard v. Allyn, 200 Mass. 166, 86 N. E. 356, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 730, the libelous character of the following article published in certain newspapers was held to be for the jury: Ann. Cas. 1917B.—28.

"The recent finding of wood alcohol in the so-called vanilla used in one of our local bakeries brings a lesson of no little importance—the fallacy of expecting to get a large quantity of a good article for a small price. Such purchasers are among the greatest enemies and hindrances to the advent of pure food, inasmuch as they create a demand for cheap, worthless articles. Pure vanilla wholesales at about $12 per gallon. What can one expect for $2.75? He who buys at this price is either criminally stupid or deliberately dishonest. . . . The extract in question was an evil smelling concoction as innocent of vanilla as some saloons are of whisky. . . . A dealer, as in the present case, stands absolutely without excuse for purchasing an article of this extreme character. It is the attitude of the local board of health to prosecute to the limit any such flagrant violation of public confidence and physical welfare."

2. WORDS HELD ACTIONABLE.

In Green v. Chapman, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 92, 33 E. C. L. 288, the following publication regarding an exhibitor in a floricultural society was held to be actionable as exceeding fair comment by making aspersions on private character: "Sir, you will recollect a mean shabby fellow, named Green, making a great noise about a fifteen shilling prize, and using gross language because he did not receive it directly. The name of Green is to be rendered famous, I believe, in all sorts of dirty work. The tricks by which he, and a few like him, used to secure prizes, seem to have been broken in upon by some judges more honest than usual; and Riley, Dunn and he, (meaning the plaintiff), being little kings of growers among the Bakers' Arms squad, have formed a new society in which none who can show against them will be allowed to compete. This is the way in which floriculture is to be supported in the East. Societies ought to obtain the list of members of this new club of amateurs, and carefully exclude from their ranks the knaves who promote, and the fools who join, such a despicable gang. Yours, &c.' If Green be the same man who wrote an impudent letter to the Metropolitan Society, he is too worthless to notice; if he be not the same man, all we have to say is, that it is a pity two such beggarly souls could not be crammed into the same carcass. Dunn and Riley ought to have known better."

In Ryan v. Wood, 4 F. & F. (Eng.) 735, the following publication regarding a musical critic was held to be actionable, as exceeding the bounds of fair comment: "Blackmail in Journalism. The ignoble army of charlatans boasts a goodly muster of rank and file. Its regiments are strong, its companies of the maximum force, its officers adroit, and its men many. Several brigades and divisions compose it; there is, for instance, the brigade of Art Charlatans, the brigade of Medical Charlatans, the strong force of Divinity Charlatans, which serves as heavy artillery. Not only are the thousands of quacks and empiricists pressed into its ranks, but all the men who hold false positions; all who give themselves out to be greater than they are; all who trade on a pseudo-reputation; all who debase a fine, abstract principle (such as honesty, for instance) into a vendible commodity; all, in short, who sell their consciences every day for pounds, shillings, and pence. It is of these soldiers—and on this earth legions and maniples of them exist—that the ignoble army of Charlatans is composed. There are certain subdivisions of it which concern us nearly: certain officers holding high commissions in that army—in the regiment of Musical Empirics, and in the company of interested critics—who concern us nearest of all. When the lights of honest publicity are turned down and conscientious men are sleeping unconsciously, these creatures hold high revelry; they fatten and batten on the food provided for better purposes. Our readers will have detected to what principle (or rather want of principle) our remarks point. When a few weeks ago we held up Mr. Howard Glover as the type of a class, we regret to say we did not impale the only representative of that class. True, he is a shining light of his species, but he is not the only one. He has many imitators, even in journalistic literature. The master spirit has retired; the great giver of monster concerts has announced that the one he has given this season is his last, and an honest world gives him absolution, and leaves him in peace. But when Glover sleeps in the tomb of the Howards, behold Desmond Ryan arises in his stead. The latter is a true disciple, trained in the immemorial school. He is a little journalist with a soul for big concerts. Of no earthly account in this thronged world of London, where stronger, better men 'choke every roaring gate,' he yet manages to hold some moral magnifying glass before him, so that the weak-eyed are astonished at the magnitude of his influence. Were that influence tested, it would be found that though he dipped his pen in gall and fire, and though a hundred Desmond Ryans of the same calibre helped him, they could not keep down true merit, or deck with laurels the brow of incapacity. And yet certain weak, foolish, good-hearted artists think such men are powerful, and are glad to keep them in good humor. So when this Desmond Ryan conceives money would benefit him (and when will money not?) he goes, like his colleague and exemplar, to these plastic singers and musicians, and the poor creatures are ready to lend their art and hearts and souls to obtain the critic's smile. Then the great concert comes off, and the critic nets the proceeds, and the honor of journalism is shamed. If the artists resisted, what could the critic do? What is his favor or his enmity worth? A paragraph read by perhaps two hundred persons, and remembered by ten. The great organs of public opinion are, be it gladly said, too honorable as a rule to use any such coercive and self-interested practices; the mighty dailies of London (with, perhaps, two shameful exceptions) are written by conscientious men. If they praise, their eulogy is deserved; if they blame, you may feel hurt, but you must respect. It is the small peddling fry, the hangers on to the cause of literature, the writers for a quire of circulated copies, whose humor is inscrutable, whose criticism is trivial, and whose power is nil—that do the things of which their better brethren are ashamed. The laxity of those imposed on allows this system of blackmail to flourish. A popgun is presented at their heads, and they suffer their pockets to be rifled. But let this easy negligence continue, and we shall see the blackmail extend too; for if artists can be written up or written down by the highwaymen of the press, why not men of all callings? A little more of this, and we shall have our Desmond Ryans getting gratuitous gloves, and boots, and joints of meat, by force of a paragraph levelled at their hosier, shoemaker, and butcher. Shall brigandage in the British press continue? Will not our brethren of the daily journals aid us indignantly to denounce it, and at the same time to open the eyes and encourage the hearts of the pusillanimous artists?"

It being left to the jury whether there were fair grounds for the imputation that the plaintiff had taken money for a fraudulent exhibit, it was held, in Morrison v. Belcher, 3 F. & F. (Eng.) 614, that there were no such fair grounds for the imputation, that it was not privileged therefor, and nominal damages of one farthing were awarded for the following libel: "Sir,—In your impression of this day you ask, 'Who is this Zadkiel?' and 'Are there no means of ferreting him out and handing him up to Bow-street under the statute as a rogue and vagabond?' I will aid you on the scent by first informing you he stands as a lieutenant on the Navy list, seniority 1815; next, that he has his admirers about Greenwich Hospital, who fancy him a prophet A 1; and that his mischievous propensities are not solely involved in that foolish publication, Zadkiel's Almanack. More, I think he gave his name not long since as president of some peculiar society connected with astrology (R. I. Morrison). A friend reminds me that 'the author of Zadkiel is the celebrated crystal globe seer, who gulled many of our nobility about the year 1852.' Making use of a boy under fourteen, or a girl under twelve, he pretended, by their looking into the crystal globe, to hold converse with the spirits of the Apostles—even our Saviour, with all the angels of light as well as darkness, and to tell what was going on in any part of the world. Drawings were made of the objects seen in these visions. One noble lady gave one of these boys 5*l*. to give her intelligence respecting her boy, who was in the Mediterranean. That boy 'peached'—let the cat out of the bag. Of course the information was false. He took money, if he be really the same, for these profane acts, and made a good thing of it. If it was deemed sufficiently important there can be no doubt that he could be satisfactorily ferreted out. As to this position as a naval officer, excepting in the Coast Guard, he has not served afloat since 1815. Anti-Humbag."

In the case of Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 B. & S. 769, 113 E. C. L. 769, 9 Jur. N. S. 1069, 32 L. J. Q. B. 185, 8 L. T. N. S. 201, 11 W. R. 569, action was brought against the defendant for having published a comment on a scheme for the evangelization of the Chinese proposed by the plaintiff in his newspaper, the comment charging that the propaganda was a mere pretense in order to puff the newspaper's circulation. The following selections embody the substance of the comment: "To spread the knowledge of the gospel in China would be a good and an excellent thing, and worthy of all praise and encouragement; but to make such a work a mere pretext for puffing an obscure newspaper into circulation is a most scandalous and flagitious act; and it is this act, we fear, we must charge against Dr. Campbell. . . . There have been many dodges tried to make a losing paper 'go,' but it remained for a leader in the Nonconformist body to represent the weekly subscription as an act of religious duty. Moreover, the well-known device is resorted to of publishing lists of subscribers, the authenticity of which the public have, to say the least, no means of checking. 'R. G.' takes 240 copies, 'A London Minister' 120, 'An Old Soldier' 100, and so on. Few readers, we imagine, will have any doubt in their minds as to who is the 'Old Soldier,' . . . 'For, whatever may be the private views of the editor of The Ensign' (meaning the plaintiff), 'there can be no question that his followers are sincere enough in the confidence they repose in his plan. It must be a very happy thing to be gifted with so large a stock of faith. It must take the sting out of many a sorrow, and smooth away many a trouble. The past cannot be very sad, nor the future very dreadful, to him who has the capacity for hoping all things and believing all things without hesitation. If this temper of mind should lay its possessor open occasionally to the beguilements of an impostor' (meaning the plaintiff) 'more than an equivalent is provided in its freedom from doubts and suspicions, and the sense of security that it confers.' . . . 'No doubt it is deplorable to find an ignorant credulity manifested among a class of the community entitled on many grounds to respect; but now and then this very credulity may be turned to good account. Dr. Campbell' (meaning the plaintiff) 'is just now making use of it for a very practical purpose, and to-morrow some other religious speculator will cry his wares in the name of Heaven, and the mob will hasten to deck him out in purple and fine linen. When Dr. Campbell' (meaning the plaintiff) 'has finished his Chinese letters, he will be a greater simpleton than we take him for if he does not force off another 100,000 copies of his paper by launching a fresh series of thunderbolts against the powers of darkness. In the meanwhile, there can be doubt that he is making a very good thing indeed of the spiritual wants of the Chinese.'" This publication was held to be actionable as exceeding fair comment, in that it attacked the character of the plaintiff, even though the defendant believed the imputations to be well founded.

The jury having found the criticism contained in them to be unfair, the following words published with reference to an advertisement of a manufactured bag were held to be actionable: "Novelty and enough. Let us premise our remarks by declaring that they are not a planned advertisement, and then let us declare that Messrs. Jenner and Knewstubb' (meaning the plaintiffs), 'of St. James street, have introduced and largely advertised an article of their manufacture as the Bag of Bags' (meaning the said bag so manufactured and sold by the plaintiffs). 'As we have not seen the Bag of Bags, we cannot say that it is useful, or that it is portable, or that it is elegant. All these it may be, but the only point we can deal with is the title, which we think very silly, very slangy, and very vulgar; and which has been forced upon the notice of the public ad nauseam.'" Jenner v. A'Beckett, L. R. 7 Q. B. (Eng.) 11, 41 L. J. Q. B. 14, 25 L. T. N. S. 444, 20 W. R. 181.

In Farmer v. Hamilton Tribune, etc. Co. 3 Ont. 538, action was brought on the following publication: "Poor Bella Payne.' 'The deceased young lady's interment yesterday.' 'Letter from her mother, Mrs. Murray.' The pleasure seekers going to and from Dunburn yesterday about five o'clock might have noticed an undertaker's wagon in which were seated two men on the way up York street. This wagon contained the mortal remains of an accomplished young lady, the daughter of highly respected parents, and one who but a short time ago commanded at once the esteem and love of all who knew her. In an unguarded moment she listened to the voice of the seducer, and like thousands of others of her sex, fell a victim to his wiles. Of all the friends who knew Miss Payne during life, not one was found to follow her poor remains to the grave, and she was buried in Burlington cemetery without a stone to mark the spot of her last resting place. Her mother was in the city till after the interment, but left last night for her home, carrying with her a terrible load of sorrow. Indeed, Mrs. Murray's actions and appearance would lead one to believe that she was partly demented at the terrible ordeal through which she had to pass. The following letter signed by her has been handed us for publication: 'As the mother of Bella Payne, in justice to Mr. Millman (meaning the defendant Millman) whose name is connected with the newspaper articles, I wish to state that from all the information I could obtain from the most reliable sources, the blame attaches solely to Mr. Thomas Farmer (meaning the plaintiff). I wish, also, further to say, that the legal proceedings were taken on my written instructions, and not by Mr. Millman. E. F. Murray.' The court held the words declared on to be actionable and that the defense of fair comment was not good, the private character of the plaintiff not being a matter of public interest.

An accusation in substance that the plaintiff, a physician had, either by his negligence, or by his incapacity as a physician, been the cause of twenty-five persons dying of diphtheria has been held to be libelous and actionable on proof that the comment was made through malice rather than in the public interest. Marcotte v. Bolduc, 30 Quebec Super. Ct. 222.

To charge that a man had participated in John Brown's raid and had feigned insanity for the purpose of avoiding the consequences has been held to be libelous per se. Smith v. Tribune Co. 4 Biss. 477, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,118.

To charge that the plaintiff has attempted assault on little girls is actionable per se. Republican Pub. Co. v. Conroy, 5 Colo. App. 262, 38 Pac. 423, wherein the court held to be actionable per se the following words: "John Conroy was yesterday arrested by Detectives Ingersoll and Ustick for assault and battery. Conroy is one of the mean, low-lived counterfeits on manhood who make a practice of enticing little girls from their homes and then attempting assault. Two children living at 935 and 945 Seventh avenue, on Tuesday were decoyed by Conroy. He did not succeed in his bastardly purpose, being driven from it by the cries of the girls. Yesterday Conroy was identified by the girls' mothers and his arrest followed."

The following publication, printed in connection with the account of the investigation of a murder, was held to be libelous per se, as against the plaintiff Wells, therein referred to: "The police to-night succeeded in securing evidence that the murder occurred in the Tivoli building. The proprietor of the Tivoli is Monte Wells, alias 'Father Wells,' who is said to be well known in Washington, which is his home. The remainder of the building is occupied by the notorious Tivoli gamblers and the Hill woman as a gambling and disorderly house." Washington Post Co. v. Wells, 27 App. Cas. (D. C.) 495.

To charge a female school teacher in coarse terms with immoral conduct with her pupils has been held to be actionable. Barth v. Hanna, 158 Ill. App. 20. And to say of a teacher that he stole two books from the county teacher's library association is prima facie actionable per se. Rausch v. Anderson, 75 Ill. App. 526.

It has been held to be libelous per se for a newspaper to publish the following comment on the character of an insurance agent: "Another young man by the name of Morse is bringing to Marshalltown unsavory advertising. The appended article has reference to Frank N. Morse, a young man who came to the city about three years ago to accept a position with the Letts-Fletcher Company, but who, after losing his position, drifted into the life insurance business. His former friends and acquaintances in this city, where he posed as a ladies' man, and lived far beyond his means, would recognize him from the article from the Boone Republican, even were it not known that the circumstances related pertained to Morse's actions. The Republican says: 'Not long ago, the exact date of which has been forgotten, a Cholly-boy blew into town and took everything by storm. He was it with a big I. Swell parties were given in his honor, and he was carried around on a little narrow shingle all painted up in auburn hue. The young ladies bought him candy and gum and exchanged rings with Cholly, for he was just too cute for anything. The sweet little dear! He was the guest of honor of all the swell doin's, Cholly was. The evenings were too far apart and parties could not be planned often enough, so afternoon teas were given him. They were just the thing for Cholly, doncher know: Mercy, me, how he liked them! He had scarcely time to pick his beautiful teeth between meals, and just let 'em go. That was ill bred in Cholly, to go to parties with cigar-stained teeth, but the ladies didn't care; he would have been just as sweet without teeth. Charles came to Boone from Marshalltown, where all bad men who come to Boone are said to live. Charles was not in Boone for his health. Charles was in Boone for the other fellow's health, Charles was. The other fellow's health is all that Charles left in Boone. He took everything else the other had. Charles was in the insurance business when he came to Boone. Since he has quit the town no one knows exactly what business Charles is in. The insurance company which Charles claimed employed him would like to know; so would a number of Boone parties who took out a policy in Charley's company. The tea party season is over. There hasn't been a party for a week or ten days. Charles is gone, and the parties but remind us of the happy days gone by when Cholly was the guest and when Cholly let the girls chew his fresh cud of tutti frutti. Boone misses him very much. So does the company selling insurance. Cholly was strictly onto his job just the same; he got away with over $500 in good hard currency, and a number of business men have recently received inquiries as to the whereabouts of the agent who was making our city his temporary headquarters. So much for the Boone view of the young man. Morse has been representing the Pennsylvania Mutual Life, of which Mr. C. H. Rumsey of Des Moines is state agent. Mr. Rumsey was in the city a day or two ago investigating his agent's accounts. He says he straightened matters with the Boone patrons of the company, but finds nothing here that needs his attention, although Morse owes many bills, some of which are quite large. Mr. Rumsey says Morse has not earned his salary and he will therefore discharge him, after presenting him with a ticket to St. Louis, his home. He says Morse has not been guilty of any great wrongdoing, but has been indiscreet to live beyond his means. Among his Marshall creditors is the Pilgrim Hotel, which has a claim of $80 for board, but has enough of Morse's personal belongings, including some furniture, to square the account. One of the banks and several of the personal friends of Morse are creditors for various sums." Morse v. Times Republican Printing Co. 124 Ia. 707, 100 N. W. 867.

In Lovert v. Daily State Pub. Co. 123 La. 594, 49 So. 206, 131 Am. St. Rep. 356, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726, a sweeping charge of favoritism by the board of administrators of Tulane University was held to be a libel on each member of that board, although not referred to specifically by name, since it referred to the whole board and since the personnel of the board was well known to the public.

In Perrett v. New Orleans Times Newspaper, 25 La. Ann. 170, it appeared that five persons came to the office of the defendant newspaper in a state of excitement and, some of them at least, of intoxication, and demanded and secured the publication, as a paid and signed advertisement, of the following article: "We, the undersigned, most respectfully lay before the public the following very astonishing facts that took place last night near the Carrollton depot: While we were on our way home from Carrollton to New Orleans, three police officers of the above place assailed us with revolvers pointed to us, to deliver every cent we had about us. All the money that we had was five dollars, and on delivering the same they left off. What sounds more horrible is that these so-called officers were accompanied by his honor Judge Perret, judge of Carrollton and Canal avenue. Signed, John Briant, D. L. Thompson, W. B. Savory, H. B. Delord, James B. Ribb, No. 413 Frenchman street." It further appeared that the signers of the foregoing article had been arrested and fined five dollars for disorderly conduct and that this proceeding had been the basis of their charge. It was held to be actionable on the part of the newspaper to publish the article.

The publication in a newspaper of the following words has been held to be actionable per se: "The Hurricane Vote. Again we have to chronicle most atrocious corruption, intimidation and fraud in the Hurricane island vote, for which Davis Tillson is without doubt responsible, as he was last year." Tillson v. Robbins, 68 Me. 295, 28 Am. Rep. 50.

In Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322, it was held to be actionable, but only on proof of special damage, to publish in a newspaper, with reference to property belonging to the plaintiff, the following article: "The sale of the Cardiff Giant, so-called, at New Orleans, for the small price of eight dollars, recalls the palmy days of that ingenious humbug. We well remember the learned remarks made by connoisseurs in this city when it was exhibited in a vacant store quite near our office. While the vulgar herd only looked on in silence, seeking a colossal figure which excited their curiosity, but which they did not attempt to explain, the Harvard professors and other learned men traced its pedigree by their knowledge of artistic history, and constructed theories as to its origin, which at once displayed their erudition, and helped to advertise the show. But our professors and learned men were not the only victims of the sell. A distinguished professor of Yale discussed learnedly upon it in the Galaxy Magazine. He demonstrated beyond a doubt that the statue was authentic, that it was antique, and that it was a colossal monolith. He ciphered it down that it was a Phoenician image of the god Baal, and found no difficulty in proving to his own satisfaction that it was brought to America by a Phoenician party of adventurers, who sailed in one of the ships of Tarshish, and that it was buried by the idolaters to save it from desecration by the hordes of savages who overpowered and destroyed the Phoenicians. He accounted for several marks and symbols upon the image, which were unmistakably Phoenician. Not long afterwards the man who brought the colossal monolith to light confessed that it was a fraud, and the learned gentlemen, who had indorsed its authenticity, were left as naked as the statue itself."

In Curtis v. Mussey, 6 Gray (Mass.) 261, a certain speech on slavery by Horace Mann, in which a severe criticism was made of the act of the plaintiff, a United States circuit court commissioner, in returning a negro to Georgia under the fugitive slave law, was held to be libelous.

It appearing that the plaintiff had never known a man named Lambert, that the charge of murder was false, and that she was not dead, by suicide or otherwise, the following publication has been held to be actionable per se: "The news of a double tragedy in which a former Marshall girl committed a double crime was received here Sunday. Mrs. Myrtle Clare, aged twenty-six and formerly Miss Myrtle Colby, of Marshall, shot and mortally wounded John L. Lambert, a street car conductor, then killed herself in a rooming house in Los Angeles, Cal., Thanksgiving Day. Lambert was taken to a hospital where he died. Miss Colby lived in Marshall about ten years ago. She came to that city from Springport, and was a rather attractive young woman. She worked for Chas. A. Kolbourne, who conducted a restaurant in a building now occupied by Jarius Raub, and resided in a West State street building. From there she went to Jackson. She was married to Ira Clare of Coldwater, Mich., and a few years ago and soon after the couple went West, where Mr. Clare secured a position with the Los Angeles Ice and Cold Storage Co. It is said that their married life was not as happy as it might have been and Mrs. Clare became acquainted with Lambert, a married man who had separated from his wife. Mrs. Clare applied for a divorce from Clare, intending to marry Lambert. Her sentiments were not reciprocated very cordially by the street car conductor, and it is believed the deed was inspired by desperation over the marital complications. It is said Lambert had a divorce, and that Mrs. Clare could not secure one, hence the crime." Clair v. Battle Creek Journal Co. 168 Mich. 467, 134 N. W. 443.

The publication of an article imputing the crime of sodomy or of assisting another in the commission of that crime is actionable per se. Thibault v. Sessions, 101 Mich. 279, 59 N. W. 624.

It is actionable per se to publish in a newspaper a false charge of the criminal offense of attempting to bribe a legislator. Owen v. Dewey, 107 Mich. 67, 65 N. W. 8.

It has been held to be libel to publish a news item imputing the crime of burglary to a policeman, the news item being headed as follows: "Policeman and burglar. The Detroit department said to have one of that sort. He pretends to be sick, and is suspected of having gone at once and robbed a store." Long v. Tribune Printing Co. 107 Mich. 207, 65 N. W. 108.

The publication in a newspaper of a resolution of a city council, which resolution had been made without the scope of the authority of the council, charging the plaintiff with being a "disreputable person," with having maliciously published a false report, with having acted with conduct which was execrable and odious, and with having caused the city irreparable damage, was held to be libelous per se in Trebbly v. Transcript Pub. Co. 74 Minn. 84, 76 N. W. 961, 73 Am. St. Rep. 330.

The following publication has been held to be actionable, although copied or quoted from the words of another: "Then there was H. B. Johnson, who disgraced the office now filled by H. Clay Euing. He was once accused of stealing a stud horse in Lafayette county. He sued the party of accusers, and at the trial, where four federal office holders made a part of the jury, a verdict was brought in for the defendant." Johnson v. St. Louis Despatch Co. 65 Mo. 539, 27 Am. Rep. 293.

In Kelly v. Independent Pub. Co. 45 Mont. 127, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1063, 122 Pac. 735, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1160, the following publication was held to be libelous per se and actionable: "The mother, Mrs. Miller, is said to be a confirmed drunkard. It is alleged that on several occasions she had thrown a huge butcher knife at the children and has threatened to kill them if they were taken from her. The two girls were taken from school this afternoon by Mr. Schoenfeld, and they have been placed temporarily in the Paul Clark Home. The matter will be taken up before Judge Donlan to-morrow morning and the girls will probably be sent to the Orphans' Home in Helena. There is also a boy twelve years of age, and what disposition will be made of him has not yet been decided."

In Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605, it was held to be criminal libel, and hence "illegal conduct," for the plaintiff, a democratic newspaper publisher of New Hampshire, to publish an article exulting over the defeat of the Federal army at Bull Run and charging that army with brutal conduct toward citizens. The suit in that case was brought against the town of Concord for the damages caused the plaintiff by the destruction of his printing office by a mob, the action being predicated on a statute making towns liable for such damages caused by a mob, unless the damage was caused by the illegal conduct of the person damaged. The court held that the publication of the foregoing article, which had been the provocation of the mob's act, was a criminal libel, and hence, an act of illegal conduct within the statute.

3. WORDS HELD NOT ACTIONABLE

In Henwood v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. Pl. (Eng.) 606, 41 L. J. C. Pl. 206, 26 L. T. N. S. 938, 30 W. R. 1000, the alleged libel was contained in a report published as a comment on the proposal made by the plaintiff to the admiralty for the conversion of old wooden battle ships into iron-clad turret ships. This report contained a scientific criticism of the plaintiff's plan and concluded with the following passage, on which the charge of libel was founded: "These plans would have no weight whatever from the known antecedents of their author; but they derived weight from the approval of Mr. Watts, the late chief constructor of the navy. Their Lordships may, therefore, see fit to send a copy of the correspondence confidentially to that gentleman, in order that he may have an opportunity of offering to their lordships any explanations which he may consider desirable with regard to it. To Mr. Henwood himself I think it is only necessary to say that their Lordships have had the whole question reconsidered, and are quite satisfied that no satisfactory conversion of the wooden line-of-battle ships can be made on his plan: and I beg leave to submit that he be so informed." It was held that the reference to "antecedents" was not a personal aspersion on the plaintiff but only a reference to his lack of experience, and hence was not actionable as exceeding fair comment. The court said, per Willis, J.: "In substance, the defendant communicated to another member of the public a statement of the Lords of the Admiralty and the public officers under their control, accounting for their proceedings as to the reconstruction of the navy. This statement was made by public servants intrusted by the Crown, with the charge of the most important defense of the country, in which every subject of the Queen had an interest of the deepest character; and the statement would have been garbled and incomplete, unless it set forth the very discussion which the plaintiff's own suggestions naturally and necessarily challenged and provoked. It is vainly suggested that those proposals of the plaintiff were private and confidential. There was no stipulation that they should be so considered. They were, moreover, simultaneously published by the plaintiff, and exposed to honest criticism at home and abroad. The plaintiff's proposal was made upon a subject of public interest, to agents of the Crown, who were bound to consider and criticise what was put forward by the plaintiff, if they thought it of sufficient importance to be discussed, which, as against him, it must be taken to have been; and, in the course of that criticism and discussion, the merits of his plans and the previous experience and judgment of the suggestor on the subject with which he dealt were relevant subjects of remark. The occasion, therefore, was one in which the alleged libeller and every member of society to whom he might issue the blue book had in common with the plaintiff an interest incomparably greater than that which in so many cases has been held to carry a privilege essential to freedom, and which, in the absence of malice, is an answer to the action."

The following publication has been held not to be actionable, since it made no reference to an individual, and since it would be privileged as fair comment even if such reference had been made. "The remainder of the evening was occupied in the discussion of 'an account drawn up by Mr. C. on the recent forgeries in lead.' These are figures reported to have been obtained from the Thames, and called 'pilgrims' signs.' They are being offered not only in London, but throughout the country, and antiquaries should be on their guard in the purchase of them. Mr. C. had inspected 800 of them, but the aggregate is stated to be not less than 2,000. The whole are proved to be of recent fabrication. They appear to have been made in chalk moulds. They have been steeped in a strong acid and smeared over with Thames mud. It is to be lamented that there are no legal means of punishing a gross attempt at deception and extortion." Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 F. & F. (Eng.) 347.

In Wiles v. Victoria Times Printing, etc. Co. 11 British Columbia 143, the action was based on two published articles, the first of which was held to have no bearing on the case, and the second of which was as follows: "Two ladies have been canvassing the city for the past few days selling tickets for a 'recital by Mr. Wm. Lee Greenleaf, of Boston,' to be given under the auspices of the Willard Young Women's Christian Temperance Union Mission. Tickets are being sold in a manner similar to those for a recital by a gentleman of the same name nearly two years ago, which was ostensibly for the benefit of the Orphanage, but which the promoters were obliged to abandon. Mayor McCandless' name is being used in connection with the concert without his knowledge or consent, and he wishes it understood that he is not favorably disposed towards the scheme. The Johnson Street Mission, it is reported, is to receive only $50 from the proceeds, although the Y. M. C. A. hall is being given free of charge." Holding the article to be fair comment based on facts truly stated, the court said: "Now, what is enunciated in the second paragraph? It is applicable to those two ladies who have been canvassing the city for the sale of tickets. It is said that it referred to the plaintiff, that she was obtaining money dishonestly by selling said tickets in a manner similar to the method employed on a former occasion by persons who sold tickets for an entertainment pretendedly but not really for the benefit of a local charity, and in such manner that said dishonest persons were obliged to abandon the continuance of their said conduct for fear of the law, and that the plaintiff was improperly in furtherance of her said dishonest design using the name of the Mayor of Victoria as a patron of the said entertainment. I should not have thought it was necessary for the plaintiff to have taken that up. This article was indefinite; it applied to two ladies who had been canvassing the town. If it does not apply to her there certainly could be no libel. If it did apply to her, what are the facts in the case? Mr. Hayward has told us what the method practiced in the Chase incident was, the selling of tickets and the giving of a concert in connection with which tickets were sold and subscriptions collected, the Home to receive but a small sum. And what is the system carried on in the present case? That the Home was to receive a small sum, they were selling tickets and collecting subscriptions in the same way. . . . I find that the first, the 'Siren Voices' article, had nothing whatever to do with the plaintiff; that it was bona fide, and was published without malice. I find as to the second article, that it was published without malice towards the plaintiff, that the facts as stated are true, other than that small statement as to the amount the association is to receive and that the hall is free; and it was fair comment, made in good faith, on facts which were matters of public interest."

In Keller v. Loyless, 205 Fed. 510, 123 C. C. A. 578, the following words were held not to be libelous per se: "Selling Goods to Bottlers. In its March issue, the National Bottlers' Gazette of New York perpetrated a characteristic editorial ghost dance under the above heading, running amuck with its crazy snickersnee whetted keen for the poor traveling man. In this remarkable aberration the bellicose crank, who slings muck for ink in his self-appointed and highly imaginary job of running the business of every manufacturer, supply dealer, bottler and bottling trade journal in the United States of America, coolly eliminates the knight of the grip from the equation of selling in the commercial carbonating world, reducing the business to that of a mere mail-order house. He gives the faithful, order-getting road man his walking papers, with a sneer at his efficiency and with a slander on his morals and manners, declaring: 'The old timers who held back their orders for the coming of some glib salesman—who got him and himself, too, stone blind drunk and had "such fun" together—are fast passing away. A new era has set in. A bottler can't be "half seas" over and do business intelligently.' Ye Gods! Listen to that! It was not enough to kick the drummer downstairs, but he is branded as a drunkard and roysterer, employing bibulous conviviality as an art to land orders, a good deal as the confidence man works his oily wiles. The New York traducer of the bottling trade traveling man will probably be prompt with his little apology in his April issue, but his animus is plain enough, and the fraternity has seen him in his true light. Of course, slander aside, there is but one side to the question in so far as it involves advertising and traveling salesmen. The two are co-operative in every sense. Both are good and both are necessary. 'Acute Botts.' From Texas 'Grandoldtaxes' one of the best known traveling representatives in the line, writes that 'the editor of the National Bottlers' Gazette must be suffering from a case of acute botts. Don't think his advertising scheme will work, and he will find the number of traveling men increasing year by year just the same as in the past.'"

It is not actionable for a newspaper to publish an article warning the public against loss through a scheme for the formation of a fifty million dollar farmers' brotherhood organization which the court, from the evidence, deems only a swindling scheme. Williams v. Chicago Herald Co. 46 Ill. App. 655.

In Morasca v. Item Co. 126 La. 426, 52 So. 565, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315, it was held not to be actionable for a newspaper to publish a report by the police that a child had died of tarter emetic poisoning, which it got from eating sugar bought from the grocery store of the plaintiff. The court said in that case: "Questions relating to life, health, and welfare may be commented upon, and if erroneous deductions be made, it does not give cause for damages unless special damage can be shown; that is, when persons taking part in the inquiry are not prompted by malice."

In Hyatt v. Lindner, 133 La. 614, 63 So. 241, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 256, the following anonymous letter, addressed to the mayor asking for a police investigation of a house, was held not to be actionable as a libel on the owner of the house: "An investigation of the house No. 909 Bourbon street by the police will be highly appreciated. This place is an old shack, rented to several different families. but the actions of many well-dressed and painted beauties and many well-dressed and some married men continually coming and going does not look well for a respectable neighborhood. Last week an auto backed up and several men got out and entered this place. Now I do not care to see these married men get into trouble, but there are many respectable families in the neighborhood who sit out in the evening and have to face these unpleasant conditions. An early inspection of the place No. 909 Bourbon street will be highly appreciated by An Old Resident of the Neighborhood."

It appearing that the comment was fair, there being evidence to show the truth thereof, it was held in Bearse v. Bass, 88 Me. 521, 34 Atl. 411, 51 Am. St. Rep. 446, that the following article published in a newspaper was not actionable: "We are informed by a former member of the city government who was a member of the committee having charge of matters connected with the new City Building, that he was not allowed to see all the bids which were made by Bangor contractors. He also says that, under the direction of the king boss, our Bangor contractors were requested to hand in their bids for a completed building and in making them to include separate bids for carpenter, mason, plumbing work, etc., and that several of these bids were open, but not shown to other members of the committee. Only a few minutes before the expiration of the time to receive bids, the gentleman imparting this information saw the architect, who was allowed to see all the bids of the Bangor contractors, write and seal what appeared to be a proposal, which he handed to the city clerk. He also says he made a few suggestions to the mayor relating to the manner in which the business was being done, and what the people were saying about it, to which the mayor replied, 'What in h—l have the people to do about it?' and that he wanted them to understand that he proposed to take charge of all the affairs connected with the new City Building. Mr. W. N. Sawyer says he put in a bid for the mason work, but his bid was not placed before the committee. All the Bangor contractors complain of the treatment they received. In the spring of 1893 many changes were made in the plans and specifications and to such an extent that such a reliable man as C. B. Brown says would reduce the cost of the building about $15,000, and still the Bangor contractors were not allowed to put in new bids, but the out of town contractors were allowed to have the contract at their old figures. The mason work is of the poorest quality and it should not be accepted by the city. Too much sand has been used in the mortar, and to such an extent that it does not prevent the alkali, which is the life of the mortar, from running out, as can be seen by the white appearance of the building. Very many of the bricks are loose, the mortar being too lifeless to hold them together, and the contractors should be obliged to take down and replace the imperfect sections of the wall. The doings of the old Tweed ring in New York were no worse than much that has been done in connection with our City Building. It is in the hands of a wrecker and how long will the taxpayers of Bangor allow the present state of affairs to exist?"

It is not actionable in the absence of proof of malice for a voter and taxpayer, in a town meeting, to object to the granting of the application of town assessors for reimbursement for expenses incurred in defending a suit on the ground that the suit had been brought for perjury, and to say, in so opposing the application, that "they went to Barnstable and perjured themselves; I have it in back and white." Smith v. Higgins, 16 Gray (Mass.) 251.

In Wieman v. Mabee, 45 Mich. 484, 8 N. W. 71, 40 Am. Rep. 477, it was held not to be actionable to publish of a school teacher, in a petition to the superintendent to prevent the issuance of a license to him, that he was a man of bad moral character, where there was evidence in justification showing him to be a man addicted to profanity and sabbath breaking. The court said: "We do not think any superintendent would need vindication for being dissatisfied with the moral character of a teacher who has the faults complained of by these parties who opposed the licensing of plaintiff. A superintendent who should subject young children to such influences would be very censurable."

It has been held not to be actionable for members of a local school board to communicate in good faith to the county school commissioner the following complaint against a teacher: "We, the undersigned directors of school district No. 131, would most respectfully ask you to revoke the certificate to Mrs. Lou Finley who at present has charge of our school. From the most reliable and conclusive evidence in our possession, we must say that she is totally unfit to teach our school. She is very tyrannical and abusive and indecent, and our school is doing no good. We have trouble more or less all the time and have hoped after having called her in and talked over the matter with her that she would get along better, but things are getting worse. We could not enumerate all the charges that have been preferred, but she has kept some of the small boys in until one had to respond to nature in his pants and another had to make a run for it and afterwards to punishment for it. She has whipped unmercifully, pulled their ears and otherwise mistreated them until they do not respect her. She has called the children liars." Finley v. Steele, 159 Mo. 299, 60 S. W. 108, 52 L.R.A. 852, wherein the court said: "At the time of the publication of the alleged libel, defendants composed the school board of the school district in which plaintiff was teaching. They knew that she had had trouble with her pupils, and a petition signed by twelve patrons of the school complaining of her had been presented to them as a board, requesting them to ask her to resign. Complaints had also been made to the school commissioner, who in consequence thereof wrote to the board asking about the trouble between plaintiff and her pupils. On account of these facts the board called plaintiff before it and asked her to resign, but she declined to do so, and as a last resort, they prepared, in substantially the words of the statute, the charges against her which form the basis of this litigation, and sent them to the commissioner. They not only had an interest in regard to the way in which the school was being conducted, but in preferring the charges against the plaintiff were simply discharging their duty as members of the school board, and it makes no difference that the exact words of the statute were not used, the purpose and intent was the same. There was no actual malice proven, and the use of such word or words did not take away the privileged character of the communication. Intent makes the libel in such circumstances."

In Com v. Featherston, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 594, it was held that the publication of a notice to the public, stating that certain notes obtained by an attorney had been obtained by fraud, and warning the public not to receive them by assignment or otherwise, was privileged and was not actionable in the absence of proof of falsehood and express malice.

WILSON ET AL.

v.

SUN PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Washington Supreme Court—May 18, 1915

85 Wash. 503; 148 Pac. 774.

Appeal and Error — Harmless Error — Defect in Pleading.

Under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1752, requiring the supreme court to decide the case on its merits, the refusal to grant a nonsuit, in an action for libel, on the ground that, when the motion was made, the complaint contained no allegation that the offending publication was untrue, is not error, where the complaint negated the truth of the published charges by the assertion of the opposite, and where the answer averred their truth.

Libel and Slander — Pleading — Allegation of Falsity.

Where the matter published is libelous per se, it is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege its falsity; that being a matter of defense which, under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 293, must be alleged and proven as such.

Truth as Defense.

At common law, the truth of a libelous charge is usually a complete defense in a civil action for damages.

[See 17 Ann. Cas. 761.]

Trial — Amendment as Ground for Continuance.

In an action for libel, a trial amendment by a specific allegation that the publication was false presented no new issue, where the complaint averred the opposite of the published charges and the answer alleged their truth, so that the defendant's motion for a continuance is properly denied.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914A 1268.]

Libel and Slander — Privilege — Matter of Public Interest — Sanitary Condition of Restaurant.

Defendant's newspaper publication that plaintiffs' cafeteria was unclean, unsanitary, and not well ventilated does not fall within the rule of qualified privilege, so as not to be libelous per se, as the publication is not of matters relating to appeals for public patronage, which class relates to those who are in a sense public characters, such as seekers for office, artists, inventors, showmen, and such others as by appeal to the public by advertisement in the special sense directly challenge public criticism of their claims.

Defamatory Words — Criticism of Condition of Restaurant.

Under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 2424, defining libel against a living person as every publication by writing, printing, etc., tending to expose him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefit of public confidence, or to injure any person or association in his business or occupation, a newspaper publication charging that plaintiffs' cafeteria was unclean, unsanitary, and not well ventilated, that, if it were not for the big rotary fan in the kitchen, nothing could live, not even a microbe, that its tables, floors, etc., were damp and covered with food scraps, that its ice box and fish box were old, saturated wooden traps filled with a general mixture of eatables, tends to injure the plaintiffs in their partnership business by implying that their café was an unwholesome place and unfit for public patronage and is libelous per se.

Malice as Essential to Libel.

Malice is not an essential element of civil libel, as the civil action for libel is an action for damages in which compensatory damages only are recoverable, which would be the same, regardless of the motive of the publication.

[See 15 Am. St. Rep. 337.]

Same.

In a civil action for libel, malice is material only on the question of punitive or exemplary damages.

Damages — Punitive Damages — When Allowed.

Punitive or exemplary damages are not recoverable, except where specifically authorized by statute.

Libel on Business — Right of Action by Owner.

A libelous publication relating to plaintiffs' partnership business, designating the name under which it was carried on, did not state a cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs as individuals, but as partners, and the publisher cannot escape liability for libel because it did not mention the name of either plaintiff.

Right of Recovery — Nominal Damages Presumed.

Plaintiffs, in an action for the publication of words actionable per se, are at least entitled to nominal damages, unless the published charges were true.

Question for Jury — Truth of Libel — Conflicting Evidence.

In an action for a newspaper libel, where there was conflicting evidence as to the truth of the charges set up in justification, their truth is a question for the jury.

Appeal and Error — Review of Facts — Verdict on Conflicting Evidence.

A verdict in an action for libel, supported by substantial evidence that the published charges were untrue, concludes the question on appeal.

Libel and Slander — Evidence of Damage Insufficient.

In an action for a newspaper libel charging plaintiffs' partnership café was hot, dirty, unsanitary, and poorly ventilated, evidence considered and held not to show any actual damages to plaintiffs' business.

Libel on Business — Evidence as to Damages Inadmissible.

In such action, evidence that one of the plaintiffs had bought his half interest for $6,500, and that the latter, when he sold, received "for the whole outfit" $3,500, without indicating whether that represented one-half of the sale price on the whole sale price, is inadmissible, especially where it appeared that, prior to the publication, plaintiffs' business was already falling off at a rate not accelerated by the publication.

Libel on Partnership — Damage to Individual Members.

In an action for a newspaper libel relating to a cafeteria operated by plaintiffs as copartners, to recover damages for injury to their business, evidence as to the standing and reputation of one of the plaintiffs and of his family in the community is immaterial, since injury to the reputation and feelings of either partner, as an individual, is not an issue.

Same.

In an action for a libelous newspaper publication relating to a cafeteria conducted by plaintiffs as copartners, where there is little evidence of injury to the reputation of either partner, as an individual, and no evidence as to the injury of the separate business of either, the only damages recoverable are such as resulted in injury to the partnership business itself and to the partners in their joint capacity.

Action by Partnership for Libel.

In an action for a newspaper libel relating to a cafeteria conducted by plaintiffs, a complaint in the name of the plaintiffs as copartners is not a misjoinder, and the defendant, without demurring for misjoinder, is entitled to construe it as an action for damages to the partnership business.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county: HUMPHRIES, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Wilson et al., plaintiffs, against Sun Publishing Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

John P. Hartman and Arthur E. Nafe for appellant.

Tucker & Hyland for respondents.

[505] ELLIS, J.—In August, 1913, the plaintiffs were, and since October, 1912, had been, copartners operating a cafeteria known as the Epler Cafe, on Second avenue, in the city of Seattle. They commenced this action on August 29, 1913, to recover damages for injuries to their business which it is claimed were caused by certain articles printed and published in The Seattle Sun, a newspaper then being published by the defendant. The first publication was on August 1, 1913, and reads as follows:

"Restaurant Kitchen an Awful Place in Summer Time Says Sun Reporter After a Visit to One.

"Tour Yesterday Reveals Many Changes for Better in Seattle, but He Lands in Cafeteria Where Rotary Fan is Only Thing That Makes Life Possible.

"(By the Author of 'The Confessions of a Dishwasher.')

"If it were not for the big rotary fan in the Epler Cafeteria kitchen, nothing could live there—not even a microbe. Certainly nothing could exist there without holding its nose.

"This is summertime in the kitchens. The hot sun which beats down upon the streets is not hotter than the roasting oven in the kitchen where foodstuffs spoil quickly and microbes grow fat.

"There has been a general cleaning up in most of the Seattle restaurant kitchens and dishwashing parlors since The Sun started its clean-up campaign. In some places it has been barely noticeable—the trickle of hot water sounding the [506] first call to cleanliness, or the swish of a scrubbing brush on saturated floors. In other places, the transformation has been complete. Old saturated wooden tables, drainboards and ice boxes have been torn out, and new metal ones put in their places. Pervious floors have been ripped up to make room for clean white tile.

"Eat in More Comfort.

"I am a quick luncher and a haunter of restaurants. And I confess that I am beginning to eat my three meals a day with a greater degree of comfort.

"In my daily travels I have noticed peculiar things—such as new refuse cans with real lids on them, in the alley behind Rippe & Chapman's combination kitchen, and real steam rising from the dishwasher at the White Lunch.

"But yesterday it was hot—real hot for Seattle—and I had a real or imagined desire to find out how the living is in a hot kitchen in hot weather. A friend and I chose a kitchen at random—one to which I had not paid an extended visit before. It happened to be the Epler Cafeteria, 813 Second avenue.

"To repeat, nothing could survive there if it were not for a big rotary fan which appears to have been attached to a motor and placed in the window for the express purpose of forcing an exit for ill odors arising from food scraps which are on the first road towards disintegration.

"Ice-Box Hash.

"The floors of the kitchen were wet, slippery and littered with food scraps. Dishes covered with food from the last meal were left standing on the drainboard near the dishwashing machine. Filthy saturated wooden tables were absorbing the moisture from the latest left-overs.

"And the ice-boxes—saviors of food in the summer time, but flavor mixers and microbe harbors at the Epler Cafeteria. They were old, saturated, wooden affairs, capable of absorbing anything, even the roasting heat of the kitchen.

"We opened them one by one and looked inside. There, in each one, piled together was the greatest assortment of foods which I have ever seen accumulated in a single ice-box. It might have been appetizing—to one who is fond of hash.

"A Fish Box's Contents.

"There were things to eat, all the way from potatoes and hamburger steak to the latest salads and mayonnaise dressings, in a fish box.

[507] "But it was not quite so appetizing when we took a knife and scraped from the saturated wooden trays and walls of the ice box the remains of former meal preparations—generations upon generations of them, it appeared to me.

"And the refuse cans and the scraps which were spilled over make it fortunate there are not many flies in Seattle.

"Yesterday we paid a visit to other restaurants in Seattle, which is another story.

"And before long we shall visit other restaurants—other stories."

The second article was published on August 4, 1913, and reads as follows:

"Conditions in Local Restaurants.

"It is a matter of common knowledge that many restaurant kitchens, also many hotel kitchens, are carelessly conducted and in some cases are absolutely filthy.

"For years no effort was made by the city authorities of Seattle to properly supervise restaurant and hotel kitchens, and there seemed to be no escape from the uncleanly conditions for the thousands of people who patronize these places.

"It is true that there were restaurants and hotels where these bad conditions did not exist, and which were cleanly in every respect, but the good and the bad were so indiscriminately mixed together, that there seemed to be no possible way for the public to distinguish between them.

"The Seattle Sun undertook a public service in investigating these places, and to do so had men go to work in them as dishwashers, etc., for the purpose of securing information.

"As a result many facts were secured and published in The Sun and there followed a general cleaning up all along the line.

"Conditions today average much better than they did some months ago.

"The Sun has, however, determined to follow this matter up from time to time and see whether the reformation is progressive, rather than retrogressive.

"Last week this newspaper contained some strictures on certain cafeterias, including Epler's the kitchen of which was visited by two Sun representatives on a very hot day.

"Objections to the statements made by these men and printed in The Sun are made by Mr. Wilson, one of the proprietors, [508] and by others who are friends of the management.

"Mr. Wilson states that immediately following the appearance of The Sun with the strictures on his kitchen he invited fifteen or more of his regular patrons to walk out in his kitchen and investigate for themselves.

"This information The Sun gives as a matter of course, and it also publishes a letter from Edward C. Kilbourne, manager of the building, who states that the kitchen is clean and sanitary. There is not the slightest desire upon the part of The Sun to misrepresent the conditions in Epler's or in any other eating place.

"The men sent out by The Sun to investigate the restaurants do not in any way alter their report, however. They were absolutely unbiased and were acting under rigid instructions to render truthful accounts of everything they discovered.

"The dishwashing arrangements in Epler's were found to be modern and in every way sufficient. The criticisms made were all directed at specific kitchen shortcomings.

"The task of bringing all local restaurants up to a general high average of cleanliness is making The Sun some enemies among proprietors and managers, and there is a loud protest from several of them, who charge loss of business, etc.

"The sensible restaurant proprietor who has been criticised will devote all his energies to immediately putting his kitchen in a condition above reproach, and will waste no breath in idle denunciations.

"He should recollect that restaurants are in reality public service institutions and that the people have a right to demand the very best service from them."

The final article complained of was printed in The Seattle Sun on August 5, 1913, and reads as follows:

"Finds It Quite Possible to Keep Restaurant Kitchens Cool and Clean.

"Sun Reporter Visits Wing's Cafeteria, Gerald's Cafe and the Hofbrau—Ice Boxes May Be Clean and Dry Also.

"(By the Author of 'The Confessions of a Dishwasher.')

"The same afternoon last week on which I visited the Epler Cafeteria I made a trip also through the kitchens of Gerald's Cafe, 824 First Avenue, Wing's Cafeteria, 1409 First avenue, [509] and the Hofbrau Cafe, First avenue and Madison street. These were all cleaner than the Epler kitchen.

"Soon after The Sun began to look into Seattle kitchens and dishwashing establishments, Wing's Cafeteria proceeded to rip out old floors and fixtures of its old kitchen and start in afresh with everything clean and white. All the old dishwashing things were destroyed. In place of old floors was laid white tile, while metal tables, trays and shelves took the places of old wooden ones.

"The arrangements for dishwashing in Wing's Cafeteria are entirely separated from the kitchen. The dishes have a large sunny room all to themselves—a room with plenty of air in it, with white walls and ceilings and a white tiled floor. Except for one board on which the dishes are placed after they are washed and dried, there is not an inch of wood in the place. Everything is solid, of stone or metal. Cracks and crevices and porous surfaces in which food might collect are unheard of.

"Diners May Witness.

"There are three dishwashing outfits in this white room, one for washing and rinsing plates and platters, another for washing and rinsing silver and glasses, and still a third for pans.

"Steaming hot water is running in all of them. The room enters directly into the big dining room, so that diners may have a full view of the process if they wish. It is high above the ground and through its spacious windows overlooks Elliott Bay.

"The kitchen where the food is prepared and cooked is downstairs below the dishwashing room, but not below the surface of the earth. It is clean and dry with hard, substantial walls and floors. Everything is fresh and clean-smelling.

"The combination kitchen and dishwashing establishment of Gerald's Cafe, 824 First avenue, was almost unbearably hot on that warm afternoon when I visited it. The kitchen appeared to be buried in the side of the first hill. It was dark and ventilated by only one small window at the top, which was at the surface of the earth.

"Hot at Gerald's.

"Gerald's kitchen was roasting hot, like its big brick oven, and it lacked circulation of fresh air. It was cleaner than the Epler kitchen, not as clean as Wing's and the Hofbrau.

[510] "There were old saturated wooden tables and shelves, which had the appearance, however, of being scrubbed occasionally. This, like the other kitchens which I visited that afternoon, was equipped with a hot water dishwashing outfit, capable of handling and really cleaning the dishes of its customers. The floor was wet in some places, and I noticed a few scraps of food scattered about. It was a substantial, level floor, however, and offered a solid footing. There was no fan in the kitchen. With its one tiny skylight window at the top, it resembled an old-fashioned bake oven itself.

"Hofbrau Cool and Clean.

"The kitchen of the Hofbrau Cafe was cool and clean. Its solid cement floor was especially clean, dry and free from dirt, grease and wet. There were wooden tables—but they were solid and made of hard wood. And they were white and clean, free from grease.

"Ice boxes and fish boxes in the Hofbrau were cool and appetizing as I opened them. They were not hash boxes. Each separate variety of food had a separate apartment all its own to keep fresh in. Fish were placed in one box, meats in another, vegetables in a third, while butter and dairy products were kept entirely separate. Each cut of meat appeared as fresh as the day it was killed. The fish has its own icy room away from the butter. There was no evidence of stale food remainders on the inside linings. The interiors of the boxes were clean, cool and dry. It was possible to light a match on the inside wall. I did it."

The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs' restaurant had always been carried on in a first-class manner and had always been clean, sanitary and well ventilated; that prior to the publication complained of, the business, with the good will thereof, was of a reasonable value of $30,000; that the libelous matter was published maliciously and without probable cause or any cause whatever; that the things set forth were false and untrue, and were known to be untrue by the officers and manager of the defendant when they were published; that by reason of the publication of the articles complained of the plaintiffs, both in their business and as citizens of Seattle, have been injured in their good name, fame and credit [511] and brought into public scandal, infamy and disgrace among all those people among whom they had been doing business; that the good will of their business has been destroyed, and that plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $25,000. The allegation of falsity was inserted by amendment, over defendant's objection, at the close of the plaintiffs' evidence.

In its answer the defendant denied the allegation that plaintiffs' restaurant was clean, sanitary and well ventilated; denied that the business was worth $30,000 at the time of the publication of the articles complained of; admitted the publication of the articles; denied that the publications were made maliciously; denied that the plaintiffs were damaged in the sum of $25,000, or any amount; and, as an affirmative defense, averred that the facts published in the articles were true and were published with a full belief of their truth, without malice and for the protection of the citizens of and visitors to the city of Seattle. The reply traversed the affirmative matter in the answer.

The evidence is too voluminous to be set out in a connected statement. We shall discuss it so far as necessary in the consideration of the points presented. At appropriate times the defendant moved for a nonsuit and for a directed verdict. These motions were overruled. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $7,500. The defendants moved for a verdict non obstante and for a new trial. These motions also were overruled. From the judgment entered upon the verdict, the defendant appeals.

While there are many assignments of alleged error, we shall consider only those which seem necessary to a proper disposition of the case.

As preliminary to the discussion on the merits, a question of pleading is presented. It is claimed that a nonsuit should have been granted because, when the motion was made, the complaint contained no allegation that the offending publications were untrue, hence did not state a cause of action. For many reasons there is no merit in this claim. In the first [512] place, the complaint negated in terms, by its direct allegations of cleanliness and sanitation, every charge made in the publications. In the second place, the answer averred the truth of the publications, thus supplying the supposed deficiencies now complained of and further emphasizing the issue to which the respondents' evidence was directed. In such a case we are admonished by the statute to proceed with the decision of the cause on its merits, disregarding technicalities. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1752 (P. C. 81, § 1255); German American Bank v. Wright, 85 Wash. 460, 148 Pac. 769; Yeisley v. Smith, 82 Wash. 693, 144 Pac. 918; Kelly v. Lum, 75 Wash. 135, 134 Pac. 819, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151; Gaskill v. Northern Assur. Co. 73 Wash. 668, 132 Pac. 643; Bonne v. Security Sav. Soc. 35 Wash. 696, 78 Pac. 38.

In the third place, if the matter published was libelous per se, it was not incumbent upon the respondents to allege its untruth. That was a matter of defense which to be available must be alleged and proven as such. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 293 (P. C. 81, § 277). At common law, of which the statute is merely declaratory, the truth of a libelous charge, though no defense in a criminal prosecution for libel, was usually a complete defense in a civil action for damages. State v. Sefrit, 82 Wash. 520, 144 Pac. 725; Haynes v. Spokane Chronicle Pub. Co. 11 Wash. 503, 39 Pac. 969; Leghorn v. Review Pub. Co. 31 Wash. 627, 72 Pac. 485; 4 Blackstone, Commentaries, p. 150.

This disposes also of appellant's claim that the court erred in refusing a continuance when respondents were permitted to amend their complaint by inserting the specific allegation that the publications were false. This presented no new issue. The motion for a continuance was properly denied.

On the merits it is contended that a verdict for the appellant should have been directed at the close of all the evidence. Several reasons are assigned for this claim. We shall consider them in what seems to be their logical order.

[513] I. It is claimed, in substance, that the offending publications, being merely critical of matters of public interest, fall within the rule of qualified privilege and were therefore not libelous per se. Matters of such public interest as fall within the rule of qualified privilege are classified in Newell on Slander and Libel (2d ed.) p. 576, as follows:

"(1) Matters concerning the administration of the government. (2) Matters pertaining to the administration of public justice. (3) Matters relating to the management of public institutions and local authorities. (4) Matters relating to appeals for public patronage. (5) Matters concerning literary publications, books and pictures. (6) Matters concerning the character and quality of public entertainments. (7) Matters relating to religious bodies, churches and associations."

It is obvious that the publications here in question do not fall within any of these classes unless it be "matters relating to appeals for public patronage." That class, however, relates to those who are in a sense public characters, such as seekers for office, artists, inventors, showmen, patent medicine men, and such others as by appeals to the public by advertisement, in a special sense directly challenge public criticism of their claims. Newell, Slander and Libel (2d ed.) p. 583. There is nothing of that nature in the case presented here. The mere fact that a man's business, in a sense, touches the health and comfort of his customers or patrons does not invoke the rule of special privilege against him. Those who desire to criticise the manner in which his business is conducted are sufficiently protected against an action for damages by their absolute immunity in publishing the uncolored truth, and against a criminal prosecution in a proper case by negating malice, which, under our present criminal statute, is the gist of the criminal offense of libel. State v. Sefrit, supra. We have been cited to no authority, and have been able to find none, which would carry the rule of qualified privilege to the extent here asserted.

[514] II. Not being privileged, the next question is: Were the articles libelous per se? Our criminal statute defines libel against the living as follows:

"Every malicious publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, sign or otherwise than by mere speech, which shall tend:

"(1) To expose any living person to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy, or to deprive him of the benefit of public confidence or social intercourse; or . . .

"(3) To injure any person, corporation, or association of persons in his or their business or occupation, shall be a libel. . . . Rem. & Bal. Code, § 2424 (P. C. 135, § 343).

Eliminating the statutory element of malice, either actual or implied, an essential only of criminal libel, this definition meets the essentials of libel actionable per se as generally recognized in civil actions for damages. Newell, Slander and Libel (2d ed.) p. 43.

"Unfortunately, the law of libel has been obscured by a mass of technicalities and subtle refinements. When language is used concerning a person or his affairs which, from its nature, necessarily must, or presumably will, as its natural and proximate consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, its publication prima facie constitutes a cause of action, and prima facie constitutes a wrong, without any allegation or evidence of damage other than that which is implied or presumed from the fact of publication; that this is all that is meant by the term 'actionable per se.' Therefore the real practical test, by which to determine whether special damage must be alleged and proved in order to make out a cause of action for defamation, is whether the language is such as necessarily must or naturally and presumably will, occasion pecuniary damage to the person of whom it is spoken." Pratt v. Pioneer Press Co. 35 Minn. 251, 28 N. W. 708.

That the articles here in question had the clear tendency to injure the respondents in their partnership business is too plain for argument. They charged that this restaurant was hot, dirty, poorly ventilated, and insinuated the presence of "microbes." The natural meaning of the words used was [515] that the restaurant was an unwholesome place and unfit for public patronage. It has been held libelous per se to charge the sale of diseased and unwholesome meat. Mowry v. Raabe, 89 Cal. 606, 27 Pac. 157; Young v. Kuhn, 71 Tex. 645, 9 S. W. 860. It has also been held actionable per se to charge that a hotel keeper "kept no accommodations, and a person could not get a decent meal or decent bed if he tried." Trimmer v. Hiscock, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 364. The articles here in question were, from their natural tendency, actionable per se.

III. It is next claimed that there ~~was~~ a failure of proof because there was no evidence of malice. If this were a criminal prosecution, malice would be a material element and would be inferred from the necessary tendency of the articles. The criminal statute so declares. Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 2424, 2425 (P. C. 135, §§ 343, 345). But in this state malice is not an essential element of civil libel. This results from the nature of the case. The civil action for libel is an action for damages, and, as in other actions sounding in tort, compensatory damages only can be recovered. It is obvious that these would be the same no matter what the motive which inspired the publication. Malice could only be material on the question of punitive or exemplary damage. But in this state punitive or exemplary damages cannot be recovered except where specifically authorized by statute. Spokane Truck, etc. Co. v. Hoefer, 2 Wash. 45, 25 Pac. 1072, 26 Am. St. Rep. 842, 11 L.R.A. 689; Willson v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 5 Wash. 621, 32 Pac.

468, 34 Pac. 146; Sloan v. Langert, 6 Wash. 26, 32 Pac. 1015; Seattle Crockery Co. v. Haley, 6 Wash. 302, 33 Pac. 650, 36 Am. St. Rep. 156; McGill v. Fuller, 45 Wash. 615, 88 Pac. 1038; Caldwell v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 56 Wash. 223, 105 Pac. 625; Baer v. Chambers, 67 Wash. 357, 121 Pac. 843, Ann. Cas. 1913D 559; Phillips v. Thomas, 70 Wash. 533, 127 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1914B 800, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 582; Corcoran v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 80 Wash. 570, 142 Pac. 29, L.R.A.1915B 552. We have no statute allowing exemplary or punitive damages for libel. [516] In two cases this court has held that, in a civil action for libel, the element of malice is immaterial. Byrne v. Funk, 38 Wash. 506, 3 Ann. Cas. 647, 80 Pac. 772; Woodhouse v. Powles, 43 Wash. 617, 11 Ann. Cas. 54, 86 Pac. 1063, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1079, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 783.

In the Byrne case, this holding was apparently based on the fact that malice was not included as an essential element in the then existing statute defining criminal libel. Ballinger's Code, § 7087; Rem. & Bal. Code, § 2777. In the Woodhouse case, it was based definitely, and as we now conceive more logically and soundly, upon the ground that compensatory damages alone can be recovered in a civil action for libel. While our present statute defining criminal libel makes malice an essential element, that is because the action is punitive in its nature. The civil action being merely compensatory in its nature, and there being no statute authorizing punitive damages in such cases, it follows of necessity that malice or lack of malice is still immaterial in such cases, notwithstanding the change in the statutory definition of criminal libel.

IV. It is also urged that the articles were not libelous in that they did not mention the name of either of the respondents. We find no merit in this claim. The complaint, considered in its entirety, did not state a cause of action in favor of the respondents as individuals, but as partners. The libel was a libel touching their partnership business. The articles did mention the name of that business, which was known as the "Epler Cafe." By designating the name of their business, the article had just as damaging an effect upon the partnership business as if it had mentioned the names of the partners.

V. Finally, it is asserted that there was a total failure of proof of damages. Though the publication was not actuated by malice, it was actionable per se. The respondents were at least entitled to nominal damages, unless the things stated in the offending articles were true. The appellant attempted [517] to prove their truth in justification. There was much evidence so tending. There was also much evidence to the contrary. On this conflict of evidence the question was clearly one for the jury. The verdict, being supported by substantial evidence that the charges were untrue, concludes the question. A review of this phase of the evidence would be useless.

But it was still incumbent on the respondents to prove actual damages to justify a recovery more than nominal. They attempted to prove specific damages by evidence of a falling off of the patronage of the restaurant, occasioned by the publication of the articles. Over appellant's objections, they sought to show, by the testimony of certain employees and a few customers, that there was a decided falling off in patronage immediately following the publication of the articles, especially after the appearance of the first article. This evidence was vague and unsatisfactory at best. They also introduced their books of account, but these showed that, beginning some six months prior to the publication of the first article, there had been a gradual falling off in attendance and a consequent reduction in the receipts of the business, and that this reduction continued at practically the same rate subsequent to the publication of the articles as prior thereto, until the restaurant was finally sold in December, 1913. They also introduced in evidence, over objection, a list of names of some nineteen persons who, it was stated by one of the respondents, stopped dining at the Epler Cafe immediately following the publication of the articles. He admitted, however, that as to most of these his information was based on hearsay. The other partner, who furnished the list, did not attempt to say that, by interviewing the persons named, or otherwise, he learned their reasons for the discontinuance. Four or five witnesses testified that they stopped dining at the restaurant after the publication of the articles. One of them had dined there but once. Another testified that he personally knew of the condition of the kitchen and only two or three of them testified that they failed to return to the [518] respondents' restaurant on account of the publications. Over objection, the respondents were permitted to testify as to what they paid for the business and what it was finally sold for on December 1, 1913. The respondent Wilson testified that he bought his half interest in October, 1911, for $6,500, and the respondent Carle that he bought his half interest in October, 1912, for $6,800. Carle testified that when he sold he received for "the whole outfit" $3,500. It does not clearly appear whether this represented one-half of the sale price or the whole sale price. This last evidence was clearly inadmissible, especially in view of the fact that, prior to the publication of the articles, the respondents' own books showed that their business was already falling off at a rate which continued but was not accelerated after the publication of the articles in question. It is obvious that many other elements might have, and probably did, enter into the purchase price and sale price of a business such as a restaurant. The evidence seems to us entirely too speculative and remote to have any probative value on the issue of damages and should have been excluded.

The appellant introduced evidence of the fact that, during the period of the decline of the respondents' business, several competing restaurants and cafes were started in adjoining blocks and in the immediate neighborhood of their place of business. It is the undisputed testimony of experienced restaurant men that this fact alone would have a necessary tendency to diminish the respondents' business. A careful consideration of all of the testimony touching special damages by diminution in patronage occasioned by the offending articles, forces the conviction that there was no such proof of any material falling off of patronage or any measurable or material injury to respondents' business caused by the publications as to take the question of special damages to the jury. In view of the showing made by respondents' own books which indicated a steady falling off beginning long prior to the publication of the articles, and in view of the [519] proof that the near location of several competing establishments would amply account for its steady continuance, we think that the vague testimony touching a few isolated instances of desertion of patrons because of the articles was wholly insufficient to constitute more than a scintilla of evidence of damage reasonably traceable to the publications. The only reasonable inference is that it was due to the adequate cause proven.

A case closely in point is presented in Trimmer v. Hiscock, supra. The defendant sued for damages for slanderous words injuring his business as a hotel keeper. He attempted to prove special damages by showing that, since about the time of the alleged slanderous words, there was a falling off in his business. This, however, was accounted for by the plaintiff's own witnesses, who testified that about that time a Good Templars organization was effected in the village and that many of his old customers and patrons joined the organization and ceased to frequent his house. Also, that at about that time numerous prosecutions were instituted against him for violations of the excise laws, and that it was due to this organization and these prosecutions that his business declined. A nonsuit was granted, but the supreme court held that while there was no proof of special damages, the words were actionable per se, and remanded the case for trial on that account.

VI. But one other question remains to be considered. The respondents, over the appellant's objection, were permitted to introduce the testimony of one of the partners as to his standing and reputation and the standing of his family in the community. It was objected that this testimony was immaterial in that the action was one for injury to the partnership business, and that injury to the reputations and feelings of either partner as an individual was not in issue. The objection was overruled, but the inquiry was not further pursued. Little evidence was offered showing an injury to the reputation of either of the partners, or humiliation or [520] mental suffering by either, on account of the publications. In any event we think such testimony was inadmissible. The rule which we conceive to be the correct one is thus stated in Newell, Slander and Libel (2d ed.) p. 371:

"Two or more partners may join in an action of slander for words spoken of them in the way of their trade, whereby they have sustained special damage. They may sue jointly for slander of them in respect of their trade without showing the proportion of their respective shares. But damages cannot be given in such an action for any injury to the private feelings of the plaintiffs, but only for such injury as they may have sustained in their joint trade or business."

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in Gazynski v. Colburn, 11 Cush. 10, states the rule as follows:

"It has always been held that when words are spoken of two or more persons, they cannot join in an action for the words, because the wrong done to one is no wrong to the other. The case of husband and wife is not an exception to this rule. The exceptions to it are the case of words spoken of partners in the way of their trade, and the case of slander of the title of joint owners of land."

In Donaghue v. Gaffy, 53 Conn. 43, 2 Atl. 397, the supreme court of Connecticut said:

"We will only add that it is well settled that in an action for libel by two or more partners, damages cannot be recovered for any injury to their private feelings, but only for such injury as they may have sustained in their joint trade or business."

For a case closely analogous in principle, see also our recent decision in Hall v. Gallo-way, 76 Wash. 42, 135 Pac. 478. The court, touching this question, instructed the jury as follows:

"If, therefore, you should find from the evidence that the defendant published the article or articles charged in the complaint and that they were calculated to injure the plaintiffs either in their reputation or in their business by either exposing them or either of them to ridicule or contempt or to [521] injuriously affect their reputation or the reputation of either of them in the community, or injuriously affect their business as restaurant proprietors, then, unless the defendant should prove it was justified in publishing the articles, you must find for the plaintiffs."

This instruction was repeated in substance several times in different parts of the charge. It is clearly erroneous for two reasons. In the first place, there was little evidence of injury to the reputation of either partner as an individual, and no evidence of injury to the separate business of either. The publications, though libelous per se, made no reference to either of the respondents personally except in one instance, and that in connection with the partnership property. They made no reference to the separate business of either. In the second place, the only damages recoverable in this action are, according to the foregoing authorities, such damages as resulted in injury to the partnership business itself, and to the partners in their joint capacity.

It is clear, therefore, that the judgment must be reversed. There was no evidence of special damages sufficient to take the case to the jury, and the element of damage to reputation or feelings, or the separate business of the respondents as individuals, could not be considered in this joint action. The respondents were only entitled to nominal damages under the evidence.

We find no merit in respondents' claim that there was a mere misjoinder of parties and that the objection thereto was waived by the failure of appellant to demur to the complaint. There was no misjoinder. The complaint itself was in the name of the plaintiffs as partners. The appellant had a right to construe it according to its legal effect as an action for damages to the partnership business. The objection to treating it otherwise was interposed as soon as evidence tending to prove individual damage was offered. A review of the authorities cited by respondents in this connection [522] would be idle. They are clearly distinguishable on the facts and in the nature of the cases.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded with direction to enter a judgment for the respondents for nominal damages only.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a publication relating to the sanitary condition of a restaurant is not privileged as a comment on a matter of public interest, though it is made as part of a systematic newspaper investigation of the condition of the eating houses in a city. Comment on matters of public interest as libel or slander is discussed at length in the note to Flanagan v. Nicholson Publishing Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 402.

BISHOP ET AL.

FISCHER.

Kansas Supreme Court—January 9, 1915.

94 Kan. 105; 145 Pac. 890.

Receivers — Jurisdiction in Receivership Proceeding — Orders to Third Persons.

The plaintiffs' lessee bored producing gas wells on the plaintiffs' land and on the lessee's land, and connected the wells by pipes converged in a building erected by the lessee on the plaintiffs' land, where a meter, a pressure gauge, and other gas appliances were installed. From this point the gas produced was conducted to a pipe line located in a highway alongside the plaintiffs' land. The pipe line belonged to a corporation for which a receiver was appointed by the district court. The receiver was authorized by the court to purchase gas from the plaintiffs' lessee, which the receiver distributed to consumers. The plaintiffs took possession of the building, pipes, and appliances on their own land and stopped the flow of gas into the pipe line under a claim of right predicated upon their contract with the lessee. Upon application made in the receivership suit, the receiver procured an order directing a person designated by the court to remove the obstructions preventing the flow of gas into the pipe line and enjoining the plaintiffs from maintaining such obstruction or interfering with the order. Neither the plaintiffs nor their lessee were parties to the receivership suit, and the order was procured without notice to them. The order having been executed, the plaintiffs moved to set it aside because it had been made without jurisdiction. The court modified the order but did not vacate it. Held, the court had no jurisdiction over the parties or over the property affected by the order, the order was void, and the court may be required by writ of mandamus issuing from this court to set aside the order.

Appearance — What Constitutes — Motion to Set Aside Order for Want of Jurisdiction.

The contents of the plaintiffs' motion to set aside the order considered and held not to constitute a general appearance in the receivership suit.

[See note at end of this case.]

Original action for mandamus. George J. Bishop et al., plaintiffs, and Edward L. Fischer, District Judge, defendant. The facts are stated in the opinion. DISMISSED.

James F. Getty for plaintiffs.

Ed. C. Little for defendant.

[106] BURCH, J.—The plaintiffs ask for a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the defendant as judge of the district court to set aside an order of the court.

Briefly stated, the essential facts disclosed at the hearing are these. The plaintiffs own a tract of land which they leased for oil and gas purposes. The American Gas Company has gas rights in an adjoining tract. Two producing wells were bored on the plaintiffs' land and several producing wells were bored on the American Gas Company's land. Pipes were laid on the plaintiffs' land connecting all these wells, whereby gas produced was conducted to a common point on the plaintiffs' land. A building was erected there in which were installed a meter, a pressure gauge, and other gas appliances. From this point gas was conducted to a pipe line laid in the highway alongside the plaintiffs' land. The American Gas Company became the plaintiffs' lessee, and their claim is that the American Gas Company became such lessee upon the condition that if rentals and royalties were not paid they might terminate the lease and take possession of the pipes, building, and gas appliances on their land. Rentals and royalties were not paid. The American Gas Company became bankrupt, the plaintiffs undertook to forfeit the lease, and pursuant to their claimed contract rights they took possession of the pipes, buildings, and gas appliances on their own land. The appliances were chained and padlocked in such a way as to prevent the flow of gas into the pipe line in the highway. The pipe line in the highway belonged to the Mid-Continent Development Company. In August, 1911, in an action entitled L. E. Incho v. The Mid-Continent Development Company, a receiver was appointed for the development company. Subsequently the court authorized the receiver to purchase all the gas furnished by [107] the American Gas Company, and gas obtained in this way was distributed to consumers. Neither the plaintiffs nor the American Gas Company were parties to the receivership suit and the receiver had no possession of the property involved in this suit, or authority over it. When the plaintiffs took possession of the means whereby gas which the receiver was authorized to buy was delivered, the receiver made an ex parte application to the court for an order, which was granted without notice in the following terms:

"It is therefore considered, ordered and adjudged that George Holmes as employee of the American Gas Co. remove the obstructions preventing the flow of gas from the American Gas Company's pipe lines to the Mid-Continent Development Company's pipe line and that James F. Getty and George Bishop no longer maintain any obstruction to the said flow of gas and in no way interfere with this order, until the further orders of this court."

Holmes was in fact an employee of the receiver and proceeded to execute the order by breaking into the building on the plaintiffs' land and removing locks and chains which obstructed the flow of gas into the pipe line. The order was made on November 11, 1914. After its execution, and on November 14, the plaintiffs moved the court to set aside the order on the ground that it had been made without jurisdiction. After a hearing the court modified the order in such a way as to permit the plaintiffs to cut off the flow of gas from their own wells but allowed the order to stand as to gas flowing from the American Gas Company's wells. The court disclaimed jurisdiction over the plaintiffs, but believed that the public, to whom the receiver was distributing gas coming from the American Gas Company's wells, should not have its supply cut off by any summary or arbitrary act of the plaintiffs, and on that ground reserved further judgment until it could consider the proper course to be pursued. Thereupon the [108] plaintiffs brought the present action, which the receiver defends for the judge of the district court.

This court has jurisdiction to issue the writ prayed for. It is granted original jurisdiction in proceedings in mandamus by the constitution. (Art. 3, § 3.) This jurisdiction is plenary and may be exercised to control the action of inferior courts, over whom this court has superintending authority. (In re Petitt, 84 Kan. 637, 114 Pac. 1071.)

The action of mandamus cannot be used as a substitute for appeal, nor in any case where a plain and adequate remedy at law exists. In this case, however, there was no action pending against the plaintiffs in the district court. Without having jurisdiction of the plaintiffs and without having jurisdiction of the property, the district court, without notice, issued a mandatory injunction which in effect adjudicated the plaintiffs' rights and deprived them of the peaceable possession of property which no one

their business by either exposing them or either of them to ridicule or contempt or to [521] injuriously affect their reputation or the reputation of either of them in the community, or injuriously affect their business as restaurant proprietors, then, unless the defendant should prove it was justified in publishing the articles, you must find for the plaintiffs."

This instruction was repeated in substance several times in different parts of the charge. It is clearly erroneous for two reasons. In the first place, there was little evidence of injury to the reputation of either partner as an individual, and no evidence of injury to the separate business of either. The publications, though libelous per se, made no reference to either of the respondents personally except in one instance, and that in connection with the partnership property. They made no reference to the separate business of either. In the second place, the only damages recoverable in this action are, according to the foregoing authorities, such damages as resulted in injury to the partnership business itself, and to the partners in their joint capacity.

It is clear, therefore, that the judgment must be reversed. There was no evidence of special damages sufficient to take the case to the jury, and the element of damage to reputation or feelings, or the separate business of the respondents as individuals, could not be considered in this joint action. The respondents were only entitled to nominal damages under the evidence.

We find no merit in respondents' claim that there was a mere misjoinder of parties and that the objection thereto was waived by the failure of appellant to demur to the complaint. There was no misjoinder. The complaint itself was in the name of the plaintiffs as partners. The appellant had a right to construe it according to its legal effect as an action for damages to the partnership business. The objection to treating it otherwise was interposed as soon as evidence tending to prove individual damage was offered. A review of the authorities cited by respondents in this connection [522] would be idle. They are clearly distinguishable on the facts and in the nature of the cases.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded with direction to enter a judgment for the respondents for nominal damages only.

Getty and George Bishop no longer maintain any obstruction to the said flow of gas and in no way interfere with this order, until the further orders of this court."

Holmes was in fact an employee of the receiver and proceeded to execute the order by breaking into the building on the plaintiffs' land and removing locks and chains which obstructed the flow of gas into the pipe line. The order was made on November 11, 1914. After its execution, and on November 14, the plaintiffs moved the court to set aside the order on the ground that it had been made without jurisdiction. After a hearing the court modified the order in such a way as to permit the plaintiffs to cut off the flow of gas from their own wells but allowed the order to stand as to gas flowing from the American Gas Company's wells. The court disclaimed jurisdiction over the plaintiffs, but believed that the public, to whom the receiver was distributing gas coming from the American Gas Company's wells, should not have its supply cut off by any summary or arbitrary act of the plaintiffs, and on that ground reserved further judgment until it could consider the proper course to be pursued. Thereupon the [108] plaintiffs brought the present action, which the receiver defends for the judge of the district court.

This court has jurisdiction to issue the writ prayed for. It is granted original jurisdiction in proceedings in mandamus by the constitution. (Art. 3, § 3.) This jurisdiction is plenary and may be exercised to control the action of inferior courts, over whom this court has superintending authority. (In re Petitt, 84 Kan. 637, 114 Pac. 1071.)

The action of mandamus cannot be used as a substitute for appeal, nor in any case where a plain and adequate remedy at law exists. In this case, however, there was no action pending against the plaintiffs in the district court. Without having jurisdiction of the plaintiffs and without having jurisdiction of the property, the district court, without notice, issued a mandatory injunction which in effect adjudicated the plaintiffs' rights and deprived them of the peaceable possession of property which no one cause and person, this is a submission to the jurisdiction, and waives all defects in the service of process." (p. 580.)

In the early case of Cohen v. Trowbridge, 6 Kan. 385, which has been followed many times, the syllabus reads:

"A motion in a cause based wholly on an alleged want of jurisdiction is not an appearance generally, or a waiver of any irregularity in the proceedings by which a party is attempted to be brought into court; but a motion, grounded wholly or in part upon error in the judgment, or upon irregularities, aside from the question of jurisdiction, is such waiver as constitutes an appearance." (Syl. ¶ 3.)

The plaintiffs' motion may be read in such a way as to indicate a general submission to the jurisdiction of the court, but here, as elsewhere in procedure, substance [114] alone is to be regarded, and it is quite clear that the sole purpose was to challenge jurisdiction. The plaintiffs did not ask to be made parties, and the relief sought, the dissolution of the order, is entirely consistent with want of jurisdiction, and could be granted upon the hypothesis that the court had no jurisdiction. This relief was not asked because of error in granting the order or on the ground of irregularity aside from the question of jurisdiction. The plaintiffs desired no decree that they owned the property. Indeed, it would have been impossible for the court to adjudicate that fact as the case stood—on a simple motion and in the absence of the American Gas Company, which was not a party. The facts concerning the ownership and location of the property were stated to show the character of the right invaded, that the plaintiffs were claimants of absolute property interests which the court lacked power to divest summarily by an ex parte order. Likewise the plaintiffs did not desire a decree that they were free from relations with the receiver in the marketing of gas and use of the pipes. The facts concerning those matters were stated to show that the plaintiffs were not related to the business of the receivership in any way which would give the court jurisdiction over them or over the property in controversy. Read in this way the motion is consistent throughout with the idea of a special appearance to set aside the order for want of jurisdiction. While the plaintiffs ran some risk in thus attempting to exclude grounds of jurisdiction, the court is satisfied that such was their purpose, and such being their purpose, the court will not enlarge the appearance to make it general. This court is all the more ready to adopt this conclusion because it seems to have been the view of the district court. The proposition that the plaintiffs made a general appearance is presented for the first time by the receiver in this court. The district court's view was indicated at the close of the hearing as follows:

"The Court: I have jurisdiction over the receiver [115] and the receiver and people under him have equities and they are in court and entitled to the protection of this court to the extent of preventing any one cutting off the supply of the gas without right. Now I am not sure just what the rights are in regard to that pipe going across this land; but I don't believe Mr. Bishop has any right to jump in there and tear up a main or close it off, that is, a general supply pipe, from customers of wells back behind his land so as to keep it away from whoever acquires the right to use it.

"Mr. Getty: They are using our land.

"The Court: This pipe runs across there and does not hurt your land as I get it. . . . I have no more jurisdiction over Mr. Bishop than anybody else, but he should not interfere with the supply of gas to these consumers."

The judge of the district court acted candidly and conscientiously. His solicitude for people who might be depending in part upon this supply of fuel and light in wintertime was commendable, and his reservation of final decision until he could satisfy himself fully as to the proper course to pursue was the result of this solicitude. Under these circumstances the present order will be that if the order of the district court be set aside within ten days from the filing of this opinion, this proceeding will be dismissed without costs, which are practically nominal, to either party.

NOTE.

Moving to Set Aside Order in Cause for Want of Jurisdiction as General or Special Appearance.

While there is little or no direct authority on the point, the holding of the reported case that a motion to set aside an order in a cause for want of jurisdiction does not constitute a general appearance seems to be supported by the following cases: Lively v. Picton, 218 Fed. 401, 134 C. C. A. 189; Mitchell Min. Co. v. Emig, 35 App. Cas. (D. C.) 527; Kanne v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 33 Minn. 419, 23 N. W. 854; Multnomah Lumber Co. v. Weston Basket Co. 54 Ore. 22, 99 Pac. 1046, 102 Pac. 1; Kilpatrick v. Horton, 15 Wyo. 501, 89 Pac. 1035. Thus in Multnomah Lumber Co. v. Weston Basket Co. supra, it was said: "A special appearance is made by a party when he or his attorney in a suit or action seeks to obtain from the court an order vacating some proceeding which, it is insisted, has been undertaken by the adverse party in an unauthorized manner." In Mitchell Min. Co. v. Emig, 35 App. Cas. (D. C.) 527, the court said: "It is well settled that one cannot avail himself of the right to vacate the process after a general appearance to the merits. . . . We do not consider the motion in this case as amounting to such an appearance. Its sole ground was the invalidity of the return because the corporation was not doing any business in the district, and had no office therefor at which process could be left, and the appearance was special for that purpose. It is true the motion was also to vacate the several orders made in the case, and dismiss the petition. Assuming that this was going farther and asking more than the appellant was entitled to, still the single ground upon which the vacation of the orders was prayed was the invalidity of the process." So in Kanne v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 33 Minn. 419, 23 N. W. 854, in condemnation proceedings which the defendant had instituted against the plaintiff, the defendant made a motion to set aside the award. The court in holding that the defendant did not appear generally said: "Subsequently to the commencement of this action, plaintiff made a motion to set aside the award upon the grounds, among others, that no notice of the meeting of the commissioners was ever given him; that the commissioners were guilty of irregularities and misconduct; and also that the award had not been paid within six months. This motion the court denied, and at the same time denied a counter-motion by defendant for judgment on the award. From the order denying plaintiff's motion no appeal was taken. Defendant now contends that by thus uniting, as grounds of his motion, other matters with those that were jurisdictional, he appeared generally, and thereby waived all objections to jurisdiction, within the doctrine of Curtis v. Jackson, 23 Minn. 268. While there is no doubt of the correctness of the proposition laid down in the case cited, that if a party does not limit his appearance to jurisdictional questions, but also calls into action the powers of the court for other purposes, it is a general appearance, and he thereby submits to the jurisdiction of the court thereafter, yet it may admit of doubt whether the proposition was not misapplied in making such appearance relate back in point of time so as to validate a void judgment previously rendered. But the want of this notice of the meeting of the commissioners goes, not to the jurisdiction of the person of the landowner, but to the authority of the commissioners to act. This notice has respect to the compensation of the landowner, and the object of it is to give him an opportunity to be heard on that question. Without it, the commissioners have no authority to make an assessment of his compensation or damages."

In Kilpatrick v. Horton, 15 Wyo. 501, 89 Pac. 1035, the rule appears to have been recognized although it was held that the institution of proceedings to vacate orders relating to the compensation of a receiver on both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional grounds constituted a general appearance. The holding in Lively v. Picton, 218 Fed. 401, 134 C. C. A. 189, does not appear to conflict with the rule laid down in the reported case. It was therein held that the action of a corporation in demurring to a petition for the appointment of a receiver, and in moving to set aside an entry for the appointment of a receiver without limiting its appearance to the sole purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court over its person, constituted a general appearance.

Whether an appearance for the purpose of moving to set aside an attachment for lack of jurisdiction constitutes a general or a special appearance is considered in the note to Davis v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 18 Ann. Cas. 907. And for a discussion of the general principles governing the question whether an appearance is special or general, see the note to Rogers v. Penobscot Min. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914A 1184.

RAST ET AL.

VAN DEMAN AND LEWIS COMPANY ET AL.

United States Supreme Court—March 6, 1916.

240 U. S. 342; 36 S. Ct. 370.

Injunctions — Against Enforcement of Penal Statute.

The threatened enforcement by state officers through civil or criminal proceedings, of a state statute which is attacked as repugnant to the Federal Constitution, may be enjoined by a federal court, where the statute, if exerted against complainants and their property, will produce irreparable injury.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 121; 19 Ann. Cas. 459; 35 Am. St. Rep. 677.]

Trading Stamps — Imposition of License Tax — Validity.

There is such a difference between the selling of goods accompanied by coupons, profit-sharing certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness or liability redeemable in premiums, and the selling of goods without such inducements to purchasers, that the imposition upon the former business of an additional license tax for each place in each and every county in which said business is conducted, as is done by Florida Laws 1913, chap. 6421, § 35, does not offend against the equal protection of the laws clause of the Federal Constitution.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The delivery by a Florida merchant of coupons, profit-sharing certificates, or other evidence of indebtedness or liability redeemable in premiums, in connection with sales of merchandise at retail, is not interstate commerce so as to be protected against the imposition of a state license tax, although the coupons may have been inserted in the retail packages by the manufacturer or shipper outside the state, and are redeemable outside the state, either by such manufacturer or shipper, or by some other agency outside the state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The permission, if any, granted by the amendment of the Act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. at L. 715, chap. 1371, 3 Fed. St. Ann. 748), § 2, to U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3394, to inclose in packages of tobacco redeemable coupons, profit-sharing certificates, etc., does not extend to retail sales of such packages within a state so as to invalidate state restrictions upon such sales.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Contract obligations are not unconstitutionally impaired by the imposition, under Florida Laws 1913, chap. 6421, § 35, of an additional license fee upon merchants offering with merchandise bargained or sold coupons, profit-sharing certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness or liability redeemable in premiums, since the statute must be deemed to be prospective in its operation, and not to affect sales completed before its enactment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Liberty to contract is not unconstitutionally infringed, contrary to the due process of law clause of U. S. Const. 14th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), by Florida Laws 1913, chap. 6421, § 35, making merchants offering with merchandise bargained or sold any coupons, profit-sharing certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness or liability redeemable in premiums, liable to pay an additional license tax, which may be prohibitive, and, if the same are to be redeemed by someone else than the merchant offering them, liable to pay a similar license fee for the one who is to redeem.

[See note at end of this case.]

Fines and Penalties — Excessiveness — Preventing Test of Statute.

The penalties of $1,000 fine, or six months' imprisonment, prescribed by Florida Laws 1913, chap. 6421, § 35, for violations of its provisions against the sale without payment of the specified license fee, of merchandise accompanied by coupons, profit-sharing certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness, or other liability redeemable in premiums, are not so severe as to intimidate against a contest of the validity of such statute, and thus deny the equal protection of the laws.

Appeal from United States District Court, Southern District of Florida.

Action by Van Deman and Lewis Company, et al., plaintiffs, against John W. Rast, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the Opinion.

REVERSED.

[344] A statute of Florida approved June 5, 1913 (Vol. 1, p. 3), imposing licenses and other taxes, provides that merchants, druggists and storekeepers shall pay a license tax upon the cash value of the "stock of merchandise" of $3 for the first $1000 or fraction thereof, and $1.50 for each additional $1000 or fraction thereof. The tax upon wholesale dealers is $1.50 upon each $1000. The statute has this proviso: § 35, p. 35.

"Provided, further, That each and every person, firm or corporation, who shall offer with merchandise bargained or sold in the course of trade any coupon, profit-sharing certificate, or other evidence of indebtedness or liability, redeemable in premiums, shall pay annually a State license tax of Five Hundred ($500.00) dollars and a County license tax of two hundred and fifty ($250.00) dollars in each and every county in which said business is conducted or carried on, and if more than one place of such business shall be operated by any person, firm or corporation, a separate State and County license shall be taken out for each such place; and no person, firm or corporation shall offer with merchandise, bargained or sold as aforesaid, any coupon, profit-sharing certificate or other evidence of indebtedness or liability, redeemable by any other person, firm or corporation than the one offering the same without paying the above license for each other person, firm or corporation who may redeem the same. The license prescribed in this section shall be in addition to other licenses prescribed by this Act. Any [345] person violating any of the provisions of this section, whether acting for himself or as the agent of another, shall on conviction thereof be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand ($1000) dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months.

"Mercantile Agencies: Shall pay a license tax of one hundred ($100.00) dollars in each county in which an office is established.

"Merchants using trading stamps, shall pay a license tax of two hundred and fifty ($250.00) dollars for each place of business where they use such stamps.

"Merchant tailors shall pay a license tax of ten ($10.00) dollars for each place of business."

This suit was instituted by appellees (Florida merchants) against appellant Rast as tax collector of Duval County, Florida, and the tax collectors of each county in the State, the different State's attorneys, county solicitors and prosecuting attorneys of the circuits and counties of Florida. The purpose of the suit was to restrain those officers from proceeding under the statute or enforcing it. A preliminary and perpetual injunction was prayed and that the act be declared unconstitutional, illegal and void.

The bill is very elaborate and we select from its repetitions and condense the following: It alleges the various businesses in which the complainants are engaged. The Van Deman & Lewis Company is a Florida corporation and a wholesale grocer, doing business as such and selling groceries in certain counties in the State; Harkisheimer Company is also a Florida corporation and is a retail grocer; J. S. Pinkussohn Cigar Company is a corporation organized under the laws of South Carolina and is a wholesale and retail merchant buying and selling cigars and other tobacco products in the cities of Jacksonville and Pensacola, Florida. With these complainants were joined others, corporations and individuals, doing business in Florida.

[346] It is alleged that complainants and each of them in the conduct of their business offer for sale and deal in various and numerous articles of merchandise manufactured and produced in other States than Florida by persons and corporations in those States and shipped into Florida to be sold therein, and who, for the purpose of advertising their businesses and increasing their sales, enclose in the packages in which the merchandise is put up for market and sale coupons, slips, certificates and other profit-sharing discount or premium tokens. The articles and the persons and companies producing them are enumerated.

The manner or method of disposing of and redeeming and taking up such coupons, etc., is alleged to be that the same are enclosed in packages or the wrappers thereof, or are a part of the wrappers, the packages are put into boxes, cases or other receptacles or enclosures and shipped by the manufacturer or producer from his place of business outside of Florida to the merchants in Florida, generally to a wholesale merchant or jobber, and are received by such in Florida and sold to the retail merchants in that State. The retail merchant sells them to his customers. When the latter have accumulated a sufficient number of the coupons, etc., to entitle them to receive a premium or article or payment therefor according to some list, catalogue or rule promulgated by the manufacturer, producer or original shipper, they send such coupons, etc., to such manufacturer, producer or original shipper, or in some instances, to a company or agency in some State other than Florida, where they are redeemed or paid or the articles which the purchasers have selected are sent to them in consideration of such coupons, etc., or for the same and a postage stamp or stamps or a small sum of money in addition thereto. And this in accordance with the contract, agreement or sale made to the purchasers by the manufacturer, shipper or producer outside of the [347] State. And it is alleged that the transactions so detailed, the manufacturer without the State and shipment to wholesale merchants within the State, the sale by the latter to retail merchants and by the latter again to customers, constitute interstate commerce.

That the form of the coupons, etc., varies and when its identity is secured as prescribed it is evidence that each purchaser of a package has bought a definite part of some article, to be selected by him or her from a certain list, the list showing a number of valuable articles which can be paid for by a certain number of the tokens and a two-cent stamp.

In another case there is an accumulation of the tokens which are to be sent to the redemption or coupon agency or corporation and exchanged for a valuable article of merchandise to be selected by the purchaser from a list or catalogue furnished him.

Another form of coupons, etc., is where each of them is good for a certain value, for instance, one-half cent in presents or premiums, the coupons being sent from the State of Florida to another State. There are also other forms in which the coupons or tokens are to be redeemed, paid for or used in the purchase of other articles of merchandise or in the accumulation of premiums or the like. All of the articles are known and largely used as legitimate articles of commerce and the transactions detailed are interstate commerce.

That divers forms of coupons, etc., in connection with the sale of merchandise are used by the merchants of the State substantially in similar form mentioned above and the payment or redemption is made by the Florida merchant in Florida, sometimes by the delivery of some valuable article of merchandise; sometimes by the payment of cash or the allowance of credit on account of purchases in the nature of a discount or for or on account of a certain amount having been purchased of the merchant by the [348] customer. The tokens are sometimes in the form of a cash register slip or memorandum.

That the methods detailed are a form of advertising and the use of such coupons, etc., induces purchasers to trade more largely with and to make more of their purchases from complainants on account of the additional inducement of such coupons, etc.; that they increase the businesses of complainants and their profits and enable them to carry and sell stocks of goods covering the various articles of merchandise, and are of great importance and value to complainants in their several businesses; and if they are prevented from using them their businesses will be decreased to the amount of many thousands of dollars.

That at the time of the passage of the statute complainants had on hand large amounts and quantities of goods and if they are prevented from selling them in the manner detailed they will be subjected to great loss and damage, will be embarrassed and injured in their businesses and the value of their property destroyed or greatly lessened.

That the transactions and methods give an additional value to purchasers and they are substantially benefited thereby. That there is no element of gambling or chance in the transactions and nothing in them or their methods prejudicial to the public health, safety, morals, or welfare.

That if there is a cessation of the transactions purchasers and customers who have received tokens but have not accumulated a sufficient number of them will be unable to have the same redeemed or paid or secure articles therewith. That about 500 merchants are similarly affected with complainants.

That certificates or tokens commonly called trading stamps and so designated in the statute are substantially like some of the tokens hereinbefore mentioned and [349] described and when delivered by retail merchants with the various articles sold to purchasers such purchasers are entitled to purchase or receive various valuable articles of merchandise, according to a list or catalogue, upon the presentation of the stamps to some person or company that has issued the trading stamps and that redeems them according to the provisions of such list or catalogue.

That under the statute every person, firm or corporation offering with merchandise any coupon, profit-sharing certificate or other evidence of indebtedness or liability redeemable in premiums is not only liable to pay the license tax for himself or itself but to pay such tax for every other person, firm or corporation who may redeem any such coupon, etc.

That such taxes are unreasonable, enormous and prohibitive on account of the number of articles sold, and by reason of the provision requiring complainants and each and every other person in like situation to pay the license tax to the State, and it is alleged with much circumstance that, from their number and the number of the articles that each sells, each and every person would be required to pay for license tax to the State and for one county or one place of business alone $15,000 per year or one-half that amount for six months or less time.

That as a result of the statute, if the tax be paid for only 100 persons or persons, firms or corporations, it would amount to $75,000 per annum; if for 1000 persons, firms or corporations in Florida for one place of business, it would amount to $750,000, and so on as to any number to be paid by and for each and every of such manufacturer, producer or shipper.

That such coupons, etc., enclosed in packages of tobacco and so delivered are authorized and rendered lawful by section 3394 of the Revised Statutes of the United [350] States as amended by § 10 of the act of July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 151, 206, c. 11, and by § 2 of the act of July 1, 1902, 32 Stat. 714, 715, c. 1371 (3 Fed. St. Ann. 748).

That the provision of § 35 (the provision quoted above) of the Florida statute and all provisions and enactments for its enforcement are in violation of the Constitution of the United States in that they violate (1) the commerce clause, (2) the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and (3) the equal protection clause of that amendment. There are many specifications of the particulars and it is alleged: (1) The statute discriminates between merchants in similar lines of business; (2) between merchants who advertise in a certain manner and those who advertise in another manner. (3) The taxes are not upon the business or occupation of complainants but upon the mere incidents of the business and are an unreasonable and illegal interference with the method and manner of conducting the business. (4) The taxes are unreasonable, arbitrary, oppressive, discriminatory and prohibitory for the reasons already detailed and are far in excess of the amounts of taxes or licenses fixed or imposed when other methods of advertising or inducing custom are used and will prevent complainants from carrying on their legitimate business. (5) They are not productive of revenue, are in excess of the profits of the businesses, and are in fact prohibitory. (6) That the methods employed by complainants in no wise affect the public health, morals or welfare, and the imposition of the taxes is in no way a legitimate or lawful exercise of the police power of the State. (7) That the fines are so onerous, drastic, excessive and enormous as to deter complainants in going on and doing business as they have heretofore done and testing the validity of the statute in a court of law.

That by the statute and in § 59 thereof a violation of its provisions is made a misdemeanor and it is provided [351] in § 35 that for failure to pay any of the license taxes any person, whether acting for himself or as agent of another, may be imprisoned in the county jail, not exceeding six months.

It is further alleged that the statute impairs the obligations of the contracts entered into between complainants and their customers, in violation of clause 1, § 10, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States (8 Fed. St. Ann. 748).

That the officers of the State threaten to enforce the statute and that the State's attorneys, county solicitors and prosecuting attorneys of the several circuits and counties of the State are respectively empowered and authorized to prosecute in the several courts of the State and such officers are threatening to prosecute divers of the complainants, and it is alleged that a multitude of prosecutions will be instituted, with seizures, sales and injury of property if a temporary restraining order be not granted. There is a prayer for such order and for a perpetual injunction.

A restraining order was issued. The defendants appeared specially and filed motions to dismiss the suit and as grounds thereof denied the allegations and implications of the bill as to the various grounds of infringement of the Constitution of the United States charged against the statute, and set up that complainants had a complete and adequate remedy at law. That the bill sought a restraint of the enforcement of a criminal statute of the State and to enjoin an alleged threatened seizure of property in the enforcement of the alleged illegal tax and the enforcement of the collection of a tax imposed by a statute of the State of a general and public nature.

A motion was made for an interlocutory injunction, hearing upon which was referred to three judges. Upon the hearing the injunction was ordered (214 Fed. Rep. 827) to review which this appeal has been prosecuted.

Thomas F. West for appellants.
Charles M. Cooper for appellees.

[355] McKENNA, J. (after stating the facts).—It was determined that the bill set forth grounds of equitable relief; that the condition of complainants' businesses and of the property engaged in them was such that the statute, if exerted against complainants and their property, would produce irreparable injury, citing Ex p. Young, 209 U. S. 123, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, 28 S. Ct. 441, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 714; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 S. Ct. 18, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 778; Davis, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207, 23 S. Ct. 498, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 169. We concur in this view.

Passing on the constitutional questions involved, the [356] court was of opinion that the statute violated the Fourteenth Amendment and considered it unnecessary to decide whether there was an interference with interstate commerce.

It is not entirely clear upon what clause of the Fourteenth Amendment the court rested its judgment. The equality clause was selected for special comment. After stating the limitation upon legislation and the power of classification, the court proceeds to say: "Is there a just basis for the classification attempted in this section [§ 35] of the act? Merchants, etc., all pay a tax according to the value of the stock carried by each, but if they sell goods for which coupons, etc., are given by themselves or others, then they must pay this additional tax for each place of business in each and every county in which said business is conducted or carried on. And if goods are offered for sale with which coupons are given, redeemable by persons other than the seller, then this tax must be paid by him for each of said lines of goods.

"We can see no just basis for such classification. It is an arbitrary selection of one merchant for the imposition of a 'greater burden' than that imposed on others in the same calling and condition."

But the court went farther and declared that "the use of coupons, etc., was an entirely legitimate method of advertising" and that such had been the ruling in state cases which were cited. And excluding the application of cases adduced by defendants to sustain the statute as an exercise of the police power of the State, the court said: "As before pointed out, this coupon business is legitimate, in no way affecting the health or morals of the community."

Though it is not clear, as we have said, certainly not explicit in the opinion of the court, whether it decided the due process clause as well as the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was violated by the statute, [357] we may assume that the violation of both was decided. It may be that the court thought that even though the use of coupons was a legitimate method of advertising and not affecting the health or morals of the community, it was nevertheless within the power of the State to license if the statute were free from discrimination, or it may be that the court considered that the two grounds interlocked and were dependent upon the same reasoning. However, the two grounds may be, indeed must be, taken into consideration as they are submitted for decision.

The ground of discrimination, simply and separated from the other attacks upon the statute, does not present much difficulty. The difference between a business where coupons are used, even regarding their use as a means of advertising, and a business where they are not used, is pronounced. Complainants are at pains to display it. The legislation which regards the difference is not arbitrary within the rulings of the cases. It is established that a distinction in legislation is not arbitrary, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, and the existence of that state of facts at the time the law was enacted must be assumed. Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. 220 U. S. 61, 78, Ann. Cas. 1912C 160, 31 S. Ct. 337, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 369. It makes no difference that the facts may be disputed or their effect opposed by argument and opinion of serious strength. It is not within the competency of the courts to arbitrate in such contrariety. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 31 S. Ct. 259, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 328; German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S. 389, 413, 414, 34 S. Ct. 612, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1011, L.R.A. 1915C 1189; Price v. Illinois, 238 U. S. 446, 452, 35 S. Ct. 892, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1400.

It is the duty and function of the legislature to discern and correct evils, and by evils we do not mean some definite injury but obstacles to a greater public welfare. Eubank v. Richmond, 226 U. S. 137, 142, Ann. Cas. 1914B 192, 33 S. Ct. 76, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 156, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123; Sligh v. Kirkwood, 237 U. S. 52, 59, 35 S. Ct. 501, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 835. And, we repeat, "it may make discriminations if founded on distinctions that we cannot pronounce unreasonable and purely arbitrary." Quong [358] Wing v. Kirkendall, 223 U. S. 59, 62, and the cases cited above.

Of course, an element to be considered is the authority of the legislature over the subject-matter, and this will best be examined in considering the contentions of complainants under the due process clause. Preceding that, however, are the contentions based on the commerce clause and the sanction which the Constitution gives to the integrity of contracts.

First, as pertinent to our discussion, are the specific schemes at which, it is said, the statute is directed, and we adopt complainants' description of them. The first is "where the Florida merchant issues his own coupon, certificate or cash register receipt and himself makes payment or redemption of the same, sometimes by the delivery of some valuable articles of merchandise, sometimes by the payment of cash or allowance of credit on account of purchases, being in the nature of a discount, or for or on account of a certain amount having been purchased of the merchant by the customer." In a word, it is a case where the Florida merchant issues his own coupons and redeems them.

The second is "where the manufacturer or shipper outside of the State of Florida, in some other State of the Union, inserts such coupons or certificates in packages of his goods which he ships to Florida, and the ultimate purchaser or consumer takes such coupons or certificates from such packages and returns them to such manufacturer or shipper in such State outside of Florida, who gives a premium for them and sends such premium or proceeds of redemption to such ultimate purchaser or consumer in Florida who has forwarded to him such coupons or certificates." The merchandise so shipped into Florida is kept in stock by the merchants of the State and the coupons, etc., are delivered upon the sale of the merchandise to their customers, who have them redeemed in the [359] manner described. That is, the coupons are redeemed by the person who originally issues them; the coupons, however, to repeat, being delivered by the Florida merchant as a part of the transaction between him and the purchaser from him at retail.

The third is "where the manufacturer or shipper in a State other than Florida inserts in the packages of his goods which he ships to Florida such coupons or certificates which are taken from the packages by the ultimate purchaser or consumer in Florida and sent to some company or agency in some State of the United States outside of the State of Florida other than the manufacturer or shipper of the goods, to be redeemed or paid, and the premium or proceeds thereof is returned by such company or agency to the person in Florida who has sent such coupons or certificates." This differs from the other two cases in that a premium company or agency other than the manufacturer or shipper himself is used for the redemption or payment of the coupons or certificates. But here again the Florida merchant is a factor because it is in completion of the sale by him at retail that the coupons are delivered to the purchasers.

We are careful, by much repetition, to show the difference between the cases, to distinguish between the premium systems, and to show, as urged by counsel, that this case is not concerned with a license tax upon a trading stamp business pure and simple, a license upon companies engaged in such business being provided by another section of the statute.¹

It is well here to observe, to avoid misunderstanding, that the redemption in the first scheme is "sometimes by the payment of cash or allowance of credit on account of [360] purchases or for or on account of a certain amount having been purchased of the merchant by the customer." We are not concerned with a statute directed solely at such method of redemption or a business so confined. The Florida statute imposes its license tax on coupons, etc., "redeemable in premiums." And therefore, whether any other method of redemption—be it by giving a discount or an allowance of credit simply—would be amenable to objection we express no opinion. In all of the schemes other methods of redemption are used and are attempted to be justified.

With this comment we may say that all of the schemes have a common character—something is given besides that which is or is supposed to be the immediate incentive to the transaction of sale and purchase, something of value given other than it; and even as to the second and third schemes, the transactions are only executed through the purchase at retail. In other words, they are not designed for or executed through a sale of the original package of importation but in the packages of retail and sale to the individual purchaser and consumer. This fixes their character as transactions within the State and not as transactions in interstate commerce, and this is conceded as to the first scheme; it is true as to the second and third schemes. All of the schemes have their influence and effect within the State. Nor is such influence and effect changed or lessened by the redemption of the tokens outside of the State.

The transactions, therefore, are not in interstate commerce. The sales, as we have said, are not in the packages of that commerce, they are essentially local sales, schemes consummated by such sales, and it is upon them and on account of their effect that the statute has imposed its license tax, and not upon the shipment into the State nor their disposition in the packages of importation. Of course, there is shipment to Florida merchants but [361] for the disposition of the merchandise in retail trade. The schemes contemplate such disposition and are executed by it. Detach the importations from the retail sale, consider only the transportation to the State of merchandise in its original package, being sold therein in such package, and there may, indeed, be interstate commerce; but so detached and so considered the importations are left without purpose, the schemes without execution. Indeed, complainants contend for the right not only of importations in the original package containing the coupons but the disposition of the goods and coupons through the retail merchant. This, we repeat, has no protection in the commerce clause.

Nor is the regulation of the statute prohibited by § 3394, Rev. Stat. as amended in 1897 (July 24, c. 11, § 10, 30 Stat. 151, 206) and 1902 (July 1, c. 1371, § 2, 32 Stat. 714, 715) [3 Fed. St. Ann. 748]. Section 3394 provides for a tax on cigars and cigarettes. By the amendment of 1897 it was forbidden to pack in, attach to or connect with any package of tobacco or cigarettes anything but the wrappers, and it was further provided that there should not be affixed to, or branded, stamped, marked, written or printed upon the packages or their contents any promise or offer of, or any order or certificate for, any gift, prize, premium, payment, or reward. This provision upset the practice of manufacturers and was attacked on the ground that it was beyond the power of Congress under the Constitution to enact, the prohibited practice being a method of advertising. The provision was sustained. Felsenhead v. U. S. 186 U. S. 126, 22 S. Ct. 740, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 1085, affirming 103 Fed. 453. In 1902 the paragraph containing the provision was amended so as to forbid the enclosure or attachment to the packages of "any paper, certificate, or instrument purporting to be or representing a ticket, chance, share or interest in, or dependent upon the event of a lottery, [362] or any indecent or immoral picture, representation, print or words."

Let it be granted that this provision permitted the enclosure in the package of tobacco of tokens of the character with which this case is concerned. It goes no farther nor does it purport to go farther. It does not attempt to protect and enforce the permission to the retail sales of packages in the State. It might not legally have such effect if attempted; and such attempt will not lightly be inferred. Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 32 S. Ct. 715, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1182; Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright, 225 U. S. 540, 32 S. Ct. 784, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1197. The statute of Florida does not seek to control the interstate transportation of the packages, it controls only their sale in the State through the retail merchant, or, it may be, directly to the individual consumer for the purpose described, and in both cases for the ultimate redemption of the tokens delivered with the sale.

license tax of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars in each county where they transact any business."

McDermott v. Wisconsin, 228 U. S. 115, Ann. Cas. 1915A 39, 33 S. Ct. 431, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 754, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 984, is not applicable. There Congress, for the effective execution of the Food and Drugs Act, defined what the "package" of commerce should be, and necessarily any law which conflicted with it was void. In the case at bar there is no such definition. There is only permission to insert in the package whatever the manufacturer of tobacco may choose, with a single exception. There is no compulsion of use, and omission to avail of the permission has no effect upon the purpose of Congress in the enactment of the revenue laws which provide for the packing of tobacco products.

The contract clause of the Constitution is also unavailable to complainants. The statute must be held to have perspective operation. Sales completed before its enactment are unaffected by it. We say "sales completed," and by this we mean those in which the right of redemption according to some of the schemes has accrued as distinguished from what is alleged in the bill as "the [363] understanding and expectation" arising from one or more sales that complainants would continue to sell to such purchasers other articles so that they might be able to accumulate tokens and use them. It cannot be said that there is an obligation to continue sales or an obligation to continue purchases. Besides, as the business is subject to regulation the contracts made in its conduct are subject to such regulation. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 S. Ct. 265, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 297, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 671, and New York Cent. R. Co. v. Gray, 239 U. S. 583, 36 S. Ct. 176, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 451.

Having disposed of the other contentions of complainants, we are brought to a consideration of the question whether the statute of Florida offends the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. In other words, does the statute interfere with the business liberty of complainants? Is it an illegal meddling with a lawful calling and a deprivation of freedom of contract? This is the contention, and it is attempted to be supported by the assertion that the schemes detailed in the bill are but a method of advertising and, as such, mere allurements to customers, not detrimental in any way to the public health and morals, nor obstructive of the public welfare; but are a means of enterprise, mere incidents of the businesses of complainants and as beneficial to their customers as to them. And besides that they are but a method of giving discount, practically in some instances a rebate upon the price, and in others an equivalent gift of some article that may attract the choice of the purchaser, the choice being free and the article of definite utility and value.

These contentions have the support of a number of cases. They are opposed by others, not nearly so numerous as the supporting cases but marking a change of opinion. Both sets of cases indicate by the statutes passed upon a persistent legislative effort against the schemes under review or some form of them, beginning in 1880 and [364] repeated from time to time until the statute in controversy was passed in 1913.¹ In such differences between judicial and legislative opinion where should the choice be? That necessarily depends upon what reasoning judicial opinion was based. We appreciate the seriousness of the situation. Regarding the number of the cases only, they constitute a body of authority from which there might well be hesitation to dissent except upon clear compulsion.

The foundation of all of them is that the schemes detailed are based on an inviolable right, that they are but the exercise of a personal liberty secured by the Constitution of the United States and distinguished from other lawful exercise of business contracts and activity by a method of advertising and lawful inducements to an increased custom and that in them there is no element of chance or anything detrimental to the public welfare. But there may be partial or total dispute of the propositions. And it can be urged that the reasoning upon which they are based regards the mere mechanism of the schemes alone and does not give enough force to their influence upon conduct and habit, not enough to their insidious potentialities. As to all of which not courts but legislatures may be the best judges and, it may be, the conclusive judges.

This may be illustrated. A lottery of itself is not wrong, may be fairer, having less of overreaching in it, than many of the commercial transactions that the Constitution protects. All participants in it have an equal chance; there is no admonishing caveat of one against the other. And at one time it was lawful. It came to be condemned by experience of its evil influence and effects. It is trite to say that practices harmless of themselves may, from [365] circumstances, become the source of evil or may have evil

tendency. Murphy v. California, 225 U. S. 623, 32 S. Ct. 697, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1229.

But no refinement of reason is necessary to demonstrate the broad power of the legislature over the transactions of men. There are many lawful restrictions upon liberty of contract and business. It would be an endless task to cite cases in demonstration, and that the supplementing of the sale of one article by a token given and to be redeemed in some other article has accompaniments and effects beyond mere advertising the allegations of the bill and the argument of counsel establish. Advertising is merely identification and description, apprising of quality and place. It has no other object than to draw attention to the article to be sold, and the acquisition of the article to be sold constitutes the only inducement to its purchase. The matter is simple, single in purpose and motive; its consequences are well defined, there being nothing ulterior; it is the practice of old and familiar transactions and has sufficed for their success.

The schemes of complainants have no such directness and effect. They rely upon something else than the article sold. They tempt by a promise of a value greater than that article and apparently not represented in its price, and it hence may be thought that thus by an appeal to cupidity lure to improvidence. This may not be called in an exact sense a "lottery," may not be called "gaming;" it may, however, be considered as having the seduction and evil of such, and whether it has may be a matter of inquiry, a matter of inquiry and of judgment that it is finally within the power of the legislature to make. Certainly in the first instance, and, as we have seen, its judgment is not impeached by urging against it a difference of opinion. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. McGuire and German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Kansas, supra. And it is not required that we should be sure as to the precise reasons for such judgment or that we should certainly know them [366] or be convinced of the wisdom of the legislation. Southwestern Oil Co. v. Texas, 217 U. S. 114, 126, 127, 30 S. Ct. 496, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 688. See also Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 132, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 77.

But it may be said that judicial opinion cannot be controlled by legislative opinion of what are fundamental rights. This is freely conceded; it is the very essence of constitutional law, but its recognition does not determine supremacy in any given instance. "While the courts must exercise a judgment of their own, it by no means is true that every law is void which may seem to the judges who pass upon it excessive, unsuited to its ostensible end, or based upon conceptions of morality with which they disagree.

Considerable latitude must be allowed for differences of view as well as for possible peculiar conditions which this court can know but imperfectly, if at all. Otherwise a constitution, instead of embodying only relatively fundamental rules of right, as generally understood by all English-speaking communities, would become the partisan of a particular set of ethical or economical opinions, which by no means are held semper ubique et ab omnibus." Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 608, 609, 23 S. Ct. 168, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 323.

That case illustrated the reach of the power of government to protect or promote the general welfare. It sustained a provision of the constitution of the State of California which made void all contracts for the sale of the stock of corporations on margin or to be delivered at a future day. The practice had been common, its evil was disputed. It was attempted to be justified by argument very much like those advanced in the case at bar, but this court decided that the legislative judgment was controlling.

Even more pertinent in illustration of the power of the States as unaffected by the Fourteenth Amendment is Central Lumber Co. v. South Dakota, 226 U. S. 157, 33 S. Ct. 66, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 164. A statute of the State was sustained which provided that any one engaged in the manufacture, production or distribution [367] of any commodity in general use, who should intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regular, established dealer, discriminate between different places by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one place than such person charged in another, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, should be guilty of a crime. Freedom of conduct was restricted by the statute which had its incentive in trade advantages. It was the judgment of the legislature that such practice was an impediment to the public welfare. The legislative judgment was sustained against the attack, among others, that the law was an infringement of freedom of conduct and contract.

In Keokee Consol. Coke Co. v. Taylor, 234 U. S. 224, 34 S. Ct. 856, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1288, the company issued scrip payable in merchandise only from its store as an advance of monthly wages in payment of labor performed. A statute of the State (West Virginia) prohibited the issue of any order for the payment of labor unless it was redeemable in money. The statute was assailed on the ground that it interfered with the freedom of contract. It will be observed that there was a consideration for the order payable in merchandise; it was a payment in advance, and hence it was asserted that the statute was an injury to the employees and employers. There were elements in the transactions of apparent advantage to both and it would seem to have been within the liberty of both to contract upon an estimate of the value of that advantage. It was deemed an evil by the legislature and this court sustained its judgment.

In Erie R. Co. v. Williams, 233 U. S. 685, 34 S. Ct. 761, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1155, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1097, a law of the State of New York required railroad companies to pay their employees semi-monthly and prohibited them from making contracts which should vary the time of payment. The law was sustained mainly upon the ground that it was an amendment of the charter of the corporation, but the extent of the police power was adverted to and the competency [368] of the legislature exercising that power to enact the legislation. The incentive of the legislation was the benefit which accrued to the employees by the period of payment. The public welfare was deemed to be promoted by it.

Other cases might be cited and, it may be, of more pertinent application, which, from their number and instances, would seem to have uttered the last necessary word upon the power of the legislature to regulate conduct and contracts and in the exercise of the power to classify objects, upon its conception of the public welfare, the right of review to be exerted by the courts only when the legislation is unreasonable or purely arbitrary.

Complainants allege that the license tax which the statute imposes is of prohibitory character and assert that they are exercising inviolable rights and privileges which the excess of the tax prevents in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment; they contend that hence the statute is invalid.

It is not certain from the allegations of the bill that the tax is of the asserted character, but granting it to be so we have shown that the business schemes described in the bill are not protected from regulation or prohibition by the Constitution of the United States. Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 14 S. Ct. 499, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 385; Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 22 S. Ct. 425, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 623; Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 23 S. Ct. 168, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 323. See also Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 238, 25 S. Ct. 18, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 169; Murphy v. California, 225 U. S. 623, 32 S. Ct. 697, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1220, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 153; Postal Tel. Co. v. Charleston, 153 U. S. 692, 699, 14 S. Ct. 1094, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 871; McCray v. U. S. 195 U. S. 27, 1 Ann. Cas. 561, 24 S. Ct. 769, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 78; Kehrer v. Stewart, 197 U. S. 60, 25 S. Ct. 403, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 663; Hammond Packing Co. v. Montana, 233 U. S. 331, 34 S. Ct. 596, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 985.

The contention that the statute intimidates against a contest of its legality by the severity of its penalties and is therefore unconstitutional on that ground within the ruling in Ex p. Young, 209 U. S. 123, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, 28 S. Ct. 441, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 714, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, is not justified.

Order reversed and case remanded with directions to dismiss the bill.

NOTE.

The reported case sustains a statute imposing a special license tax on merchants issuing trading stamps or profit-sharing coupons, and in so holding the court says that such a statute is within the police power of a state though the tax is prohibitory in its nature. The holding is specifically confined to stamps or coupons redeemable in premiums, the court saying: "Whether any other method of redemption—be it by giving a discount or an allowance of credit simply—would be amenable to objection we express no opinion." The decision of the reported case, which is authoritative so far as the application of the Federal Constitution is concerned, runs counter to a long line of state and lower federal court decisions which have held similar legislation to be invalid, the cases being collected in the notes to the following cases: State v. Dodge, 1 Ann. Cas. 47; Denver v. Frueauff, 12 Ann. Cas. 521; Sperry, etc. Co. v. Owensboro, Ann. Cas. 1915A 373; State v. Pitney, Ann. Cas. 1916A 209; and Booth v. People, 78 Am. St. Rep. 229. The reported case reverses Van Deman, etc. Co. v. Rast, 214 Fed. 827, which is cited in the note to State v. Pitney, supra.

The reported case was followed at the same term in two other cases sustaining a statute of another state. See Tanner v. Little, 240 U. S. 369, 36 S. Ct. 379, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 691; and Pitney v. Washington, 240 U. S. 387, 36 S. Ct. 385, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 703, the last cited case affirming State v. Pitney, supra.

STATE EX REL. DAWSON.

CITY OF HARPER.

Kansas Supreme Court—March 6, 1915.

94 Kan. 478; 146 Pac. 1169.

Quo Warranto — Burden of Proof.

In a proceeding by the state in courts of general jurisdiction to inquire by what authority a municipality exercises governmental functions the doctrine that the burden of proof is upon the defendant and that the state is not required to show anything rests upon the common-law theory as to the nature and character of information in quo warranto and has no application in this state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Section 679 of the code abolishes the writ of quo warranto and substitutes therefor a civil action governed by the same rules of procedure as other actions. Presumptions as rules of evidence may be invoked against the state in such an action as readily as against an individual in ordinary civil actions.

[See note at end of this case.]

Municipal Corporations — Extension of Corporate Limits.

The state brought proceedings in quo warranto to oust the city of Harper, a city of the second class, from exercising authority over certain territory. The answer alleged that in 1884, when the defendant was a city of the third class, the then owner of the land executed and filed for record a plat of the land as and for an addition to the city; that part of the land was platted and part unplatted, and that the land in controversy has ever since been treated by the owner and by the city in every respect as part of and within the corporate limits of the city; that in 1889, as part of the proceedings by which the defendant changed from a city of the third to a city of the second class, the mayor and council certified to the governor an accurate description by metes and bounds of all lands within the limits of the city as it then existed, which description included the territory now in controversy, and that thereupon the governor issued a proclamation declaring the defendant to be a city of the second class having the metes and bounds so certified. Held, that the answer stated a good defense, and that it was error to sustain a demurrer thereto.

Appeal from District Court, Harper county: GILLET, Judge.

Quo warranto proceeding. John S. Dawson, relator, and City of Harper, defendant. Judgment for relator. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

George E. McMahon and Donald Muir for appellant.

S. M. Brewster, T. A. Nofztger and Vernon I. Day for appellee.

[479] PORTER, J.—By this proceeding the state, on the relation of the attorney-general, inquires by what warrant the defendant exercises its jurisdiction as a city of the second class over certain territory. The city filed its answer setting out the facts upon which it relied, to which the plaintiff demurred. The district court sustained the demurrer, and the city, having elected to stand upon its demurrer, the court rendered judgment ousting the city from exercising or claiming any municipal control or supervision over the territory in controversy and the inhabitants thereof.

[480] The appeal presents the question whether the demurrer was rightly sustained, and this depends upon whether or not the land involved is a part of the city. The following facts appear from the answer: The city of Harper during the year 1884 was a city of the third class; during that year the then owner of the land described in plaintiff's petition duly made and executed a plat comprising the land in controversy, and filed the same in the office of the register of deeds of Harper county as and for an addition to the city of Harper; the lands comprised in the plat lay adjacent to the territory then comprising the city. Part of the land was platted, and part unplatted. The portion platted was divided into blocks to correspond in size to the blocks within the corporate limits of the city, and the streets and avenues described in the plat were made to correspond to the streets and avenues existing in the city, and were given upon the plat the same name as the streets and avenues of the city to which they corresponded. A copy of the plat was attached to the answer. The city continued to exist as a city of the third class until the year 1889, when proceedings were had to change the organization from that of the third to a city of the second class, as provided by law. As part of such proceedings, the mayor and council made out and transmitted to the governor an accurate description by metes and bounds of all lands within the limits of the city as it then existed, in which description was included the territory now in controversy. Thereafter the governor issued a proclamation declaring the defendant to be a city of the second class, having the metes and bounds so certified by the mayor and council. Since 1884 the land herein involved has been treated by the owners and by the city in every respect as part of and within the corporate limits of the city.

At the time the plat of this land was executed and filed for record the only statutory provision respecting the power of a city of the third class to extend its [481] limits was embraced in section 2 of chapter 37 of the Laws of 1883. So much of section 2 of the act as is applicable here, reads:

"The city council in their discretion may add to the territory adjacent to the city limits as defined and existing at the date of the approval of this act such additional territory as they may deem proper, and shall in every case have power to increase or diminish the city limits in such manner as in their judgment and discretion may redound to the benefit of the city: Provided, That in no case shall any adjacent territory, except when divided into town lots, be added to the limits of a city without the consent in writing of the owner of the territory proposed to be added."

Substantially the same provision was in section 56 of chapter 26 of the Laws of 1869, which was the first act of the legislature authorizing the organization of cities of the third class. (Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Maquillin, 12 Kan. 301.) The act provides for no special procedure for acquiring new territory, but leaves it to the discretion of the council to add additional territory as they may deem proper, and "in such manner" as in their judgment and discretion will redound to the benefit of the city. Except when divided into town lots, however, no adjacent land was to be added to the limits of the city without the consent, in writing, of the owner. The plat, a copy of which is attached to the answer, shows that only a portion of the land embraced in the plat was divided into town lots, and it is this portion of the tract over which the controversy in the present case arises. The act makes no provision as to where the consent shall be filed, and we think there can be no question that the filing of it in the office of the register of deeds was sufficient. The procedure for extending the boundaries of the cities of the third class at that time was very informal. It does not appear from the answer that the city ever enacted an ordinance declaring this territory to be within the city limits, but the petition shows that the city is exercising authority over [482] it, and the answer alleges that the city has continuously done so for more than twenty-nine years.

While ordinarily estoppel will not lie against the state, some importance must be attached to the fact that the city has exercised jurisdiction over the tract in question for this long period of time with the consent of the owners of the tract, and that the state by the proclamation of the governor in 1889 recognized this territory to be within the limits of the city as then certified and claimed by the city itself. It may be that at this late date the city is not able to show the formal adoption of an ordinance extending its limits to embrace the territory in question. It had, the undoubted right in 1884, under the laws as it then stood, so to extend its limits, because it had the written consent of the then owners of the land. It must, therefore, be presumed after this length of time that all the proper steps were taken by the city for the purpose of extending its boundaries so as to include this tract of land.

In a very recent case the state sought to inquire as to the right of a city of the first class to exercise authority over territory it claimed to have annexed, and we held that where the validity of an ordinance depended upon the existence of certain jurisdictional facts at the time the ordinance was enacted, the existence and not the nonexistence of such facts necessary to sustain the ordinance should be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary. (State v. Atchison, 92 Kan. 431, Ann. Cas. 1916B 500, 140 Pac. 873.) It was vigorously contended in that case by the state that where the sovereign inquires by quo warranto into the right of an individual to exercise the privileges of an office or the right of a municipal corporation to exercise authority, the burden of proof rests upon the person or municipality to show its right, and that no presumptions are to be indulged in such case as against the state in favor of the defendant. This contention was not upheld. It rests upon the common-law theory [483] as to the nature and character of the writ in quo warranto. One of the cases much relied upon by the state in the Atchison case is McGahan v. People, 191 Ill. 493, 61 N. E. 418. The Illinois case is in line with the authorities in that state running back as far as Clark v. People, 15 Ill. 213, 217, holding that the people, that is the state, are not bound to show anything in a proceeding by quo warranto. That was the doctrine of the common law, but our code (§ 679) abolishes the writ of quo warranto and substitutes in its stead a civil action. It is true, as we held in State v. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assoc. 76 Kan. 184, 189, 90 Pac. 777, the language of the constitution conferring original jurisdiction upon this court in quo warranto is broad enough to authorize "all the relief which at common law could be given by a quo warranto proceeding of any kind." (p. 189.) But the action itself is to be tried with the same procedure and the same rules of evidence that apply to other civil actions. Presumptions, which are but rules of evidence, may be invoked against the state as readily as against an individual.

In the numerous quo warranto proceedings filed in this court in recent years wherein the state has sought to oust cities and city and county officials from the exercise of functions and privileges unauthorized by law, it has never been supposed that the burden of proof rested upon the defendants to show that they were not exercising privileges, offices or functions without authority. On the contrary, the usual practice has been to appoint a commissioner and have evidence taken, and the burden of proof has always been assumed by the state.

To follow the decision of the court in State v. Atchison, supra, would require us to reverse the judgment here and remand the case for further proceedings, upon the well-settled theory that the exercise by the city during all these years of authority over this territory without dispute presupposes [484] the existence of all jurisdictional acts to make the conduct of the city legal, and that as against a demurrer, at least, this presumption must obtain until overcome by evidence, and therefore that the court should have overruled the demurrer to the answer. (Knox County v. New York Ninth Nat. Bank, 147 U. S. 91, 13 S. Ct. 267, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 93, where it is said that it is "a rule of very general application, that where an act is done which can be done legally only after the performance of some prior act, proof of the later carries with it a presumption of the due performance of the prior act.") (p. 97.) See also Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 64, 70, 6 U. S. (L. ed.) 552, and Nofire v. U. S. 164 U. S. 657, 17 S. Ct. 212, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 588, where the rule was referred to as follows:

"This is the general rule in respect to official action, and one who claims that any such prerequisite did not exist must affirmatively show the fact." (p. 660.)

It is quite apparent from the record that the city would never be able to establish proof that an ordinance was passed annexing the disputed territory, so that if the case was sent back for trial the state would be able to prove that there was no record of such an ordinance. However, we are impressed with the belief that this case should be ended, and that the city under the particular circumstances of the case and after the expiration of such a period of time should not be prejudiced in any way by its inability to show that an ordinance was passed annexing the territory. As observed, there was no express provision as to the manner in which cities of the third class should proceed in annexing territory. It was from the time of the filing of the plat treated by the city and the owner as a part of the city. In 1889 the state, through the governor, proclaimed it to be a city of the second class, having metes and bounds certified to it by the then council of the city which included this territory, and, in our opinion, this made it a city of the second class with the boundaries [485] thus declared. The answer, therefore, stated a good defense, and it was error to sustain the demurrer.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer and to render judgment for the defendant.

RULE STATED.

Quo warranto being at common law a high prerogative writ, its issuance on behalf of the sovereign was deemed to cast on the respondent the burden of establishing in himself the right or franchise concerning which it was the purpose of the writ to inquire. In a majority of jurisdictions the rule still obtains that in a quo warranto proceeding or an action in the nature thereof, the burden of proof is on the respondent.

Thus in People v. Baldrige, 267 Ill. 190, 108 N. E. 49, it was said: "In a long line of decisions this court has held that in proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto the defendant, if he justifies, must set out his title specifically and must show on the face of the plea that he has a valid title to the office; that the people are not called upon to show anything; that the entire onus is on the defendant, and that he must not only show by his plea, but prove that he has a valid title to his office, and if this proof is not made the people will be entitled to judgment of ouster. . . . This is also the rule in other jurisdictions. The form of the issue in quo warranto between the state and the respondent is not like that in other civil proceedings, but the defendant is called on to show title by his plea, which presents an issue of fact, and the burden of proof is upon him to establish it." And in People v. Thacher, 55 N. Y. 525, 14 Am. Rep. 312, the court said: "The people are here the ultimate source of the right to hold a public office; and now, as heretofore, when the right of a person exercising an office is challenged in a direct proceeding by the attorney general, the defendant must establish his title, or judgment will be rendered against him. It results from these considerations that the defendant, in order to have judgment in his favor, was required to prove that he was elected to the office of mayor at the election held in April, 1872. The possession of the office was not in this action evidence of his right. The burden was upon him to show by affirmative evidence that his possession was a legal and a rightful one." So in People v. Mayworm, 5 Mich. 146, it was said: "The rule is well settled that where the state calls upon an individual to show his title to an office, he must show the continued existence of every qualification necessary to the enjoyment of the office. The state is bound to make no showing and the defendant must make out an undoubted case. It is not sufficient to state the qualifications necessary to the appointment, and rely on the presumption of their continuance. The law makes no such presumption in his favor." And in McGahan v. People, 191 Ill. 496, 61 N. E. 418, the court in applying the rule said: "The real question tried and on which the case depended was, whether the territory organized as a village contained at the time three hundred inhabitants, and the burden was on the respondents to prove that it did. The people were not required, in the first instance, to prove anything. (Kamp v. People, 141 Ill. 9; People v. Peoria, 166 Ill. 517.)"

The rule has been applied in a number of instances in a quo warranto proceeding against a private corporation to test its right to exercise a corporate franchise. People v. Volcano Canyon Toll-Road Co. 100 Cal. 87, 34 Pac. 522; People v. Peoria, 166 Ill. 517, 46 N. E. 1075; State v. Hogan, 163 Mo. 43, 63 S. W. 378; State v. Lincoln Traction Co. 90 Neb. 535, 134 N. W. 278; State v. Tillamook Port, 62 Ore. 332, Ann. Cas. 1914C 483, 124 Pac. 637. Compare State v. Steele, 37 Minn. 428, 34 N. W. 903. Thus in People v. Volcano Canyon Toll-Road Co. supra, it was said: "This being an information in the nature of a quo warranto brought by the attorney general, and the fact that the defendant claimed and was exercising the disputed franchise being admitted, the burden was on the defendant to show by what warrant or authority it claimed and exercised the franchise." And in State v.

Tillamook Port, 62 Ore. 332, Ann. Cas. 1914C 483, 124 Pac. 637, the court said: "In an action, partaking of the nature of quo warranto, in the absence of any legislation or controlling consideration to the contrary, the rule that the onus probandi is upon the respondent applies, and the defendants must prove the existence of the corporate franchise which they are alleged to have usurped, and their title to the offices, with the wrongful claim or usurpation of which they are charged. State v. Sharp, 27 Minn. 38, 6 N. W. 408; 3 High, Ex. Legal Rem. § 629. We find that in ordinary civil actions the burden rests upon the plaintiff to allege and prove his title to the thing in controversy. In quo warranto proceedings we find the rule reversed, and it rests upon the respondent to show his title to the office or franchise in dispute. If he fails to show complete title, judgment is rendered against him. While in civil actions plaintiff recovers upon his own title in an action in the nature of a quo warranto, the respondent must show that he has a good title as against the government." So in State v. Lincoln Traction Co. 90 Neb. 535, 134 N. W. 278, it was said: "Where an information is quo warranto and presented by the law offices of the county or of the state charges the respondent with the unlawful exercise of corporate franchises, the answer should be either a disclaimer or a justification. . . . And if the information does not disclose that the state is demanding a forfeiture of franchises at one time legal, the burden is on the respondent."

EXCEPTIONS TO RULE.

There are a large number of cases which, while recognizing the rule that in a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto brought by the state against a public officer the burden of proof is on the respondent, hold that in an action brought on the relation of a claimant to the office, the burden of proof is on the relator, the proceeding being in substance one to try title to the office.

Thus in People v. Keator, 169 App. Div. 368, 154 N. Y. S. 1007, it was said: "In an action in the nature of quo warranto to try title to an office, as between the relator and the defendant, the burden is upon the former to make out a better title to the office than that of the defendant." And in State v. Heffernan, 243 Mo. 442, 148 S. W. 90, the court said: "The appellant contends that the burden was upon relator to show by evidence that his interest in the subject of the controversy was such as to authorize him to maintain the proceeding in that capacity. As there is no evidence tending to sustain this burden, it follows, if this position is well taken, that the judgment of ouster is erroneous. The prosecuting attorney filed in the circuit court his petition asking for leave, at the relation of Mr. Thompson, to file the information, and at the same time, without any further order of the court, filed it, and thereafter the defendant appeared and filed his answer. Upon these pleadings alone the case was tried. The information states that the relator is a resident of the road district, and the owner of lands situated therein, which is denied by the answer, and the issue so made calls for the determination (1) whether this is an issuable averment; and (2) if it is, whether the burden was upon the defendant to disprove it. . . . To the suggestion that the prosecuting attorney is the proper person to ascertain and determine whether or not the relator is qualified with respect to his interest to maintain the action, it is sufficient answer to say that the permission of the court is necessary to enable a prosecuting attorney to act, that the court can only speak by its records and that here the record is lacking, so that the 'exhibition' of the information which must precede the retirement of the officer and the turning over of the prosecution to the relator is a nullity, but even if this was not so, the capacity of the relator is an important question materially affecting the defendant, and he is entitled to some tribunal in which he can try it. He has denied that capacity in his answer and the burden is upon him who alone has the facts in his possession, to meet the issue so raised, which is not susceptible of negative proof except by compelling the relator to disclose that he has not the deed in his pocket to qualify him for the position he has assumed. In this respect there is a failure of proof upon the vital question of the right of the relator to maintain his action." So in Newman v. U. S. 43 App. Cas. (D. C.) 53, it was said: "It is urged by counsel for respondent that the court erred in granting relator the right to open and close in the submission of the evidence, and the right to open and close the argument to the jury. The court properly instructed the jury that the burden of proof was upon relator. Mere possession of the office, accompanied by a commission from the proper appointing power, created a presumption that respondent possessed the legal qualifications to hold the office. The affirmative was, therefore, cast upon relator of overcoming this presumption, which, under our practice, required him to open and close the evidence and the argument. It is difficult, however, to understand just how respondent could be damaged by having the burden cast upon relator. The form of the writ would seem to indicate that the burden is upon respondent to show his lawful possession of the office. This was the early English practice, where the writ was prerogative, and issued in the name of the King. But that practice has not been followed in this country. Here the writ has fallen into disuse, and the proceeding is initiated by information in the nature of a civil proceeding to try the right to office. . . . It was not error to require relator to go forward in the trial."

It has also been held that in a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto instituted to oust officers of a private corporation and to induct the relators into the offices, the burden is on the relators to show their title to the offices. State v. Oftedal, 72 Minn. 498, 75 N. W. 692; People v. Lacoste, 37 N. Y. 192.

It seems that in an action in the nature of a quo warranto proceeding brought against a corporation for the purpose of forfeiting its franchise the burden of proof is on the state. North, etc. Rolling Stock Co. v. Peo- ple, 147 Ill. 246, 35 N. E. 608, 24 L.R.A. 462; State v. Talbot, 123 Mo. 69, 27 S. W. 366; State v. Grimm, 220 Mo. 483, 119 S. W. 626. See also State v. Lincoln Traction Co. 90 Neb. 535, 134 N. W. 278. Thus in State v. Talbot, supra, it was said: "When the validity of an incorporation is questioned by the state, it is incumbent upon those assuming to act under it, to show, not only a valid incorporation, but also that the business transacted thereunder is lawful and is conducted in a lawful manner. We do not think the question suggested can be sustained. The certificate, if issued under authority of law, prima facie confers the right to conduct the business therein authorized, and in order for the state to attack the corporation for acts of its officers ultra vires, or contrary to the constitution or laws of the state, it devolves upon it to charge and prove the abuse or misuser of its franchises relied upon as a ground of forfeiture."

Minority Rule.

In some jurisdictions the rule obtains that the burden of proof in a quo warranto proceeding or an action in the nature thereof is to be determined from the issues raised by the pleadings precisely as in other actions. State v. Cobb, 2 Kan. 48; Campbell v. Braden, 31 Kan. 754, 3 Pac. 542; Tarbox v. Sughrue, 36 Kan. 228, 12 Pac. 935; Brown v. Jeffries, 42 Kan. 605, 22 Pac. 578; State v. Trinkle, 70 Kan. 396, 78 Pac. 854; State v. Haskell, 14 Nev. 209. And see the reported case. See also State v. Hunton, 28 Vt. 594; Clark v. Wild, 85 Vt. 212, Ann. Cas. 1914C 661, 81 Atl. 536; State v. Greene, 87 Vt. 94, 88 Atl. 515, 517. Thus in State v. Hunton, supra, it was said: "The form of the issue, requiring the defendants to show cause, would seem to indicate, in form, that the defendants would be required to go forward in the case. But it seems to us that the form of the issue in the case does not correctly define the true position of the parties, in regard to the presumption of right. The defendants are in possession of the office in question, and should be presumed regularly elected and entitled to hold until the contrary be shown. The plaintiffs, then, are bound to make a case against them, and they should go forward in the proof and in the argument." And in State v. Trinkle, 70 Kan. 396, 78 Pac. 854, it was held in an action in the nature of quo warranto for the removal of a public officer for misconduct that the burden of proof was on the state as it would not be presumed that the officer was guilty of misconduct.

RAILROAD COMPANY.

CHAMBERS.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—September 23, 1915.

165 Ky. 703; 178 S. W. 1041.

Evidence — Weight — Testimony to Fact Physically Impossible.

Where one car and the trucks of another rolled off the end of a railroad switch and crashed into the fence in front of plaintiff's residence, wrecking it, but not injuring the house, except breaking a window by a flying picket, testimony by plaintiff that she was thrown over the foot of a bed, which was two feet higher than the mattress, onto a rocking chair, and thereby injured, when taken into connection with testimony by other occupants that they were not even awakened, is contrary to the physical facts, and no recovery can be had.

[See note at end of this case.]

Witnesses — Credibility — Question for Jury.

The credibility of witnesses is for the jury.

Trial — Direction of Verdict — Pre-sumptions.

On motion for directed verdict, the evidence of the adverse party must be taken as true, and every reasonable inference fairly deducible therefrom indulged.

Testimony to Facts Physically Impossible.

While the scintilla rule prevails as to the quantity of evidence necessary to carry a case to the jury, a verdict of the jury based on evidence contrary to the physical facts will be reversed, for the evidence to support a verdict must be such as is fit to induce conviction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson county, Common Pleas Branch, Fourth Division.

Action by Mrs. Mahala Chambers, plaintiff, against Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Helm & Helm and Benjamin D. Warfield for appellant.

S. L. Trusty for appellee.

[703] HANNAH, J.—Davies Street in Louisville extends east and west. It terminates at its eastern end in a "commons" adjoining the lumber yards of the C. C. Mengel Bros. Company. On the south side of this street and at the corner where the street ends there is a six-room double frame dwelling with brick foundation and cellars under it.

[704] The eastern half of this double dwelling (the half nearer the commons) consisting of three rooms was on November 5th, 1912, occupied by W. E. Chambers and his wife, Mahala, and their son and daughter-in-law, Mr. & Mrs. R. C. Chambers.

From the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company's tracks on Seventh Street there extends westward an industrial switch into the Mengel lumber yard, which switch terminates at a point in the commons about twenty feet east of the Chambers residence, and which runs approximately on a line with the southern line of Davies Street. The dwelling stands back nineteen feet from the fence on the southern line of the street, and four and a half feet from a fence on the west side of the property.

On the night of November 4th, 1912, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Chambers slept in the front room of the eastern half of this double dwelling, and appellee and her husband occupied the adjoining or "middle" room. The bed occupied by the latter couple stood in the southwest corner of the room.

About 4 o'clock on the morning of the 5th a train of cars was backed on to the Mengel switch, and owing to a misunderstanding of signals among the train crew, one car and the trucks of another rolled off of the end of the switch, crashed into the fence in front of the Chambers residence, and stopped with the front trucks in a cistern located on the front fence line and at a point just in front of the middle of the house.

Alleging that "said train and cars were caused to crash into and through the front fence and yard of said premises, violently plowing through the ground and crashing and demolishing things in its path and thereby jarring, shaking and moving said house, and causing plaintiff to come in contact with hard substances, permanently injuring her," Mrs. Mahala Chambers instituted this action against the railroad company to recover damages for her injuries. From a verdict and judgment in her favor in the sum of two thousand dollars the defendant appeals.

The bed upon which the plaintiff and her husband were sleeping was an iron one, the foot of which was two feet higher than the mattress. She testified upon the trial that she was thrown over the foot of the bed on to a rocking chair and thereby injured.

The car itself did not touch the house. It struck the corner of the fence, nineteen feet in front of the house, [705] although about six feet of the width of the car was inside the line of the front fence. It tore down the front fence, which was built of pickets, and also demolished the first three panels of the side fence, and twisted some boards off of the fourth panel, the rear post of which was thirty-two feet from the front corner.

This side fence was constructed of posts placed eight feet apart, upon which were nailed horizontally pine boards sixteen feet long and one foot wide, the boards being arranged with "broken joints;" that is, the first and the third, and the second and fourth boards were so spaced as to end alternately on the posts to which they were attached. The fence was four boards (or four feet) high.

Aside from the breaking of a pane of glass in the front door (evidently caused by a flying picket from the front fence) nothing inside the house was disturbed except that the strings suspending a couple of pictures broke and a stovepipe became disconnected. Nor were there any marks of contact on the exterior of the dwelling.

Mr. & Mrs. R. C. Chambers, who were sleeping on a bed in the front room, were not thrown therefrom. A Mrs. Leonard, with her twenty-year old son and eighteen-year old daughter, occupied the western half of this double dwelling, and none of them were thrown from their beds or seriously disturbed. In fact the son testified that he was not awakened. And we are firmly convinced that Mrs. Mahala Chambers could not have been, as she testified, thrown from her position on the bed, over the foot thereof, two feet higher than the mattress, and on to a rocking chair near the foot thereof. Such an occurrence is inherently impossible; there was no force there present and operating upon her which could have produced such a result; and her testimony in that respect is impeached by all the physical facts, concerning which there is and can be no dispute.

Counsel for appellee undertake to explain this testimony by suggesting that it is quite possible that the noise made by the car in tearing down the fence and the noise of the breaking of the pane of glass in the front door, roused her from her sleep, and that while in a semi-conscious condition she jumped over the foot of the bed. This explanation is quite plausible, but we are not at liberty to accept the statements of counsel as to how she was injured. Appellee herself has undertaken to state how she [706] was injured, and some half dozen times declared in the course of her examination upon the trial that she was knocked over the foot of the bed—which is absolutely inconceivable and cannot be accepted as true.

1. It is undoubtedly well settled in this jurisdiction that the credibility of witnesses is for the jury; that upon a motion for a directed verdict, the evidence for the adverse party must be taken as true and every reasonable inference fairly deducible therefrom must be indulged; and that as to the quantity of evidence necessary to convey a case to the jury, the "scintilla rule" prevails. But these rules, in sound judicial administration, do not become applicable unless the evidence of such adverse party be something of relevant consequence, possessed of the quality of proof, and having fitness to induce conviction. Clark v. Young, 146 Ky. 377, 142 S. W. 1032. Of necessity, these rules cannot apply where the only evidence upon which such adverse party rests his right to succeed, consists of a statement of alleged facts, inherently impossible and absolutely at variance with well established and universally recognized physical laws. In such case, that which purports to be evidence is insufficient to constitute a compliance with the requirements of the scintilla rule, for it is the essence of that rule that there must be some evidence (however slight) upon which the jury might rationally find a verdict for the party producing it.

In Blumenthal v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 97 Me. 255, 54 Atl. 747, the plaintiff had testified to alleged facts which were manifestly untrue; and the court said:

"It is undoubtedly true that where the determination of an issue of fact depends upon the credibility of witnesses, or where the jury would be justified in coming to a conclusion either way, as credence be given to the witnesses on the one side or the other, it is the duty of the court to submit such issue to the jury, however firmly convinced the presiding justice may be that there is no doubt as to where the truth lies; and, even where the surrounding circumstances merely make the story of the witness improbable, it is still the right of the litigant to have the issue thereby raised submitted to the tribunal created by the Constitution and laws for the determination of such questions. But, this cannot be so where the undisputed circumstances show that the story told by the witness upon a material issue cannot by any possibility be true, [707] or when the testimony of the witness is inherently impossible."

So, in McKinley v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 86 N. Y. S. 461, 91 App. Div. 153, the court said: "This is not a case where the credibility of the witness is involved, which takes the case to the jury. His testimony is impeached by physical facts about which there is and can be no controversy." And, upon this ground, the court held the plaintiff not entitled to have his case submitted to the jury.

To the same effect, see also Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Van Elderen, 137 Fed. 557, 70 C. C. A. 255 (evidence for plaintiff contrary to the established laws of hydrostatics); and Willis v. Browning, 179 Mo. App. 233, 166 S. W. 1070.

In Elliott on Railroads, Section 1703 (Second Edition), it is said that "Well established laws of nature and similar well known scitific and physical facts of which the courts will take judicial knowledge, may not only justify a trial court in directing a verdict or in setting aside a verdict and granting a new trial, but may also be sufficient to cause the appellate court to reverse the action of the trial court where it fails to give effect to such facts by directing a verdict or granting a new trial. Notwithstanding the general rule, which prevails in most jurisdictions, that the court on appeal will not weigh the evidence, neither the appellate court nor the trial court should stultify itself by allowing a verdict to stand although there may be evidence tending to support it, where the physical facts are such as to demonstrate that such evidence is untrue and the verdict unjust and unsupported in law and in fact." See also In re Harriot, 145 N. Y. 540, 40 N. E. 246; Johns v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Assoc. 90 Wis. 332, 63 N. W. 276, 41 L.R.A. 587; Hudson v. Rome, etc. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 408, 40 N. E. 8; Hunter v. New York, etc. R. Co. 116 N. Y. 615, 23 N. E. 9, 6 L.R.A. 246; Marshall v. Green Bay, etc. R. Co. 125 Wis. 96, 103 N. W. 249; Baumann v. Hamburg-American Packet Co. 67 N. J. L. 250, 51 Atl. 461.

We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court should have sustained the motion of defendant for a directed verdict, a thorough and careful consideration of the question having convinced the court that the rule [708] herein announced is not only sound in principle but incontestably desirable and proper in the administration of procedural law, and one the discriminating application of which will more than justify its enunciation.

The judgment is reversed.

Introductory.

In Wolf v. City, etc. R. Co. 50 Ore. 64, 15 Ann. Cas. 1181, it was said that "if the testimony of a witness transcends the laws of nature it is undoubtedly the duty of the court to withdraw such testimony from the consideration of the jury. Similar observations have been made in recent cases.

"The story of a witness on the stand, contradicted by any instrument or statement from the mouth of any other witness, may, in the light of physical situations and matters of common knowledge, convict him of being at least conclusively mistaken." Falkenstern v. Greenfield, 145 Wis. 232, 130 N. W. 61. "Neither court nor jury is bound by the mere declaration of a witness—no matter how improbable, incredible, or impossible that declaration may be." Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co. 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513.

"Contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony of a witness alone will not constitute inherent improbability. The best that can be said in favor of the argument in support of the appeal is that there is a pronounced conflict in the testimony offered on behalf of the prosecution, but it is only a conflict; and whether it appear in the evidence offered on behalf of the people or in the evidence adduced upon the whole case, it will not constitute a ground in this court for a reversal of the judgment." People v. Amadio, 25 Cal. App. 729, 145 Pac. 151.

"It has been commonly said: verdicts must rest on probabilities, not on bare possibilities. There is not capacity in any number of the former to create the latter. So the person on whom the burden of proof rests to establish the right of a controversy must produce credible evidence from which men of unbiased minds can reasonably decide in his favor. He cannot leave the right of the matter to rest in mere conjecture and expect to succeed." Samulski v. Menasha Paper Co. 147 Wis. 285, 133 N. W. 142.

Testimony Opposed to Common Sense or Common Experience.

It seems that where evidence is so opposed to common sense or common experience that reasonable minds cannot entertain different opinions about it, it should be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 Pac. 147; Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co. 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; California-Calaveras Min. Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 149 Pac. 595; Yeager v. Chicago, etc. R. 294; State v. Clifford, 228 Mo. 194, 21 Ann. Cas. 1218, 128 S. W. 755, followed in St. Louis v. Cool, 228 Mo. 209, 128 S. W. 759; Willis v. Browning 179 Mo. App. 233, 166 S. W. 1070; Reid v. Hennessy Mercantile Co. 45 Mont. 383, 123 Pac. 397. "The testimony of a witness . . . contrary . . . to common knowledge, . . . is of no weight in favor of the side it is invoked to support, while it may be self-destructive, be successfully impeached by its demonstrated utter improbability or impossibility." Samulski v. Menasha Paper Co. 147 Wis. 285, 133 N. W. 142, "Where the testimony of a witness, though of a most positive character, is yet so improbable when tested by rules which govern men of ordinary capacity and intelligence in a given business transaction, a court may refuse to credit it." Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 Pac. 147; California-Calaveras Min. Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 149 Pac. 595. "Theory should not outweigh practice and experience and evidence which contests and contradicts the evidence of the senses must be received with caution." State v. Clifford, 228 Mo. 194, 21 Ann. Cas. 1218, 128 S. W. 755, wherein the court in discussing the value of evidence which showed that a wagon wheel, whether having a wide or narrow tire, does not normally travel on the full face of the tire, but rather on the outer edge thereof, also said: "This theory is combated by quite a respectable crowd of witnesses for the defense, including experienced wagon-makers and teamsters, all of whom maintain that wheel tires do not roll on their outer edges alone; that when new the tire usually bears more heavily on its outer edge, but that this edge soon wears down, so that the whole face of the tire comes in contact with and bears upon the ground over which it rolls. We must confess that the theory advanced by the relator is to us a novel one, and the literature of the law sheds no light on the subject. Although there be more witnesses in support of than opposed to the theory, that fact does not move us, for it cannot be claimed that a numerical preponderance of witnesses should be decisive of the controversy. Courts will not be presumed to be visionless; and we have never yet seen any kind of wagon tire, rolling on the surface of ground soft enough to receive the impression, which did not leave its full imprint on the narrow strip of earth over which it had rolled." In California-Calaveras Min. Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 149 Pac. 595, it appeared that a person who was claiming as a purchaser of a $100,000 note in good faith and without notice testified that he got $47,000 in currency from his wife to pay a part of the note, the sum being part of $72,000 or $73,000 in currency, which for a long time had been kept in their house in a hardwood cedar chest. The appellate court in holding that his testimony was entitled to no credence said: "Aside from the unusual circumstances of a sensible business man keeping a small fortune in currency in a wooden chest in his house, there are other circumstances impairing the credibility of the story of Walls. . . . His story summarized, shows that he bought a note for one hundred thousand dollars made by a corporation of which he knew nothing; a note which drew no interest and which might not be paid. He could derive no benefit from the transaction unless he purchased the note at a discount which he testified he did not. After the purchase he paid no further attention to the matter, leaving it all to Manson. He did not even obtain possession of the original note and never did have it, and according to his own statement, in the interim between paying Manson the money and receiving the trusted note, Manson had the original note and his one hundred thousand dollars, and he had no receipt or any other writing to protect his interest should anything have happened. There were no witnesses to the transaction, no book entries by either of the parties, no receipts or memorandum, no bank account or other account of Walls showing that his funds had been decreased through payment of this one hundred thousand dollars. In fact, the transaction was so apart from the ordinary course of business as to warrant the court in concluding that the story of Walls was a fabrication and entitled to no credence, and that he was not a purchaser or indorsee of the original note of April 5, 1907, before maturity, or at all." In Hughes v. Hughes, 109 Me. 564 mem. 84 Atl. 647, it appeared that the plaintiff brought an action against his mother and brother for money had and received, it being alleged that the money, of the amount of $1,800, was taken from the plaintiff's old coat hanging in the cellar in his mother's house. Exceptions to a compulsory nonsuit were overruled. So in L'Houx v. Union Constr. Co. 107 Me. 101, 77 Atl. 636, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 800, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by a piece of steel breaking off from a chisel which he was using. The court in sustaining a motion to set aside a verdict for him in an action for damages against his employer said: "It appears from the plaintiff's own testimony that he was 37 years old; that he had worked for 17 years in the construction of water works, railroads, etc.; that he had used a striking hammer on a steel drill every year when there was blasting to do; that he knew steel drills used on stone hammered down on top and sometimes broke off at the point; that he had this chisel made from a piece of steel he took to the blacksmith. He saw clearly the kind of hammer and the kind of chisel proposed to be used. It would seem to be a matter of common knowledge that when steel hammers are struck with great force upon steel chisels or drills held against iron surfaces, chips or particles of steel are liable to break off from the chisel, as well as from the hammer or the iron surface, and fly up and about. Especially would it seem that a man of the plaintiff's age, experience, opportunities for observation, and knowledge of the liability of the steel drills to break off at the point when held against stone, would know there was such danger when such a chisel was held against iron and struck so hard with a seven-pound hammer. If this were all that appeared in the evidence, there would be no question that the plaintiff assumed the risk of the consequences resulting from this heavy blow, under the familiar rule that a servant, if he does not stipulate otherwise, assumes such risks in his employment as are known to him, or would be known to him by the exercise of ordinary observation and forethought. Golden v. Ellis, 104 Me. 177, 71 Atl. 649. But the plaintiff further testified that he in fact did not know that in striking as hard as he did with that hammer upon that chisel held against the iron pipe there was any danger or liability of bits of steel breaking off from the chisel and flying about. His counsel argues that that testimony warranted the jury's finding that he did not assume the risk. Despite his assertion to the contrary, however, it is so clear that he must have known the danger or liability, had he been, as it was his duty to be, ordinarily observant and thoughtful, the jury's finding, resting as it does on that assertion alone, cannot be sustained. We must assume that he was ordinarily observant and caretaking, since such was his duty. Workmen are not excused from the exercise of their senses and reasoning faculties, and unless they stipulate otherwise they assume the risks that such exercise would reveal to them."

But in Winkler v. Power, etc. Machinery Co. 141 Wis. 244, 124 N. W. 273, the court in answering a suggestion that common sense was sufficient to show the incredibility or impossibility of certain testimony said: "What is thought to be common sense is frequently nothing more than a fixed belief based on no evidence and supported by no reasons, and it then ordinarily lacks the certainty requisite for the annihilation of positive evidence to the contrary."

Testimony Contrary to Physical Facts in General.

Where the evidence supporting a cause of action or defense is contrary to the physical facts or the laws of nature it may be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, a verdict based on evidences of that kind being unsustainable. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. O'Neill, 186 Fed. 14, 108 C. C. A. 116; U. S. v. Sixty Barrels of Wine, 225 Fed. 846; McGlade v. Waterloo (Ia.) 156 N. W. 680; *Louisville Water Co. v. See also Phillips v. Southwest Missouri R. Co. 170 Mo. App. 416, 155 S. W. 470; Weck v. Reno Traction Co. 38 Nev. 285, 149 Pac. 65; Carey v. Clark (Nev.) 161 Pac. 713. "No judgment should stand on impossibility; for example, on the fact that one saw around a corner with a naked eye, or through a stone wall." Dyrcz v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 238 Mo. 33, 141 S. W. 861. "No court should be bound by testimony demonstrated to be false by all the other facts in the case, and further demonstrated to be false under our own common knowledge of scientific facts." Sexton v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 245 Mo. 254, 149 S. W. 21. "An uncontrovertible found, or conceded fact, or matter existing beyond all reasonable controversy, manifestly, can successfully challenge testimony to the contrary from the mouth of a witness, or number of them." Samulski v. Menasha Paper Co. 147 Wis. 285, 133 N. W. 142. In McGlade v. Waterloo (Ia.) 156 N. W. 680, it was said: "If the testimony offered by the party having the burden is in conflict with undisputed facts, and especially with physical facts which are a verity, or is such that under all the circumstances it cannot in the nature of things be true, or is such as that it is entirely and wholly inconsistent with any other theory than that the witnesses must have been mistaken, the trial court is justified and it is its duty to direct a verdict for the other party." In Louisville Water Co. v. Lally, 168 Ky. 348, 182 S. W. 186, L.R.A. 1916D 300, the plaintiff brought a suit against a water company to recover damages for negligently flooding his house, it being alleged that the water was suddenly turned on with such velocity as to force it through the faucet. The evidence showed that the faucet through which the water flowed was in perfect condition after the accident, as were all the water piping and fixtures. The court in holding that a verdict should have been directed said: "Neither the pleadings nor the proof afford any reasonable explanation of how that faucet could have been turned on by the return of the water into the pipes when turned on by appellant, and we are unable to imagine how that could have done it. The only explanation, consistent with physical and mechanical laws with which we are familiar, that we are able to imagine, is that appellee, or some member of his family, left the faucet turned on, and that the waste pipe from the basin was obstructed in some way, which prevented the water from escaping through the waste pipe as fast as it came through the faucet, and that the overflow was caused in this way. We have been unable to discover the scintilla of evidence of negligence upon the part of appellant that would justify the court in overruling its motion for a peremptory instruction at the close of appellee's testimony. The evidence in this case can supply the necessary scintilla only by the indulgence in the theory that the force with which appellant turned the water into the pipes opened the faucet by unscrewing it at the washstand, and that would be to suppose a circumstance inherently impossible and absolutely at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical and mechanical laws. Water may be turned into pipes with sufficient force to burst them or tear off fixtures such as the faucet, but not so as to unscrew the faucet. . . . It results, therefore, that appellant's motion for a directed verdict should have been sustained, and the judgment herein is reversed and remanded for proceedings consistent herewith." So in Henry v. Providence Gas Burner Co. (R. I.) 90 Atl. 168, an action to recover damages for the loss of the services of the plaintiff's minor son injured by the alleged negligence of the defendant while in his employ, a directed verdict for the defendant was affirmed on the ground that the testimony of the son regarding the manner in which the accident occurred was inconsistent with the undisputed construction and operation of the machine causing the injury and was to be disregarded. Likewise in Whited v. Cavin, 55 Ore. 98, 105 Pac. 396, it was held that the testimony of a witness that it required as high as seventeen inches of water per acre for the proper irrigation of some lands would not be accepted as accurate although contradicted.

But it is only where the facts testified to are utterly at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical laws, and, therefore, inherently impossible, that courts may refuse to submit the case to the jury. Schaffner v. C. F. Massey Co. 189 Ill. App. 391, affirmed 270 Ill. 207, 110 N. E. 381;

"It is only where the testimony of witnesses is opposed to the plain undisputed and indisputable facts of the occurrence in question that it will be rejected by the court as unworthy of belief." Goode v. Central Coal, etc. Co. 167 Mo. App. 169, 151 S. W. 508. In St. Martin v. Skamania Boom Co. 79 Wash. 393, 140 Pac. 355, it appeared that according to the evidence given a hot spring rose and fell with the rise and fall of a river, and that when the flow of the spring was increased the water was hotter. The court in holding that the evidence could not be rejected as unbelievable said: "It is argued that the latter statement is inherently unbelievable. This argument, however, proceeds upon an initial assumption that the access of the cold river water to the vein of the spring would, of necessity, cool the waters of the spring. An argument a priori such as this, to be of any value, must rest upon some admitted general principle or truth as a basis or cause. It is just here that the argument breaks down. To give it convincing force, it is necessary that we know and understand the operation of the hidden forces which control the flow of the water of the spring, and impart to it its temperature, but we neither know nor understand these forces in the present case. For example, it may be that the water in the spring flows more rapidly from the subterranean heating point when under the greater pressure supplied by the rise of the river, so that it may not have the same time for cooling before reaching the surface as when this pressure is not applied. This is offered not as a theory, but as showing that the assumption that access to the vein of the spring by the water of the river would necessarily cool the water is only an assumption and not an established principle or truth, which would only give validity to appellant's argument. Clearly, in such a case, all that the court can do is to take the evidence of the objective phenomena without speculation as to their causes. There being no evidence to the contrary, we must accept these things as facts." In Peterson v. Liddington, 60 Ind. App. 41, 108 N. E. 977, it was held that a judgment would not be reversed on appeal because the record showed an impossible state of facts against natural law, in that a man sixty-seven years of age weighing 175 pounds threw a man sixty-four years of age and weighing 165 pounds seven feet. Similarly in Winkler v. Power, etc. Machinery Co. 141 Wis. 244, 124 N. W. 273, it was held that testimony as to the degree of lateral movement of a ladle used for carrying molten iron was not improperly submitted to the jury on the ground of its impossibility, it appearing there was an omission in the evidence of the surrounding circumstances making it impossible to demonstrate the incorrectness of the testimony. So in Phillips v. Southwest Missouri R. Co. 170 Mo. App. 416, 155 S. W. 470, it was held that the testimony of the plaintiff that his leg was broken several inches above the ankle by the fall of a street car fender was not so incredible as to require its withdrawal from the jury. Likewise in Campbell v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 58 Pa. Super. Ct. 241, it was held that the testimony of a witness that he saw red hot sparks of the size of a ten-cent piece or larger being emitted from a locomotive on the afternoon of a clear day, was not so contrary to well-known natural laws as to require its withdrawal from the consideration of that jury. And in Yazoo, etc. R. Co. v. Huff (Miss.) 71 So. 757, an action against a railroad company to recover damages for the wrongful killing of a child who had fallen asleep on the track, the court said: "It is hard to believe that a responsible engineer would gamble with the life of a child of tender years; and that he did not in this case is manifest from the undisputed testimony. The engineer is most positive in his testimony that he did not see the object at all until within 150 feet of it. He then did not at first know what the object was. He did the very natural thing of sounding the alarm, and there is no evidence that he took his eyes off the object, and that he failed to act promptly and effectively in applying the brakes and stopping the train. The whole tragedy was enacted within a few moments of time. That the train was brought to a quick stop is conclusively shown by all the testimony in the case. The plaintiff, by taking certain measurements after the accident, attempted to show that an engineer could have seen the small child a distance of at least 500 feet. We do not think, however, the actions of the engineer should be viewed in the light of a calm and deliberate test, made by witnesses standing on the track and looking intently at a small child, which they knew was being put upon the track for the very purpose of making the test. The engineer of a fast-moving train has many duties to perform, and it is not unreasonable that he, as he says, did not, in fact, see the object at all until within 150 feet of the child, and when it was absolutely too late to prevent the injury."

Testimony to Strange Phenomena of Electricity.

In Sexton v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 245 Mo. 254, 149 S. W. 21, the plaintiff sued his employer to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of a "flash over" on an electrical rotary converter alleged to have been caused by tar dropping from a leaking roof. A physician testified that he found sixty or seventy particles of tar the size of a pea on the plaintiff's chest after the accident. The court said: "Under the evidence and under scientific principles it required the destruction of the tar in order to furnish the conductor or medium of the 'flashover.' Such is not consistent with sixty to seventy particles of tar the size of a pea or shot after a 'flashover' and all from a drop of tar from the roof, which drop could not be discovered by one who was looking for the trouble. . . . We omitted some further facts. Plaintiff says that the 'flashover' was as big as a half barrel. His language is: 'The electrical flame burst out through the air as big as a half barrel, and enveloped my head and arms inside this electrical flame.' This carbon brush was fastened to the holder by a small copper wire called a 'pig-tail.' After the accident the brush was picked up from the floor. The wire had been burned in the middle, or thereabout. No evidence as to tar was found upon this brush, or upon the commutator. Under these facts and circumstances, we say in this case on the question of tar as detailed by Dr. Baird, as we did in the Champagne case, 189 Mo. 728, 'such statements do not amount to any substantial evidence of the facts to which they relate.'"

Testimony to Looking or Listening for Approaching Train or Street Car.

It may be stated as a general rule that the testimony of a person struck by a train or car that he looked and listened for an approaching train or car, and did not see or hear it, will be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury where there was nothing to interfere with his sight or hearing. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Moran, 190 Ala. 108, 66 So. 799; Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co. 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Brown v. Chicago City R. Co. 155 Ill. App. 434; Maryland Electric R. Co. v. Beasley, 117 Md. 270, 83 Atl. 157; Dyrcz v. Missouri, etc. R. Co. 238 Mo. 33, 141 S. W. 861; Waggoner v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 152 Mo. App. 173, 133 S. W. 68; Landrum

v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. (Mo.) 178 S. W. 273; Paul v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 231 Pa. St. 338, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1132, 80 Atl. 365; Labelle v. Central Vermont R. Co. 87 Vt. 87, 88 Atl. 517; Harrington v. Rutland R. Co. 89 Vt. 112, 94 Atl. 431; Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Strickler, 118 Va. 153, 86 S. E. 824; White v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 147 Wis. 141, 133 N. W. 148. "This absolute duty of a person to look and listen before attempting to cross a railway track extends to vigilant attention in all directions from which a train, locomotive, or car may come, and includes obligation to see and hear such, if there be any, which such attention, in view of the danger, will enable him to. Therefore, for a person to declare he performed such duty and yet failed to perceive an approaching train or car, in case of their being such in plain sight or hearing, does not raise a question of fact for decision by a jury. Such person must be presumed to either not have performed such duty or to have done so and yet heedlessly submitted himself to the danger, and that is particularly so as regards a person traveling on foot, 'since the danger zone in such a case is so narrow and it may be avoided with so little effort.' . . . This rule of look and listen, in the circumstances stated, and to observe the dangers which are in plain sight or hearing to one in the vigilant performance of it, is, as before indicated, a rule of law, not a mere rule of evidence." White v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 147 Wis. 141, 133 N. W. 148. In Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Strickler, 118 Va. 153, 86 S. E. 824, the rule was applied to the testimony of the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for a collision between a motor truck running on the defendant's tracks and the plaintiff's automobile. In Brown v. Chicago City R. Co. 155 Ill. App. 434, it appeared that the plaintiff after alighting from a south bound car at the south side of a street crossing passed around the rear of the car and while crossing the parallel track on the same street was struck by a train going north. The testimony showed that the north bound train had stopped just south of the street crossing. It was held that the testimony of the plaintiff that she looked and did not see the train before crossing the tracks should have been disregarded. In Paul v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 231 Pa. St. 338, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1132, 80 Atl. 365, a directed verdict for the defendant was affirmed as against the testimony of the plaintiff that he stopped to listen although it was nighttime when the accident occurred and the engine instead of being in front of the train was pushing ten cars and pulling the rest of the train.

But the rule that the law will not credit the testimony of a person who says that he looked and listened for an approaching train or car and did not see or hear it is confined in its application to a situation where in the nature of things he must have seen or heard if he had looked or listened. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. O'Neill, 186 Fed. 13, 108 C. C. A. 115; Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co. 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Loftus v. Pacific Electric R. Co. 166 Cal. 464, 137 Pac. 34; Heinz v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 113 Md. 582, 77 Atl. 980; Davidson v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 164 Mo. App. 701, 148 S. W. 406. "The proposition that the plaintiff, although looking for the train, did not see it, is supported by the testimony of the witnesses we have referred to. There was testimony that the lamp was burning at the Olive street crossing, 250 feet east of the Clay street crossing, yet the three witnesses, two of whom were overtaken by the train, the other of whom met it, near the Olive street crossing, notwithstanding the greater light at that place, were unable, according to their testimony, to distinguish the train until within 20 or 30 feet from it. The witnesses who were upon the porch of the house near the track did not see the train until both engines had passed the house. We could not, without violating the record, hold that the plaintiff, whose opportunities for seeing the train were less than those of the three witnesses near the Olive street crossing, could have seen the train from the Clay street crossing. . . . The plaintiff's testimony that he did not hear the train, although he listened for it, is corroborated by all of the five witnesses mentioned. There was testimony that no steam was escaping from either engine, that the drifting train was slowing down as if for the purpose of stopping at a railroad crossing several hundred feet west of the Clay street crossing, and that it was not heard by the pedestrians upon the track, who especially had it in mind by reason of the danger they incurred in walking there, to say nothing of the fact that its approach was so comparatively quiet that the attention of the witnesses upon the nearby porch was first attracted to the presence of the train, not by the noise, but seeing before them the freight cars which followed the engines." Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. O'Neill, 186 Fed. 13, 108 C. C. A. 115. In Davidson v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 164 Mo. App. 701, 148 S. W. 406, the rule was held not to apply where the plaintiff testified that weeds, grass and brush growing along the right of way obstructed his view. In Loftus v. Pacific Electric R. Co. 166 Cal. 464, 137 Pac. 34, it appeared that the defendant's electric car collided with the plaintiff's automobile at a crossing. The evidence showed that a person approaching the crossing could not see a car until it was within four or five hundred feet of the crossing and that the car when it struck the plaintiff was going at the rate of forty miles an hour. It was held that the evidence of the plaintiff that he looked and listened was sufficient to take the question of his contributory negligence to the jury. So in Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co. 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513, it appeared that the plaintiff was struck by some cars which with an engine attached to the rear were drifting along, no lights showing although it was nighttime. It was held that the evidence of the plaintiff that he looked and listened was sufficient to carry the issue of his contributory negligence to the jury.

Testimony to Speed of Railroad Train or Street Car.

In Brown v. Chicago City R. Co. 155 Ill. App. 434, it appeared that the plaintiff after alighting from a south bound car at the south side of a street crossing passed around the rear of the car, and while crossing the parallel tracks on the same street was struck by a train going north. The testimony showed that the north bound train had stopped just south of the street crossing. It was held that the testimony of a witness that the north bound train was going very fast when it struck the plaintiff was to be disregarded. And in Giles v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 169 Mo. App. 24, 154 S. W. 852, it was held that the testimony of a witness that he successfully boarded a freight car running at the speed of an express train and that the train was brought to a dead stop in ten feet should be ignored.

Testimony to Result of Forces Acting on Animate Human Body.

In Zeiler v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 153 Mo. App. 613, 134 S. W. 1067, the testimony of the plaintiff and two other witnesses showed that while the plaintiff was alighting from a car it started with sufficient force to throw the plaintiff to the ground, and then stopped within two to four feet. It was held that the evidence was substantial and not opposed to physical facts or laws. To the same effect see Elliott v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 157 Mo. App. 517, 138 S. W. 663.

In Daniels v. Kansas City El. R. Co. 177 Mo. App. 280, 164 S. W. 154, it was held that the testimony of a plaintiff that after he had stepped onto the step of a street car but before he had taken hold of the hand-rail the car started and threw him forward out into the street should not be credited. Compare Klass v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 169 Mo. App. 617, 155 S. W. 57, wherein the court in holding that the testimony that a person was thrown forward by the sudden starting of a car was not so improbable as to require its withdrawal from the jury, said: "Counsel for defendant assert that in the position occupied by Mrs. Klass, as described by the witness, the certain effect of a sudden forward start of the car would have been to throw her westward against the rear end of the vestibule and not forward, but it must be borne in mind that several opposing and mutually modifying forces were brought into action, viz.: First, the jerk of the car which, if not interfered with, would have thrown the woman in the opposite direction; second, the force produced by the movement of Mrs. Klass in leaving the car which, at the time, was exerted in a direction at right angles to that of the motion of the car; third, the resistance to the suddenly introduced force offered by the handhold and, fourth, the involuntary effort a person will make to regain his equilibrium under such circumstances. Obviously the direction given the falling body of a person who has some means and opportunity for resistance to the major force would vary in different instances and would depend on the relative strength of the interacting forces. It would not do for us to indulge in a dogmatic conclusion and to pronounce that to be impossible which not only is possible but is well within the scope of the reasonable results of the forces brought into play. The question of whether or not the testimony of the witness is consistent with physical fact and law in this instance should be regarded as one of fact for the jury to determine."

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Britton, 190 Fed. 316, 111 C. C. A. 216, the court in holding that a verdict should have been directed under the facts of the case said: "It is apparent, from a consideration of the physical facts, that plaintiff is mistaken. She was sitting in the seat, she testified, facing in the direction the train was going. She was not sitting next to the window, but near the aisle, and a sudden stopping of the train would have precipitated her forward, not thrown her sideways some distance to the window. Sitting where she was, had she been suddenly thrown sideways against the window sill, she would not have been struck in the side and back below the ribs, but much higher up, at or about the shoulder. . . . The requested instruction for a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, after the close of the trial, should have been given."

In McClanahan v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 147 Mo. App. 386, 126 S. W. 535, it appeared that the plaintiff sought to recover damages against a railroad for the fracture and breaking of the femur bone of her right leg by reason of falling in a hole in the platform at the defendant's station. Her testimony showed that after the accident she kept on her feet with little noticeable change in her walk until the next morning. It was held that the evidence required an instruction to the effect "that if the jury believe the statements of plaintiff about what she did after she received the injury to her leg, yet if they found that such statements were contrary to physical facts as those facts are in evidence, the jury should disregard her statements."

In Wabash R. Co. v. McDoniels, 183 Ind. 104, 107 N. E. 291, the contention of the appellant and the facts pertinent thereto were stated in the opinion of the court as follows: "Appellant complains that the undisputed evidence is that decedent, just after the injury, said to one of its employees that he was standing on the track, when hit, and that the jury disregarded this testimony. By an examination of the evidence on this point we find that one man, a brakeman in the employ of appellant, testified that such a statement was made by decedent to him; that he was the first man to reach the decedent after the injury; another witness testified he was the first to reach decedent; both being witnesses for the appellant. Other witnesses testified that decedent was found some fifty feet or sixty feet northeast of the crossing; that pieces of flesh were found all along between the crossing and the place where decedent lay; and that when found he had a hole in the left side of the head so large that when parties attending were putting ice on his head a piece fell into it; the abdominal wall was torn so that the bowels protruded; the right leg was completely crushed off and entirely separated from the body, at a point within six or eight inches of the hip; the left leg crushed near the hip and that decedent died within five minutes after reaching the hospital." The appellate court in disposing of this contention said: "To believe that this man, injured as he was, could give an intelligent account of the accident would test human credulity to the limit. The jury has the right to disregard the testimony of a witness whose statement is contrary to the laws of nature."

In the reported case it appears that through the negligence of the defendant railroad company a car ran off a switch into the plaintiff's yard, demolishing a fence but not coming in contact with the house. The plaintiff testified that she was thrown from the bed in which she was sleeping over the foot, which was two feet higher than the rest of the bed, on a rocking chair and thereby injured. The court holds that her testimony was not sufficient to take the case to the jury.

Testimony to Improbabilities Connected with Credibility of Witnesses.

Unless the testimony of witnesses is so inherently weak and unreasonable that different minds could not entertain different opinions about it, its credibility and weight are for the jury to determine. Willis v. Browning, 179 Mo. App. 233, 166 S. W. 1070. See also Lucy v. Eulberg, 154 Ill. App. 23.

STEELE

v.

DOWLING.

Ireland—King's Bench Division—November 17, 1913.

[1914] 2 I. R. 432.

Elections — Persons Entitled to Vote — Army Officer.

An army officer living with his wife in quarters assigned to them in military barracks is an occupant of a "dwelling house" and as such entitled to vote, though his use of the premises is subject to regulation by his military superiors and his quarters are subject to change by them.

[See note at end of this case.]

[432] Case stated by the revising barrister for South County Dublin Division.

The case set out as follows:—

"The name of John Steele appeared on the Long List for the Unit of Rathmines and Rathgar West, South County Dublin Division, as follows:—'Steele, Captain John. M. 1, Portobello. Inhabitant Occupier, Barracks. Rathmines West,' and was duly objected to by the respondent. The names of eighty-nine persons in the schedule hereto annexed also appeared as therein described, and were duly objected to.

"The facts established by the evidence were as follows, and related generally to the names of Captain Steele and of the other persons mentioned in the schedule, all of whom reside in the [433] Portobello Barracks, and are married officers or married noncommissioned officers:—

"The outside gate of the barracks is shut at 10 o'clock at night, and is in charge of the sergeant of the guard. In reference to married men and all non-commissioned officers, every one of them, subject to good conduct, holds a pass, enabling him to stay out if he wishes until 12 o'clock midnight only. However, if any of them wishes to stay out after 12 o'clock, he may procure from the company officer and from the commanding officer permission by an 'All-night pass' to stay out until reveille in the morning, at which time all persons must be in the barracks to answer their names. 'All-night passes' are by custom issued by the commanding officer. If a man with a permanent 12 o'clock pass has not got an 'All-night pass,' and arrived later than 12 o'clock, he would be admitted; but the sergeant of the guard would report such case of lateness, and the man would be punished unless it were his first offense. If he was drunk and disorderly, he could be locked up in the guard-house. The regulation as to arriving not later than 12 o'clock does not, however, apply to commissioned officers.

"In all married quarters the principal and necessary portions of the furniture, such as tables, chairs, washstands, wardrobes, and the like are supplied by the army authorities, but married men may, and do, add extra articles, such as curtains, carpets, or an easy chair, of their own property. Married men are supplied also with coal, food, and gaslight. There is a strict rule against having lights in the rooms after a certain hour. The order is 'Lights out' at 10.15 p. m. for barracks; but it is not so strictly enforced in the married as in the unmarried quarters. The married men cook their food in their quarters; and each man has a key of his own quarters, and may go in and out of his apartments at any time during the day without hindrance.

"The poorest quarters have a sitting-room, bedroom, and scullery, and perhaps a joint w. c. With a bigger family a married man might have allotted to him, according to the size of his family, 'B' quarters, having two bedrooms, or 'C' quarters, having three bedrooms. When a married man goes off [434] on leave, he may retain the key of the quarters which had been allotted to him.

"A company officer is entitled to enter the apartments of the married man, not to interfere with the mode of living, but to inquire in regard to complaints. If the officer did not get admission, there would be at once a report to the orderly room, and the man would not refuse a second time. The door would not be broken open, but the soldier might be struck off the 'married roll,' or otherwise punished. He has no right to refuse admission to the company officer.

"Men in barracks cannot receive visitors after 10 o'clock p. m. Civilians are not admitted at all after 10 o'clock p. m. to the barracks, but if a civilian happened to be visiting a married man in his quarters, he might remain for a reasonable time after 10 o'clock p. m., when he must leave. The commanding officer has absolute power to shut up the barracks, and prevent any person from entering or leaving, but only in the event of riot or mutiny or the like would such a power be exercised. The residence of Colonel Hill, the officer commanding the troops, was, during the qualifying period, Roebuck House, Clonskeagh.

"Unless ordered on duty, no person may leave the barracks after 9:30 o'clock p. m.

"The barracks are under perpetual military control, the officer in command being the senior commissioned officer for the time being present. A commanding officer can move any of the married men from one set of apartments to another at any time without notice; and the doctor could similarly remove a man and his family from one set of rooms to another, as, for instance, in the case of an increase of the family.

"There is a key for every door, and the married men are bound to be in their own quarters at night, and must sleep there; any absence from their allotted quarters is an absence without leave. Non-commissioned officers would be reported for arriving after 12 o'clock, just privates would be reported for breach of discipline by arriving after 10 o'clock p. m.

"The medical officer has the right to enter any quarters at any time, and inspect and report.

[435] "It was argued on behalf of the claimants [they were voters on the Long List or Register, not claimants,—(Rep.)], that the restrictions and discipline did not in any appreciable degree differ from that exercised in cities and towns in the case of private houses by public authorities, such as sanitary inspectors, or by public officers, such as police preventing access to a street; and that there was not such evidence of superior control as to prevent the several quarters from being separately occupied as dwelling-houses; and that, as none of the claimants messed together at a common mess, the cases were distinguishable from those dealt with in McDaid v. Barton, 4 Lawson (Eng.) 61, and that that decision did not apply:

"For the objector it was urged that the restrictions proved were inconsistent with the idea of dwelling-houses separately occupied, and that there was no contractual right to the occupation of the several rooms; that the claimants could have rooms allotted to them, or be changed from their rooms to others, without the men's assent and without notice; that lights should be quenched and visitors should leave at a definite hour; that no person could leave the barracks after 10 o'clock; and that the company officer and medical officer had at all times a right of entry into any part of the quarters; and that such drastic rules and prohibitions affecting the mode of life of the claimants in the several sets of rooms, showed such superior control as to prevent the claimants from claiming the franchise; and the cases of Ladd v. Purcell, 3 Lawson (Eng.) 190; O'Brien v. McCarthy (1912) 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 17; and Ladd v. O'Toole [1904] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 389, were relied on.

"I was of opinion that the incidents were not consistent with the ordinary idea of a man's dwelling; that the constant superior control exercised throughout the barracks, carrying with it prohibitions and punishments in respect of the use of the rooms, and the restrictions upon personal freedom of ingress and egress when the claimants were not on duty, deprived the rooms of the characteristics of a true home. Accordingly, I found that Captain John Steele did not occupy 'M. 1' as a separate dwelling, and I expunged his name.

"In the several cases mentioned in the schedule (eighty-nine [436] in all) the facts were identical in all material respects, and the list of them was agreed upon by the solicitors for the appellant and respondent respectively. I allowed the objections in each case, and expunged the names of each of the persons on the same ground; and as the point of law, viz., 'Was there evidence to sustain my finding?' is the same in each, I hereby consolidate the appeals. If there was no evidence in support of my decision, having regard to the principles laid down in the above-mentioned cases, and also in the cases of Bannon v. Hanrahan [1900] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 455, and M'Quade v. Charlton [1904] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 383, then the names should be restored to the list, otherwise they will remain expunged."

Henry, K. C., and Russell for appellants.
Serjeant Sullivan, K. C., and Ronayne for respondent.

William V. Seddall, solicitor for appellants.

J. McDowell, solicitor for respondent.

[439] PALLES, C. B.—The question on this appeal is whether the appellant, Captain Steele, is entitled to be registered as a voter as an inhabitant householder under the service franchise.

Captain Steele, who is married, resided with his family during the qualifying period in Portobello Barracks. His quarters consisted of a sitting-room, bedrooms, sanitary accommodation, and scullery. He and his family have their meals in the sitting-room. He has a key of his rooms, and can enter or leave them at any time of the day or night without hindrance.

The barracks are under perpetual military control, the officer in command being the senior commissioned officer for the time being present. The residence of Colonel Hill, the officer commanding the troops, was, during the qualifying period, not in the barracks but at Roebuck House, Clonskeagh.

I apprehend that were such dwelling-rooms situate in an ordinary house and not in barracks, and separately occupied, as they were by Captain Steele, they would, under 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, sect. 5, be held to be a dwelling-house, and that their habitation by Captain Steele by virtue of his commission in the army would entitle him to be registered as a voter. It is objected, however, that the military control over the barracks (the nature and particulars of which have been found by the case) prevents this result ensuing. Whether it has or has not this effect is the question for decision. The consideration of this [440] question has been so curiously mixed up with the decision of this Court in Ladd v. O'Toole [1904] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 389, which to my mind has no bearing upon it, that it will be convenient that I shall in the first instance remove this element from the discussion.

The decision in Ladd v. O'Toole [1904] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 389, was that this Court declined to follow as an authority the English decision of Stribling v. Halse, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 246. Stribling was a shop-assistant, who by virtue of his employment occupied a furnished bedroom in a dwelling-house belonging to his employers. The house contained other bedrooms similarly occupied by other persons in the same employment, all of whom took their meals in common in another room provided by the employers. The decision there was that of Coleridge, C. J., Grove and Cave, JJ. Coleridge, C. J., in giving judgment, referred to a doubt expressed by Brett, L. J., in Bradley v. Baylis, 8 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 195, at p. 233, whether a person could be said to separately occupy a bedroom as a dwelling-house when he dwelt partly in the bedroom and partly in a sitting-room, and did not dwell in one exclusively. The Chief Justice states (p. 250) that, in a deference to the doubt so expressed, they allowed a case to go to appeal, and that the doubt was removed. In this last observation the reporter points out that the Chief Justice was in error, and that Anketill v. Baylis, 10 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 577, which arose out of Bradley v. Baylis, 8 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 195, turned on a different point. Grove, J., makes his observations in almost similar terms, and, accordingly, the decision, which has been much cavilled at in England, was arrived at, and leave to appeal was refused.

In Ladd v. O'Toole [1904] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 389, this Court, as I have said, declined to follow Stribling v. Halse, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 246. The real ground of the judgment is tersely put by the Lord Chief Justice on page 402 of his judgment. I would like to say why I think Stribling v. Halse, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 246, is wrong. I think the judges proceeded on the view that once it was found there was separate occupation of a bedroom it followed that there was separate occupation of a dwelling-house. This is the fundamental error. Separate occupation of a room in which [441] a person sleeps may be an element in determining whether it is a bedroom strictly so called or a dwelling; but it does not necessarily follow because a room is separately occupied as a sleeping apartment that the room so occupied is a separate dwelling."

The substantial ground of decision in Ladd v. O'Toole [1904] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 389, was that the applicants, although they slept in separate apartments, took their meals together in a common dining-room. It has no more to say to the present question than has the Six Carpenters' Case, and the same observation applies to O'Brien v. McCarthy [1912] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 17. In it the common dining-room, and not the question of control, was the ratio decidendi. Indeed, Lord Justice Holmes, on page 37, expressly reserves his opinion in reference to soldiers. "The case of soldiers," he says, "for some reason has never been raised or discussed in this Court, and I do not wish to anticipate the result if it ever is."

McDaid v. Barton, 4 Lawson (Eng.) 61, was a case relating to non-commissioned officers and unmarried commissioned officers, all of whom were bound to dine at mess, and the case was treated as one virtually involved in O'Brien v. McCarthy [1912] 2 Ir. R. (Eng.) 17, which did not rest on the question of control.

Now, as to the case of military control, it must be regarded, as Mr. Henry rightly pressed upon us, from a point subsequent to the qualifying period, not from one antecedent to it. It depends on the actual occupation during the qualifying period. Had there been an insurrection, Captain Steele might have been removed from his rooms altogether. But so might a weekly tenant be removed from his occupation, and lose his right to a franchise which he retained because he was not so removed. In the present case the extent of the control is not as much as, certainly not more, than that in Atkinson v. Collard, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 254. It was there pressed by Mr. Asquith, and is answered in the considered judgment of the Court in these words: "A servant does not the less inhabit a dwelling-house, nor is it the less a dwelling-house, because the master makes and enforces regulations for the good [442] government of the servant and of the house, nor does the fact that the master retains himself or delegates to others the power of entering a servant's house for the purpose of maintaining order prevent the servant from having the sole and exclusive use of the house."

I entirely agree in this opinion, and hold that the decision of the revising barrister should be reversed, and that Captain Steele should be placed on the register.

HOLMES, L. J.—The legislation that purports to prescribe the conditions entitling a man to the parliamentary franchise has given rise to more perplexing questions than any other statutory code that comes before our Courts, and of these questions, the most difficult are, in my opinion, those that relate to what is called the service franchise. As might be expected, it is hard to reconcile the decisions thereon with each other; and propositions accepted by one strong Court have been criticized or even rejected by another. A typical instance of such a decision is that in Stribling v. Halse, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 246, which held that shop-assistants, each of whom occupied exclusively by reason of his employment a furnished bedroom in a dwelling-house belonging to his employers, were all entitled to be registered as voters, although the house also contained a sitting- or dining-room in which they took in common their meals provided by their employers, who also exercised general control, by means of resident caretakers, over the whole house.

This case was decided in 1885, and from that date, notwithstanding repeated disapproval by distinguished judges in both England and Ireland, it was always followed, generally with reluctance, until 1902, when this Court, McQuade v. Charlton [1904] 2 Ir. R. 383, gave a decision absolutely inconsistent with it. In the following year, in Ladd v. O'Toole [1904] 2 Ir. R. 389, the matter was again reconsidered by all the members of this court; and although other considerations [443] arose therein, we agreed that Stribling v. Halse, 16 Q. B. D. 246, could not be regarded as an authority in this country. I now come to O'Brien v. McCarthy [1912] 2 Ir. R. 17, which I think the revising barrister believed he was following in refusing a vote to Captain Steele. O'Brien v. McCarthy [1912] 2 Ir. R. 17, dealt with the case of attendants in a lunatic asylum, each of whom had the exclusive use and occupation of a room in a building in the asylum known as the servants' quarters. The attendant slept in this room, and it was, therefore, at the least his bedroom. But it was contended that it was something more, and that having regard to the mode in which it was used, it was his dwelling-house. I said in my judgment in that case that in my opinion the principle acted on by the previous Irish authorities does not depend on small details. "The question," I go on to say, "is whether all the circumstances together are consistent with the ordinary idea of the room in which the claimant sleeps being a dwelling-house," and I suggest as a test what we are familiar with in family life. In addition to their bedrooms there are in the asylum a recreation-room, which is used as a sitting-room by the male attendants, and at least one billiard-room. They are at liberty to use the day-rooms of the patients as recreation rooms when the patients are gone to bed; they have also a dining-room for their own exclusive use, and they take their meals therein. Giving dwelling-house any possible meaning, I cannot conceive how the room in which an attendant, having all these advantages in different parts of the building, sleeps, can be so described. Turning to the use of that room, I find nothing in its user that is not customary in a bedroom. It was found by the revising barrister that these rooms were used by the attendants for the purpose of reading, retirement, recreation, and privacy. I have lived in many houses, in all of which I have used my bedroom for the aforesaid purposes, except, perhaps, that of recreation; and if playing a game of patience can be so described, I have used it for that purpose too. In these circumstances, the majority of the Court held that the attendants were not entitled to a vote; and although Cherry, L. J., dissented, he based his decision on English and Scotch cases, which I am of opinion this Court [444] has distinctly declined to follow. Before leaving O'Brien v. M'Carthy [1912] 2 Ir. R. 17, I would add that I have not overlooked the element of control exercised by the Resident Medical Superintendent over the institution and its officers. This must necessarily be very great in a lunatic asylum; but I do not attach much importance to it in a claim for a vote based on the service franchise. In such cases there is always some control over the house and the servants; and yet such control may not be inconsistent with a servant occupying part of the house as his dwelling. The true test is, in my opinion, the mode of user. When O'Brien v. M'Carthy [1912] 2 Ir. R. 17, was before us, two years ago, I was aware that soldiers in barracks had been registered as voters without objection; and I anticipated that as a result of that decision we should be called on to hear appeals relating thereto. In the following year my anticipation was realized in McDaid v. Barton, 4 Lawson 61. In that case officers and non-commissioned officers who were unmarried occupied quarters in barracks, consisting of single rooms used as bedrooms, while they took their meals in a mess-room. It was admitted in that case that the position of the non-commissioned officers could not be distinguished from that of the assistants in the lunatic asylum; and all the members of the court held that, although they were under greater restrictions than the officers in the occupation of their rooms, the occupation of the latter was the same in its essential nature as that of the former, and, therefore, the objection to their claim to vote was allowed. I have referred to the details of these cases, as I think they illustrate the difference between them and the case we are now considering. Captain Steele is a married man, living in the married quarters. The poorest of such quarters have a sitting-room, bedroom, scullery, and, perhaps, a joint w. c. With a larger family, a married man might have allotted to him two or three bedrooms. The food used by the married man and his family is cooked in these rooms, and he has a key thereof which enables him to enter them at any time. I am of opinion on this evidence that each man's quarters is in their use as much his dwelling-house as a London flat is that of its occupant. It is true that there are some restrictions on the [445] enjoyment, but these restrictions are not burdensome; and, as I have already said, the service franchise always involves some kind of restraint. I am satisfied that Captain Steele and the others named in the schedule are entitled to the franchise.

CHERRY, L. J.:—The facts in this case differ materially from those proved in the case of McDaid v. Barton, 4 Lawson 61, decided by this Court last year. In that case the claimants, who were unmarried officers and noncommissioned officers living in barracks, occupied each only a single room, which was primarily used as a bedroom and only occasionally used as a sitting-room. The officers were all dining members of the mess, and partook of all their meals in the mess-room, except in the case of illness. The non-commissioned officers were similarly bound to take their meals at the sergeants' mess. We held that each of the rooms thus occupied was not "separately occupied as a dwelling" within the meaning of the 5th section of the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1878, and we accordingly disallowed the votes.

In the present case the facts are quite different. Captain Steele and the other persons mentioned in the schedule are married officers, or married non-commissioned officers, living with their wives and families in the rooms allotted to them respectively in the Portobello Barracks. They take all their meals in their quarters. Each has a key of his own quarters, and can go in and out of his apartments at any time during the day without hindrance. The poorest quarters have a sitting-room, bedroom, and scullery. In better quarters one or two extra bedrooms are added. The rules as to visiting and military control are apparently the same as in the case of the unmarried officers referred to in McDaid v. Barton, 4 Lawson 61.

Under these circumstances I have no hesitation in holding that each of these persons "inhabits" by virtue of his "office, service or employment" the rooms allotted to him within the meaning of sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.

Two arguments were pressed very forcibly upon us against [446] the right of voters to remain on the register, even on the supposition that we should hold that the suites of rooms occupied in each case constituted separate residences.

First, it was said that in every case of the service franchise there must be a contractual right to the premises occupied, and that here there was no such right, for the officers were liable to removal at any time. Secondly, it was urged that the amount of military control under the King's Regulations exercised by superior officers over the occupants was inconsistent with inhabitant occupancy under the Franchise Act.

The simplest and shortest answer to these arguments is that they were put forward and overruled by the English Court of Queen's Bench nearly thirty years ago, and officers and non-commissioned officers were held, in the group of cases reported under the heading of Atkinson v. Collard, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 254, to be entitled to the franchise in circumstances precisely similar to those in the present case. Upon the questions how far contractual right to the premises is necessary in the case of the service franchise, and how far control of the occupant by persons in authority is inconsistent with it, there is happily no divergence between the English and Irish decisions, though on the question of what is necessary to constitute a separate residence there is some conflict between the decisions in the two countries. The case of Atkinson v. Collard, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 254, is not, of course, binding on this Court, but it has been acted upon in England and Scotland for a great many years, and I think we ought to follow it on these two points, though we cannot regard it as an authority in Ireland upon the main questions as to what user constitutes "residence" within the meaning of the Franchise Acts.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister should be reversed, and that the objections to the voters' names being upon the registry should be overruled.

NOTE.

Right to Vote of Soldier or Sailor in Actual Service.

In General.

In the absence of a constitutional or statutory provision to the contrary soldiers or sailors in the service of the United States are not disqualified as voters because of their membership in the armed forces. People v. Riley, 15 Cal. 48; Hunt v. Richards, 4 Kan. 549; Taylor v. Reading, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 439. See also Election Law, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 497, 29 Leg. Int. 196; Opinion of Judges, 37 Vt. 665.

It is generally provided either by constitutional or statutory provisions that a residence for the purpose of voting is not deemed to be gained or lost by reason of employment in the service of the United States. Consequently a soldier or sailor does not gain a residence for the purpose of voting in a particular place by reason of his mere presence there while in the performance of his duty. In re Green, 5 Fed. 145; People v. Riley, 15 Cal. 48; Devlin v. Anderson, 38 Cal. 92; Mead v. Carrol, 6 D. C. 338; Hunt v. Richards, 4 Kan. 549; Taylor v. Reading, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 439; Election Law, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 497, 29 Leg. Int. 196. See also Matter of Cunningham, 45 Misc. 206, 91 N. Y. S. 975; Matter of Lewis, 172 App. Div. 271, 158 N. Y. S. 1036; In re Highlands, 22 N. Y. S. 137. Thus in the case of In re Green, supra, it appeared that the petitioner had enlisted as a marine at the Brooklyn navy yard while a resident of New York city. According to the practice of the service persons so enlisting were stationed at that yard during the two years succeeding their enlistment, and it was contended that the expectation entertained by the petitioner at the time of his enlistment that he would be allowed to remain in Brooklyn for two years was a circumstance to be considered in determining his right to vote there. The court in answering this contention said: "But I am unable to see that the case is altered by this circumstance. The only intention the petitioner could have had in enlisting was to obey the orders of his commanding officer as to the place of his future abode. If he entered the service with the belief, hope, and expectation that he would be ordered to remain in Brooklyn, that does not affect the fact that by enlisting he made it impossible for him to have an intention of his own in regard to his residence at any particular place during the term of his enlistment." And in the case of In re Highlands, 22 N. Y. S. 137, it was held that persons residing on the West Point Military reservation did not thereby gain a residence there for the purpose of voting.

The converse of the proposition heretofore stated is also true, namely, that a soldier or sailor does not lose his residence for the purpose of voting by reason of his absence therefrom on account of his employment. Matter of Lewis, 172 App. Div. 271, 158 N. Y. S. 1036. See also Mead v. Carol, 6 D. C. 338; Crawford v. Wilson, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 504. Thus in the case of In re Lewis, supra, it was held that an employee of a United States arsenal who also resided within the boundaries of the arsenal did not lose his right to vote as from his residence before he entered the service of the United States.

Although a soldier or sailor is deemed not to gain or lose a residence by reason of his presence or absence due to his employment, the rule that he may during his period of service change his residence where his intention so to do is sufficiently shown is supported by several cases. In re Green, 5 Fed. 145; Matter of Cunningham, 45 Misc. 206, 91 N. Y. S. 975. See also Election Law, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 497, 29 Leg. Int. 196. Thus in Matter of Cunningham, supra, the court in holding that a soldier was entitled to be registered as a voter as a resident at his place of service under the facts therein shown said: "The soldier may acquire a residence in the new locality. His calling the place his home, or believing it to be his home, does not legally make it such. It is not his view of the fact that governs; the facts themselves govern the question. Mere intention is not alone sufficient. It must exist, but must concur with and be manifested by resultant acts which are independent of the presence of the soldier in the new locality. It appears from the evidence produced on the part of the applicants that they have resided outside of the military reservation, within the state and ward No. 6 of the city of Plattsburg, during the year last past. This is in no way contradicted except by one (Tierney) who claims that the applicants admitted to him in a conversation that they had not resided outside of the military reservation for over a year. I think the proof sufficient to establish a residence in this ward for over a year last past, and, therefore, order that the board of inspectors convene and place the names of the applicants on the register list as provided by law, and that an order may be entered accordingly."

Under the Texas constitution (art. VI, § 1, sub-sec. 5) soldiers, marines and seamen employed in the service of the army or navy of the United States are denied the right to vote. Accordingly it was held in Savage v. Umphries (Tex.) 118 S. W. 893, that a member of the National Guard while employed in the service of the army of the United States was not entitled to vote.

In Great Britain it is provided by statute (Representation of the People Act of 1884) that where a man inhabits a dwelling house in respect of which no person is rated by reason of such dwelling house belonging to or being occupied on behalf of the Crown, or by reason of any other ground of exemption, such person shall not be disentitled to be registered as a voter. It is also provided by another statute (s. 5 of the Registration Act of 1878) that the term dwelling house is to include any part of a house where that part is separately occupied as a dwelling, and that where an occupier is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of any part of a house, that part shall not be deemed to be occupied otherwise than separately by reason only that the occupier is entitled to the joint use of some other part. Under that act the rule seems to be that the occupancy by a soldier or officer of separate quarters in a barracks is none the less an inhabitancy of a dwelling house because the occupants thereof are subject to military control by superior officers. Atkinson v. Collard, Colt. Reg. Cas. 375, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 254, 55 L. J. Q. B. 18, 50 J. P. 23, 53 L. T. N. S. 670, 34 W. R. 75. And see the reported case. Compare McDaid v. Barton, 4 Lawson (Eng.) 61, discussed at length in the reported case.

Voting at Place without District.

During the Civil War a number of states passed statutes known as soldiers' voting acts which permitted volunteers while in the service of the United States to vote although they were stationed beyond the borders of their respective states. In several cases these acts were held to be valid. Morrison v. Springer, 15 Ia. 304; Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 573; State v. Main, 16 Wis. 498. But in a number of jurisdictions they were held to be invalid on the ground that they violated constitutional provisions relating to the place at which votes were to be cast. Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 161; Day v. Jones, 31 Cal. 261; Opinion of Judges, 30 Conn. 691; People v. Blodgett, 13 Mich. 127; Opinion of Justices, 44 N. H. 633; Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. St. 403; Thompson v. Ewing, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 67, 5 Phila. 102, 19 Leg. Int. 348; Opinion of Judges, 37 Vt. 665. However, under similar constitutional provisions acts permitting voters engaged in the military service of the country to vote at the places where they are stationed, for electors of the president and vice-president of the United States and for the representatives in Congress have been said to be valid on the ground that by the Federal Constitution, the whole subject relating to the election of those officers is intrusted to the state legislatures subject to the control of Congress. Opinion of Justices, 45 N. H. 595, 596; Opinion of Judges, 37 Vt. 665. In State v. Sadler, 25 Nev. 131, 58 Pac. 284, 59 Pac. 546, 63 Pac. 128, 83 Am. St. Rep. 573, the court, in discussing the question whether a federal statute permitting electors of the territory of Nevada including those serving in the army of the United States both within and beyond the boundaries of the territory to vote at an election submitting a constitution for the territory, applied after Nevada became a state, said: "It was alleged by the complaint that Troop A, First Nevada Cavalry, in actual service in the United States army without the boundaries of the state, on the 8th day of November, 1898, on board ship on the high seas, between the coast of California and the Hawaiian Islands, who were citizens and electors of this state, held an election and cast their ballots in due form of law, and made due return thereof to the secretary of state; that the board of canvassers, consisting of the governor, chief justice of the state, and the United States district attorney, as provided in the election ordinances of the constitution of this state, and the present state board of canvassers, consisting of the chief justice and one or more of the associate justices, have each failed to open and canvass said soldiers' votes; that said votes, if opened and canvassed, will show 11 votes cast for the respondent and 24 votes cast for relator; and that said votes should be canvassed and counted by the court. Held, that said election ordinance applied only to the election held in pursuance of the mandate of Congress, found in the enabling act, requiring the constitutional convention to submit for ratification or rejection the constitution to the people of the Territory of Nevada, including those in the army of the United States, both within and beyond the boundaries of the territory; that the provisions of said ordinance do not, and were not intended to, apply to future elections held under the constitution and state government, but only to the election therein specifically provided for, and to any future election that Congress might for any reason order for resubmitting the constitution to the people of the territory, as Congress did with reference to a constitution framed by a convention for Kansas a few years before; that there is no statutory provision regulating the manner of voting or holding elections by persons who may be in the military or naval service of the United States, beyond the boundaries of the state, or for making returns of such election; and that without such provisions no such election could be legally held."

The New York constitution provides "that in time of war no elector in the actual military service of the state, or of the United States, in the army or navy thereof, shall be deprived of his vote by reason of his absence from such election district." In 8 State Dep. Rept. the attorney general of New York in advising that a state of war within the meaning of the constitution existed when armed forces of the United States were sent into Mexico on a primitive expedition to capture or destroy insurrectionists who had invaded the territory of the United States, said: "As the constitution now stands, the elector may, in time of war, vote in the field provided he be outside of his election district in the actual military service either of the state or of the United States. . . . The plain purpose of the amendment is to provide for the taking of the soldier vote in the field whenever the elector's absence from his election district is compulsory by reason of his being in the actual military service of the state or of the United States; but the amendment can operate only in a 'time of war.' Any emergency, therefore, whether it be solemn war or imperfect war; whether it be invasion from without either actual or threatened; or insurrection or rebellion within our own borders; if the emergency is such that the state or nation finds it necessary to prosecute its right by force of arms, and to that end to mobilize the military forces of the state and call them into active military service, it is a 'time of war' within the meaning of the constitution, and article 15 of the Election Law immediately becomes operative. . . . That 'imperfect war' exists, . . . is clearly obvious. The territory of our country has been invaded by armed forces from Mexico who are in a state of insurrection against the Mexican Government. These armed forces have committed murder upon our citizens and destroyed their property. There is a constant menace and threat of similar invasion. Armed forces of the United States have been sent into Mexico on a punitive expedition to capture or destroy these lawless invaders of our country. General Trevino claiming to act by authority of the de facto government has assumed to oppose the movement of the United States troops now on Mexican territory in any direction, save towards the border of their own country. . . . In view of all these facts and conditions, a status of 'imperfect war' exists . . . , and this condition is equivalent to a 'time of war' for the purpose of bringing into operation the provision of our constitution and the statute enacted to carry its provisions into effect for the taking of the soldier vote in the field."

PORTLAND TRUST AND SAVINGS BANK ET AL.

Washington Supreme Court—February 17,
1916.

89 Wash. 627; 155 Pac. 162.

Witnesses — Testimony to Transaction with Decedent — Deceased Agent of Party.

Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1211, providing that, in an action or proceeding where the adverse party sues or defends as deriving right or title by, through, or from any deceased person, a party in interest shall not be permitted to testify in his own behalf as to any transaction had by him with the deceased, does not exclude the testimony of an officer and stockholder of one corporation from testifying as to a transaction had by him, as such officer, with an officer and stockholder, since deceased, of another corporation, from which the witness' corporation derives a right or title which it seeks to assert.

Depositions Taken before Death.

Such statute does not render inadmissible a deposition of the surviving party to a transaction taken before the death of the other party, though it is offered in evidence after such death.

[See note at end of this case.]

Garnishment — Property Subject — Deposit with Sheriff to Discharge Liens.

The proceeds of a cashier's check deposited by a bank with a sheriff and receiver to secure the discharge of loggers' liens in a foreclosure suit is not subject to garnishment at the suit of other creditors of the defendant in the foreclosure action, though the check was indorsed by the sheriff to the clerk of the court and was by him cashed, and though defendant prevailed as against the loggers' liens, where the check was not a loan by the bank to defendant, but was a special deposit to be returned to the bank in the event that it was not used for the purpose intended, and it was immaterial that a note for the amount of the check was given by defendant to the bank to evidence the transaction.

[See 12 R. C. L. tit. Garnishment, p. 808.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Clarke county: HOLCOMB, Judge.

Action by James Beaston et al., plaintiffs, against Payette Timber and Milling Company, Limited, defendant. From judgment rendered, intervener Portland Trust and Savings Bank appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Huntington & Wilson for appellant.

McMaster, Hall & Drouley for respondents.

[628] FULLERTON, J.—In the early part of the year 1912, an action was brought by T. C. Stearns and others, as plaintiffs, against the Payette Timber & Milling Company, to foreclose loggers' liens filed by the plaintiffs upon certain logs and timber products owned by the milling company. At the commencement of the action, the court appointed the sheriff of the county wherein the liens were filed as receiver of the property, and possession of the property was duly taken by the sheriff pursuant to such appointment. After the seizure of the property by the sheriff, the milling company sought to secure its release prior to the determination of the question whether the liens of the plaintiffs were valid and subsisting liens thereon, a question on which it had taken issue in the foreclosure action. Pursuant to that purpose, it procured the Portland Trust & Savings Bank to issue its cashier's check, payable to the sheriff holding the property, in an amount equal to the claims sued upon, together with one hundred dollars additional to cover costs and interest. The statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1173; P. C. 909, § 35) required that the deposit to secure the release of the property be made with the clerk of the court, and the sheriff, after indorsing the check, caused it to be so deposited, whereupon the property was released to the milling company. The clerk, however, did not hold the check, but caused it to be cashed and held the money in its stead. Later on, the issue between [629] the lien claimants and the milling company was tried out and resulted in a judgment in favor of the milling company, which was duly entered on June 17, 1912.

On January 24, 1912, the respondents in the present action recovered a judgment against the milling company for $1,625. Subsequent to the deposit of the money with the clerk in the first action mentioned, but prior to the termination of that action, the respondents caused a writ of garnishment to be issued and served upon the clerk, garnishing all moneys in his possession belonging to the milling company. On September 16, 1912, after the final termination of the lien case and the time limited to appeal therefrom had expired, the judgment creditors caused an execution to issue on the judgment and a second writ of garnishment to be issued and served upon the clerk. In the meantime, the bank named had served a notice upon the clerk to the effect that the money deposited with him in the lien foreclosure proceedings was the money of the bank, and that the bank would look to him for the return of the money, if not applied to the purposes for which it was deposited. The clerk made answer to the garnishment proceedings, setting up the adverse claim made to the money by the bank. The bank also obtained leave of court and filed a complaint of intervention in the proceedings, in which it set up its claim to the money. An answer was filed to the complaint, and on the issues thus framed, the rights of the parties to the money was tried. Judgment was entered against the bank and in favor of the garnishees, and from this judgment, the present appeal is prosecuted.

As a preliminary question, it is necessary to notice an objection made by the respondents to the admissibility of certain evidence offered by the appellant. In the negotiations leading up to the deposit of the money with the clerk of the court, the bank was represented by one Olmstead, its then vice president and manager, and the milling company by one Brainard, its president; each of these persons being at the [630] time a stockholder in the corporation which he represented. Prior to the trial of the garnishment proceedings, the deposition of Olmstead was taken for use at that trial, as to the understanding had between Brainard and himself concerning the deposit of the money. Between the date of the taking of the deposition and the date of the trial, Brainard died, and when the deposition was offered in evidence, it was objected to on the ground that the witness was incompetent to testify, because of the statute relating to the competency of witnesses when the adverse party sues or defends as the representative of, or as deriving right or title from or through, a deceased person. The trial court admitted the deposition, the respondents claim erroneously, and they urge in this court that it must be rejected here, since this court tries the action de novo and must try it upon the competent evidence in the record only. The statute relied upon to exclude the evidence is found at Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1211 (P. C. 81, § 1027). The portion thereof material to the question reads as follows:

"No person offered as a witness shall be excluded from giving evidence by reason of his interests in the event of the action, as a party thereto or otherwise; but such interest may be shown to affect his credibility: Provided, however, that in an action or proceeding where the adverse party sues or defends as executor, administrator, or legal representative of any deceased person, or as deriving right or title by, through, or from any deceased person, or as the guardian or conservator of the estate of any insane person, or of any minor under the age of fourteen years, then a party in interest or to the record shall not be admitted to testify in his own behalf as to any transaction had by him with or any statement made to him by any such deceased or insane person, or by any such minor under the age of fourteen years."

The respondents do not, of course, claim that they are suing or defending as executor or administrator, or as the legal representative of any deceased person, but claim, as we understand them, that they defend as deriving right through [631] and from a corporation in which Brainard had an interest; the argument being that, since Brainard was, at the time of making the contract, a stockholder in and president of the milling company, he had a personal interest in the property of that company, and since the claim of the appellant bank to the money in the hands of the clerk affects that property, it affects such interest as Brainard had in the corporation, and to permit Olmstead to testify is to permit a party in interest to testify on his own behalf to a transaction had by him with a deceased person where the adverse party claims by or through such person. But we are constrained to the belief that the contention is not well founded. There are cases which maintain the rule that a stockholder has such an interest in a corporation as to disqualify him from testifying in behalf of the corporation in an action against the representatives of a deceased person, and cases, also, which maintain the converse of the rule, namely, that if the parties be living, one of them will not be permitted to testify to transactions with the other if the agent of that other, who conducted the transactions, be dead.

This latter rule may support the contention of the respondents, but we think the cases upon which it is founded, for the greater part at least, rest upon statutes which can be differentiated from our own, and that they are contrary to the general trend of the cases even upon like statutes. Our statute, it will be observed, applies, in its terms, only in the case of the death of a natural person who is a principal in the contract. It makes no reference to corporations, or to agents of corporations, or even to agents of deceased natural persons, and to read into it this further exception would be, we believe, an unwarranted extension of its terms. The cases cited from other jurisdictions, we shall not review. As we say, they are conflicting. Of the two cases cited from this court, the first is Gilmore v. H. W. Baker Co. 12 Wash. 468, 41 Pac. 124. But a careful reading of the case will show that the exclusion of the evidence there offered was rested [632] upon different principles from that contended for here; the court expressly saying, that it did "not feel called upon to pass on the question of whether an officer of a corporation can be permitted to testify to a transaction with a deceased person, in a suit between such corporation and the representative of such deceased person." The other case is Thorne v. Joy, 15 Wash. 83, 45 Pac. 642. In this case the witness excluded stood in the relation of a mortgagee to the property in dispute, which would be affected by the result of the action. Plainly the case is not in point on the question here involved.

We think, further, that the deposition was admissible under the rule of the case of Neis v. Farquharson, 9 Wash. 508, 37 Pac. 697. In that case we held that the death of a party to an action and the substitution of his legal representative, subsequent to the commencement of the action, did not render inadmissible in evidence the deposition of an adverse party in interest, when, at the time such deposition was taken, the witness was competent. This, on the principle that the witness testified when his deposition was taken, not when it was offered to be read in evidence. Such were the facts in the case before us. At the time the deposition of Olmstead was taken, all of the parties to the transaction were alive, and his evidence was then clearly competent, and the statute, to use the language of Judge Anders, "makes the time of testifying the test of competency, rather than the time of the hearing."

Treating the deposition of Olmstead as properly in the record, we think the trial court reached an erroneous conclusion on the facts. Olmstead's testimony makes it clear that the bank did not intend to make a loan of the money to the willing company, or otherwise vest it with title or ownership therein. While the witness realized that the money would be applied to the satisfaction of the claims of the plaintiffs in the lien foreclosure action, should they succeed in establishing their liens, he was led to infer from the statements [633] of Brainard that there were well grounded reasons for believing that they would not be so successful, and that the money would be returned to the bank within a short time. He also testified that it was understood between himself and Brainard that the check would not be cashed unless necessary for the payment of a judgment obtained by the lien claimants, but would, if not cashed for that purpose, be returned to the bank in its original form. His statements, it seems to us, are supported by the fact that the check was not made payable to Brainard nor the milling company, nor to any one for the milling company, but to the officer who had seized the property. It is true a note was taken from the milling company for the amount of the check, but this the witness explains was a convenient method of keeping an account of the transaction and to represent the obligation in case the proceeds of the check were applied on the liability it was given to indemnify. But, without pursuing the inquiry further, we think it clear that the money was deposited for a special purpose, without intent on the part of the depositor to part with title unless necessary to be used for that special purpose. Were the contract, therefore, between the milling company and the bank, the milling company could not retain the money. The judgment debtors of the milling company by garnishing the money acquired no greater rights in the money than the milling company itself possessed, and, since the latter had no rights, the garnisheeing creditors acquired none. Bellingham Bay Boom Co. v. Brisbois, 14 Wash. 173, 44 Pac. 153, 46 Pac. 238; Merwin v. Fowler, 20 Wash. 587, 56 Pac. 374; McAlmond v. Bevington, 23 Wash. 315, 63 Pac. 251, 53 L.R.A. 597. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to enter a judgment for the appellant intervener.

NOTE.

Statute against Admission of Evidence of Transaction with Decedent as Applicable to Deposition Taken before Death.

In Boyd v. Gore, 143 Wis. 531, 21 Ann. Cas. 1263, it was held, under a statute (St. Wis. 1898, § 4902) in force in that jurisdiction authorizing objections to be taken on the trial in case of evidence taken by deposition to the same extent as if the witnesses were personally present, that a deposition of a party taken before the death of the adverse party was inadmissible against the personal representatives of the deceased party as to transactions and communications had by the deponent personally with the deceased in his lifetime.

In the reported case, the court construes the Washington statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1211) which provides as follows: "No person offered as a witness shall be excluded from giving evidence by reason of his interest in the event of the action, as a party thereto or otherwise; but such interest may be shown to affect his credibility: Provided, however, that in an action or proceeding where the adverse party sues or defends as executor, administrator, or legal representative of any deceased person, or as deriving right or title by, through, or from any deceased person, . . . then a party in interest or to the record shall not be admitted to testify in his own behalf as to any transaction had by him with or any statement made to him by any such deceased or insane person." It is held that the statute is not broad enough to exclude the deposition of a party as to transactions with a person since deceased who was an officer of the adverse party, a corporation. It is further held that the deposition in question was admissible under the ruling in Neis v. Farquharson, 9 Wash. 508, 37 Pac. 697, inasmuch as at the time that it was taken all the parties to the transaction were alive and the evidence was clearly competent, the principle being that the witness testified when his deposition was taken, not when it was offered to be read in evidence, and the statute, in the language of the judge, making "the time of testifying the test of competency, rather than the time of the hearing."

No other recent case seems to have passed on the question.

defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Robert Stone and George T. McDermott for appellant.

W. J. Gregg and J. D. Gregg for appellee.

[777] MARSHALL, J.—This is an action brought by an insurance company against its agent, to recover damages sustained by reason of the agent's issuing an insurance policy in violation of instructions given by the company to the agent. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

[778] The plaintiff alleges that it is a corporation. The defendant for his answer files a general denial, alleges affirmative matter, and verifies the answer, as follows:

"State of Kansas, Marshall Co., ss.

"Joe Baer, being first duly sworn upon his oath, says that he has read and knows the contents of the foregoing answer, and that the statements, allegations and averments therein contained are true."

No evidence was introduced to show that the plaintiff was a corporation. The evidence shows that Joseph Baer, who was a banker, was the agent of the plaintiff, with power to issue policies of insurance; and that he wrote W. D. Perry, state agent for the company, on February 24, 1908, asking where he could insure stallions and jacks, and in what company. To this Perry replied, on March 2, as follows:

"This will acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor of the 24th ultimo inquiring relative to insurance on fine horses and in reply beg to advise that while such risks are not regarded in high favor by any company, nevertheless in view of the fact that you have rendered us very satisfactory service during the past years you may feel at liberty to insure such risks in the North America. The rate on such stock in a private barn should not be less than 2.50 per hundred and of course if such stock is kept in a livery barn or other specifically rated risk the rate on such risk would govern in such cases.

"Your form should read so as to describe the particular animal by name, breed, and positively color, 'while and only while' in the premises described."

March 10, 1908, Perry again wrote Baer as follows:

"I have for acknowledgment your favor of the 3rd, relative to insurance on fine horses.

"Since writing you last I have received a letter from General Agent Downing with particular reference to this class of business

v.

BAER.

Kansas Supreme Court—April 10, 1915.

94 Kan. 777; 147 Pac. 840.

Appeal — Questions Reviewed — Objection Not Made at Trial.

A wrong judgment, whereby a plaintiff corporation was defeated in the trial court, will not be upheld in this court on the sole ground that the corporate existence of the plaintiff was not proved, when that corporate existence was not treated as one of the issues on trial, and such failure of proof is presented and is called to the attention of the unsuccessful party for the first time in this court.

Insurance — Liability of Agent — Unauthorized Issuance of Policy.

An insurance agent who issues a policy of insurance in violation of the instructions of his company is liable to the company for the amount of insurance paid and expenses incurred by the company on account of a loss under the policy.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An insurance agent cannot defeat his liability to his company for issuing a policy in violation of his instructions by showing that the company might have escaped liability on the policy by litigation.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Marshall county: KIMBLE, Judge.

Action by Insurance Company of North America, plaintiff, against Joseph Baer, deand he advised that he has been scrupulously declining to insure high priced horses particularly those used for breeding purposes. Inasmuch, however, as having been discussing the matter with you I am forwarding your correspondence to him [779] and have asked him to give you such final instructions as he may deem advisable under the circumstances. It seems that I was laboring under a false impression in view of what Mr. Downing had said and I prefer that he give you the final word in connection with this class of business."

The inquiries of Baer appear to have been turned over to W. N. Johnson, general agent of the company, who on March 13, 1908, wrote him as follows:

"We are just in receipt of a letter from State Agent Perry with which he enclosed your letter to him under date of March 3d relative to the writing of insurance upon fine horses, and in compliance with his request we advise you of our wishes in this matter, we beg to say that for a good many years we have declined to insure high priced horses used either for running, trotting or breeding purposes. So far as racing horses are concerned, there is altogether too much moral hazard connected with them to warrant us in insuring them, and as to horses used for breeding purposes, they are so often vicious and unmanageable as to become an extremely hazardous class of property to insure. In either case, the rate of insurance is inadequate, for the hazard is fully equal to that of a livery stable, and we would be unwilling to insure the class at less than 3% while located in the owner's own barn, or if they go from place to place and our insurance follows and covers them, we should want at least double that rate. For these reasons we would much prefer to be excused from insuring fine horses. We very much regret our inability to accommodate you but trust that we may be able to do so in other directions to our mutual advantage."

On March 22, 1910, Baer issued a policy of fire insurance on a stallion and jack for $300 each, describing them as one horse and one mule, and making the policy effective anywhere. W. W. Potter, employee of the defendant, made out the daily report of the policy as follows:

"4. On contents of said stable, the sum of $600.00 Dollars. Divided as follows, to wit:
300.00 on one Horse
$. . . on Live Stock of all kinds."
300.00 on one Mule."

[780] The policy provided that "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void . . . or if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become encumbered by a chattel mortgage."

Sometime after the policy was issued, the owner of the stallion and jack gave a chattel mortgage on the animals, to a bank with which Baer was not connected. He learned of this chattel mortgage and had a conversation with the owner concerning the same. The animals insured were used for breeding purposes, and were burned in a livery barn not covered by the policy. The company compromised the claim, paid the owner $500, expended the sum of $48.84 in adjusting the policy, and sued Baer for the amounts thus paid. A demurrer to the evidence was interposed and was sustained by the court. Of this the plaintiff complains. It also complains that the court excluded evidence offered by the plaintiff. It does not appear that this evidence was produced on the motion for a new trial.

Under instructions given him, it was Baer's duty to notify the company on learning of any encumbrances on any of the property insured. He did not notify the company at any time of the chattel mortgage. The company learned of this chattel mortgage, and of all the misconduct of the agent, before the payment of the loss and expense.

1. The defendant contends that the demurrer was properly sustained, because the verified general denial put in issue the allegation of the plaintiff's incorporation. This seems not to have been specifically presented to the trial court. Technically, it was presented by the demurrer to the evidence. The case was tried as though this matter was not questioned. All parties seem to have assumed that it was not in issue. The demurrer to the evidence was sustained because, in the opinion of the trial court, the company had a defense to the policy for breach of the encumbrance clause [781] contained therein. We will not decide whether or not the verified general denial properly put in issue the incorporation of the plaintiff, because that question is for the first time presented in this court. We will treat this question, in this case, as it was treated by the trial court, and we will decide this case on the questions on which it was decided by that court. In Gorrell v. Battelle, 93 Kan. 370, 144 Pac. 244, this court said:

"Unless the record shows that the matter was specifically and unequivocally brought to the attention of the trial court while it had possession of the case and power to dispose of it as justice required, this court will regard the issue as abandoned. It would be gross abuse of procedure for a defendant to veil an oversight in making proof under a general demurrer to the evidence and a general motion for a new trial, and then appeal to this court for a new trial when the evidence is all the time lying in a public office barely outside the reach of judicial knowledge, and when the new trial, if granted, would extend to that issue alone." (p. 372.)

2. Was Baer liable for the loss sustained by the company on account of this policy? In 31 Cyc. 1451, we find this language:

"It is the duty of an agent whose authority is limited by instructions to adhere faithfully thereto, regardless of his own opinion as to their propriety or expediency, and if he exceeds, violates, or neglects such instructions he will be liable to the principal for any loss or damage resulting therefrom."

In 22 Cyc. 1437, under the article "Insurance," we read:

"The agent must respond in damages for any breach of duty arising out of his relations as agent which has resulted in injury to the company. Thus if the agent violates instructions as to the class of risks which he is to insure and thereby renders the company liable for a loss on a risk which would not have been accepted had the instructions been observed, the agent will be liable to the company for the amount of loss which it has been compelled to pay on account of such risk."

[782] In Continental Ins. Co. v. Clark, 126 Ia. 274, 100 N. W. 524, it was said:

"In an action against an insurance agent for wrongfully writing a risk at a lower rate than authorized and failing to report the same, and the evidence tended to show that the company would have cancelled the risk had it known of it, the measure of damages is the total loss sustained thereby." (Syl. ¶ 7.)

In Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Ames, 39 Minn. 150, 39 N. W. 300, a fire insurance agent was held liable for issuing a fire insurance policy contrary to instructions. In 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 509, is found a note to Queen City F. Ins. Co. v. Hannaford First Nat. Bank, 18 N. D. 603, 120 N. W. 545, on "Liability of insurance agent to company for failure to follow instructions," as follows:

"There is no doubt that an insurance agent will be liable to the company he represents for his negligent or wilful failure to obey instructions, thereby causing loss to his principal."

The evidence shows that Baer issued this insurance policy in violation of his instruction, and that in his daily report he did not properly describe the property, nor the place in which the animals were to be covered by the policy.

3. The defendant contends that the plaintiff had a valid defense against liability on this policy, and that payment on the policy was made with knowledge of those defenses. This does not excuse the defendant. Baer wrongfully issued the policy. On its face the company was liable. The agent of the company knew of that chattel mortgage. His knowledge, as against the policy holder, probably was the knowledge of the company. Having such knowledge, and permitting the policy to stand, the company was probably liable on the policy. The company, in good faith, presumably, paid this policy to avoid litigation. The improper conduct [783] of Baer first created the liability of the company, and afterwards continued that liability. His estate cannot escape by asking the company to take chances in a lawsuit.

We think the demurrer to the evidence was improperly sustained, and that the evidence should have been submitted to the jury. The judgment of the district court is reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

NOTE.

Liability of Agent to Insurance Company for Issuing Policy in Violation of Instruction.

An insurance agent may, on principles of ostensible authority, bind the company to a risk which his instructions forbid him to assume. See 14 R. C. L. tit. Insurance, p. 871. But an agent who issues a policy in violation of his instructions and thereby subjects the company to a liability which he is forbidden to assume for it, is liable to the company for the damages sustained by it. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Seegers, 192 Ala. 103, 68 So. 902; State Ins. Co. v. Jamison, 79 Ia. 245, 44 N. W. 371; Continental Ins. Co. v. Clark, 126 Ia. 274, 100 N. W. 524; Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Ames, 39 Minn. 150, 39 N. W. 300; Sun F. Office v. Ermentrout, 2 Pa. Dist. 77, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 21; Franklin F. Ins. v. Bradford, 201 Pa. St. 32, 50 Atl. 286, 88 Am. St. Rep. 770, 55 L.R.A. 408; St. Paul F. etc. Ins. Co. v. Laubenstein, 162 Wis. 165, 155 N. W. 918. And see the reported case.

The rule that the agent is liable for the entire loss to the company was applied in the case of Sun F. Office v. Ermentrout, 2 Pa. Dist. 77, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 21, wherein it was declared that the agent was liable for the full amount recovered against the company including the costs, but was not liable for counsel fees incurred in defending an action on the policy. The court said: "There is no reason apparent why the measure of plaintiff's damages in a case like this should be different from what it would be in a suit for the breach of a warranty by defendant to plaintiff, or in a suit by a surety against his principal for whose default the former has been made liable. Indeed, it is intimated in Sedgwick on Dam., 6th ed., 407, that the test as to the agent's liability for costs is the same as that obtaining between principal and surety, i. e., the reasonableness of the litigation: Ib. 389-91; Wynn v. Brooke, 5 Rawle, 106. It is, however, also said, that the effect of notice to defendant by plaintiff of the fact that he is being subjected to suit for a claim which the former ought to pay, will shift the burden of proof as to the reasonableness of the litigation; so that, whilst, where there is no such notice, plaintiff will be required to show the propriety of the litigation, in order to hold defendant for costs of the same; where there is such notice, the defendant, in order to avoid liability for costs, will himself have to prove its impropriety: Sedgwick, Dam. 352. Upon these principles, the liability of this defendant for the costs of the suit against the company upon the policy he negotiated cannot be disputed. . . .

The item of counsel fees ought not to have been included. And neither, I think, should the expenses of appeal. It was not only useless, as the result approved, but unnecessary in order to fix the liability of defendant to plaintiff. A defendant should not be punished for the erroneous advice of plaintiff's counsel, unless it be at least shown that he actively supported it and himself demanded or requested the removal of the cause to the last resort. There is no such showing here." In State Ins. Co. v. Jamison, 79 Ia. 245, 44 N. W. 371, wherein it appeared that an agent issued a fire insurance policy without reporting it to his company, contrary to his instruction, and that the risk was of such a character that it would not have been accepted by the company, the agent was held to be liable for the loss which the company was compelled to pay on the destruction of the property by fire. That case was followed in Continental Ins. Co. v. Clark, 126 Ia. 274, 100 N. W. 524, wherein the court said: "The close point in the case is the measure of damages. If merely nominal, then there should be no reversal; but if, on plaintiff's showing, compensatory damages might be allowed, then there should be a reversal, unless the damages to be awarded are simply the premium which defendants should have collected. Where the risk is not a prohibited one, the rule ordinarily is the difference between the rate received and the one that should have been collected, or, if the premium has not been paid, the full amount which should have been collected. But where the gist of the action is the failure of the agent to comply with his instructions to report the risk, and the evidence is sufficient to show that the principal would have canceled the policy, had it known thereof, then the true measure of recovery is the loss suffered by the principal. This is the holding in State Ins. Co. v. Jamison, supra; and with that we are content." In Globe, etc. F. Ins. Co. v. Wetmore, 49 Nova Scotia, 55, 23 Dominion L. Rep. 33, wherein it appeared that a fire insurance agent issued a policy on a risk at a lower rate than was authorized and a loss followed, the company it was held could recover not merely the difference in premiums but the amount which the insurance company was obliged to pay on the policy.

But in State Ins. Co. v. Richmond, 71 Ia. 519, 32 N. W. 496, wherein it appeared that an insurance agent issued a fire insurance policy on an unoccupied hotel concealing the fact of unoccupancy from the company, contrary to instructions, but received a higher rate of premium than was usual for unoccupied hotel buildings, it was held that the insurance company, having been obliged to meet the policy, could not recover substantial damages. The court said: "The legal question presented is as to whether an insurance company can recover damages of its agents through whose fault, while acting in good faith, it is drawn into a contract of insurance somewhat different from what it supposed it to be, but not less valuable to it. In answer, we have to say that we do not think it entitled to recover substantial damages."

In Winne v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 91 N. Y. 185, wherein it appeared that the directions to the agent were capable of two interpretations, it was held that the company could not recover from the agent for the loss sustained on a policy which under the most liberal interpretation of his instruction he was authorized to issue.

In Security Ins. Co. v. Jaggars, 120 Ark. 472, 179 S. W. 1008, wherein it appeared that a local agent executed to the general agent a bond which did not specifically mention that the local agent was liable for losses incurred by insuring prohibited risks, it was held that no such liability existed. The court said: "Under the terms and conditions of the bond Jaggars, as principal, was bound to keep a true and correct account of all moneys received by him for the insurance company and to pay same over, to make a report of the business transacted and in every way faithfully perform the duties as agent in compliance with the instructions of the general agent, through his proper representatives and at the end of the agency deliver up to the said general agent, or his representatives, all money, policies, books, and property due from him or in his possession, and it is further provided that if he should do so, and reimburse said general agent for all extra expense occasioned by any delinquency or failure to comply with the foregoing conditions, the obligations should be void. It does not appear to contemplate that the agent should be bound to the payment of losses occurring on policies issued on prohibited risks by him and does not in the opinion of the court bind him to any such payment."

STATE PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION EX REL. MACON COUNTY TELEPHONE COMPANY.

BETHANY MUTUAL TELEPHONE ASSOCIATION.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 27, 1915.

270 Ill. 183; 110 N. E. 334.

Public Service Commission — Jurisdiction — What Is Public Utility — Mutual Telephone Company.

Where a mutual telephone association has no authority under its charter to engage in public telephone service, or to devote its property to public use, but is organized for the private use of its members only, and not for profit, an order of the public utilities commission, requiring the association to cease operations for failure to obtain a certificate of convenience and necessity, as required by Laws 1913, p. 488, § 55, is void, since the jurisdiction of the commission is confined, by the terms of the act creating it, to the control and supervision of owners and operators of property devoted to a public use.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The object of the act creating the public utilities commission is to bring under the public control for the common good property applied to a public use, in which the public has an interest, and the owner of such property must submit to such control to the extent of the public interest so long as the public use is maintained.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

While it is not essential to a public use that its benefits should be received by the whole public, or within a large part of it, they must not be confined to specified privileged persons, but must be extended to all persons in common upon the same terms, it being immaterial how few avail themselves of the rights so extended.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The words "public use" mean of or belonging to the people at large, open to all the people to the extent that its capacity may admit of the public use.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

"Public utility," aside from its statutory definition, implies a public use, carrying with it the duty to serve the public and treat all persons alike without discrimination, and it precludes the idea of service which is private in its nature, whether for the benefit and advantage of a few or of many.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Whether a corporation is public or private is not to be decided from the number of persons engaged in the enterprise for their mutual advantage, but from the terms of its charter and the general law under which it is organized.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The fact that a mutual telephone association had obtained a license from the village to construct and maintain its telephone poles and wires in the streets, under which it is about to erect great quantities of poles and wires, does not fix its character as a corporation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The diversion of streets and alleys from their legitimate use by constructing a telephone system thereon would not give the public utilities commission jurisdiction over the association.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sangamon county: CREIGHTON, Judge.

Proceeding by State Public Utilities Commission on the relation of Macon County Telephone Company, plaintiff, against Bethany Mutual Telephone Association, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Whitley & Fitzgerald and J. L. McLaughlin for appellant.

Everett Jennings, Timothy F. Mullen, George M. Morgan, W. E. Redmon and Ben B. Boynton for appellee.

[184] CARTWRIGHT, J.—On the petition of the Macon County Telephone Company, a corporation operating a telephone system in the village of Bethany and vicinity, in Macon county, the State Public Utilities Commission ordered appellant, the Bethany Mutual Telephone Association, forthwith to cease from constructing or maintaining its telephone system in the same locality because it had not obtained from the commission a certificate of convenience and necessity provided for by section 55 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the regulation of public utilities." (Laws of 1913, p. 460.) The appellant feeling aggrieved by the order, took the record to the circuit court of Sangamon county by appeal, and the court entered a judgment finding that the commission had jurisdiction in the case and that the order was neither unlawful nor unreasonable, and affirming it. From the judgment of the court this appeal was prosecuted.

The appellant, by its answer to the petition, alleged that it was not a public telephone company and did not propose [185] to engage in the telephone business or construct its system for the public use, and it denied the jurisdiction of the commission over it. The act creating the commission, defining its powers and giving it general supervision of public utilities, provides that the term "public utility" includes every corporation, company or association, joint stock company or association, firm, partnership or individual, that may own, control, operate or manage, directly or indirectly, for public use, any plant, equipment or property used or to be used for or in connection with the transmission of telephone messages between points within this State. The jurisdiction of the commission is by the terms of the act confined to control and supervision of owners and operators of property devoted to a public use. The purpose of the act is to bring under control by the public, for the common good, property applied to a public use in which the public has an interest. The owner of such property must submit to be controlled by the public to the extent of its interest as long as such public use is maintained. (Munn v. People, 94 U. S. 113, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 77; People v. Western Union Tel. Co. 166 Ill. 15, 46 N. E. 731, 36 L.R.A. 637; Inter-Ocean Pub. Co. v. Associated Press, 184 Ill. 438, 56 N. E. 822, 75 Am. St. Rep. 184, 48 L.R.A. 568.) To constitute a public use all persons must have an equal right to the use, and it must be in common, upon the same terms, however few the number who avail themselves of it. It is not essential to a public use that its benefits should be received by the whole public or even a large part of it, but they must not be confined to specified, privileged persons. (People v. Ricketts, 248 Ill. 428, 94 N. E. 71.) The words "public use" mean of or belonging to the people at large, open to all the people to the extent that its capacity may admit of the public use. (State Public Utilities Commission v. Monarch Refrigerating Co. 267 Ill. 528, Ann. Cas. 1916A 528, 108 N. E. 716.) The use must concern the public as distinguished from an individual or any particular number of individuals, but the use and enjoyment of the utility need not extend to the whole public or any political subdivision. It may be [186] confined to a particular district and still be public. (State Public Utilities Commission v. Noble Mut. Telephone Co. 268 Ill. 411, Ann. Cas. 1916D 897, 109 N. E. 298.) The appellant, under its charter, has no authority to engage in the public service or to devote its property to the public use. Aside from the statutory definition, the term "public utility" implies a public use, carrying with it the duty to serve the public and treat all persons alike, without discrimination, and it precludes the idea of service which is private in its nature, whether for the benefit and advantage of a few or of many. The question of the nature of a corporation cannot depend upon the number of persons engaged in the enterprise for their mutual benefit, but the nature of a corporation and the purpose for which it is organized must be ascertained by reference to the terms of its charter, and in the case of a corporation organized under a general law such nature and purpose are defined by that law. There is nothing in the act providing for the organization of corporations which limits its privileges to those which propose to devote their property to a public use, and the commission has no authority over any others. (Distilling, etc. Feeding Co. v. People, 161 Ill. 101, 43 N. E. 779; Evanston Electric Illuminating Co. v. Kochersperger, 175 Ill. 26, 51 N. E. 719; Bradley Mfg. Co. v. Chicago, etc. Traction Co. 229 Ill. 170, 82 N. E. 210; Buncombe Metallic Telephone Co. v. McGinnis, 268 Ill. 504, 109 N. E. 257.) A corporation may be organized under the general Corporation act for any lawful purpose except those specified in the statute, and the act of 1883 (Laws of 1883, p. 183), declares it to be lawful to construct, operate and maintain private telephone lines from house to house, and grants the right, as against the public, to set the poles for such lines in the public streets, highways or alleys. The purpose for which appellant, the Bethany Mutual Telephone Association, was incorporated, as stated in its application for incorporation and in the certificate of incorporation issued by the Secretary of State, was "to be for the private use of the [187] members of said association only, for the purposes of telephonic communication between them, for their private and community interests and not for the pecuniary profit of any person or persons connected with said association, and not for the profit of any stockholder interested as owner of any interest in said corporation." By the charter the use of the telephone system is limited strictly and solely to the members of the corporation, and it has no authority, under its charter, to erect or maintain any telephone line for the service of the public. It can only exercise such powers as are within the scope of its charter, and none others. The telephone company was held in State Public Utilities Commission v. Noble Mut. Telephone Co. supra, to operate a public utility because its lines connected with country lines and other exchanges in Richland and surrounding counties, and it obtained and enjoyed a license conditioned that no person should be barred from membership and use of its lines. In Buncombe Metallic Telephone Co. v. McGinnis, 268 Ill. 504, 109 N. E. 257, the corporation had a control station connecting with various county lines and with the local village system and long distance lines, and the object stated in the application for incorporation was for "telephone purposes to legally establish our right on public and private property with poles, wires and necessary equipment," which denoted an unlimited and public use.

It is argued that the appellant's property is used or to be used for a public use because the appellant has obtained a license from the village of Bethany to construct, maintain and operate telephone poles, wires and fixtures in the streets of the village and has purchased a great quantity of poles which it intends to erect on the public highways and to string wires on them. These matters neither concern the petitioner nor the State Public Utilities Commission and do not fix the character of the corporation. If poles or wires should be placed on streets and highways it would no more tend to prove that the use is public than the fact of [188] farmers driving upon the public highways with their own products would tend to prove they are common carriers. If constructing a telephone system in streets or highways for private use is a diversion of the streets or highways from their legitimate use, the commission would not thereby acquire jurisdiction over the appellant.

The commission had no jurisdiction to make any order concerning the appellant, and the judgment of the circuit court affirming the order of the commission is reversed. Judgment reversed.

Rehearing denied December 10, 1915.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a mutual telephone company whose privileges are limited strictly to members of the company is not a "public utility" subject to regulation by a public service commission. In so holding the court distinguishes the case of State Public Utilities Commission v. Noble Mut. Telephone Co. 268 Ill. 411, wherein the opposite conclusion was reached as to a mutual telephone company connecting with other lines and whose service was open to the public generally. Whether a corporation not operated for profit is a public utility was considered in the note to State Public Utilities Commission v. Mutual Telephone Co. supra, as reported in Ann. Cas. 1916D 897.

GREAT SOUTHERN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

BURNS ET AL.

Arkansas Supreme Court—March 29, 1915.

118 Ark. 22; 175 S. W. 1161.

Insurance — Waiver of Conditions — Failure to Make Inquiry.

Where a fire policy is issued by an insurance company without written application, the company must be held to have waived the condition of the policy, providing that if the property be, or shall become, encumbered by a chattel mortgage, the policy shall be void, for while effect should be given to the contract, the insured has practically no voice in framing it, and to permit the company to obtain the premiums where the insured was in ignorance of the stipulation would work a fraud.

[See note at end of this case.]

Penalty for Failure to Pay Insurance — Right to Recover.

Insured and insurer agreed upon the amount of a fire loss. Thereafter the insurer denied liability on the ground that the property was encumbered at the time the policy was written. The original complaint prayed recovery for the amounts named in the face of the policies, but the insured shortly amended, praying recovery for the amounts agreed upon. It is held that, as the insurer contested all liability, the insured could recover the attorney's fees and penalties provided by Acts 1905, p. 307.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Craighead county: GAUTNEY, Judge.

Action by J. L. Burns et al., doing business as Burns & Billington, plaintiffs, against Great Southern Fire Insurance Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Allen Hughes and W. W. Hughes for appellant.

Hawthorne & Hawthorne, N. F. Lamb and Archer Wheatley for appellee.

[25] HART, J.—J. L. Burns and M. F. Billington, partners, as Burns & Billington, instituted this action against the Great Southern Fire Insurance Company to recover on two policies of fire insurance. The policies covered certain rice belonging to the insured, and no question is raised as to the amount recovered. At the time the contract of insurance was made, there was a chattel mortgage on the rice which was executed by Billington. Doctor Burns procured the policies of insurance sued upon. An application was made to Freeze & Cole, insurance agents, who occupied offices in the same building adjoining those of the insured. The policies were issued upon the oral application of Doctor Burns, and no inquiry was made by the insurance agents as to the condition of the title of the property, or as to whether or not there was any mortgage upon it. The insurance agents selected the company in which the insurance was to be written, and kept the policies in their safe until after the fire occurred. The insured paid the premiums at the time the policies were issued, and it was only when they were making out the proof of loss that the insurance company ascertained that there was a chattel mortgage on the property insured, and upon that ground they refused payment. The policies were in the standard form and contained a provision that they were made and accepted subject to conditions and stipulations printed on the back thereof. Among the provisions printed on the back is the following:

"This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement endorsed hereon, or added hereto, shall be void, . . . if the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become encumbered by chattel mortgage."

It is admitted that Doctor Burns knew there was a chattel mortgage on the rice at the time he applied for the insurance, and that he did not make any disclosures concerning it because he was not asked about it, and did not know that it was material to the risk. He never read [26] the policies after they were issued, and neither he nor his partner knew that the policies contained the clause above quoted until after the loss had occurred.

Defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor. This the court declined to do, and, over the objections of the defendants, instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. From the judgment rendered, the defendant has duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

Counsel for the defendant contends that the plaintiffs by accepting the policies of fire insurance containing the clause providing that they "shall be void if the property is or becomes encumbered by a chattel mortgage," are charged with notice of the condition, and are bound thereby; on the other hand it is contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that where a policy is issued by an insurance company without a written application, the company must be held to have waived the condition of the policy as to encumbrances by chattel mortgages.

The precise issue raised by the appeal has never been decided by this court. In the case of Rhea v. Planters' Mut. Ins. Assoc. 77 Ark.

57, 90 S. W. 850, and that of the Home F. Ins. Co. v. Driver, 87 Ark. 171, 112 S. W. 200, and other cases, this court has held that where there is a warranty against encumbrances, the insurer is protected by a condition against encumbrances inserted in the policy.

So, too, in the case of German-American Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, 62 Ark. 348, 35 S. W. 428, 54 Am. St. Rep. 297, the court held that where a policy of fire insurance provides that it shall be void if the property insured afterward becomes encumbered by a mortgage, the giving of a mortgage on the property renders the policy void. In that case, however, the court said that there is a marked difference between a waiver of conditions made before and those made after the issuance of the policies.

In the case of Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Public Parks Amusement Co. 63 Ark. 187, 37 S. W. 959, the court held that a condition against encumbrances is waived by the acts of the agents of the insurer who, having authority to waive conditions, [27] and knowing that the property was encumbered, attached to the policy permits for additional concurrent insurance upon which additional policies were issued.

The decisions of the courts of last resort of the various States are in irreconcilable conflict upon the question of whether, under the circumstances detailed above, the policy was invalid from the beginning because of the anti-mortgage clause. It is insisted by counsel for the defendant that the policies sued on were the standard form now in common use, and that the insured was required to disclose the nature and extent of his interest in the property because this was a matter which would largely influence the insurance company in taking or rejecting the risk and estimating the premium; that the clause in question was inserted in the policies by the insurance company, and that the insured was bound by the terms of the policies when they accepted them; that under the facts disclosed by the record, there could be no waiver of the conditions of the policies; and that the conditions inserted in the policies were just as binding on the insured as would have been conditions inserted in any other contract.

A leading case sustaining their contention is that of Parsons v. Lane, 97 Minn. 98, 7 Ann. Cas. 1144, 106 N. W. 485, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 231. In that case the court cites and discusses many of the cases on both sides of the question.

Glens Falls Ins. Co. v. Michael, 167 Ind. 659, 74 N. E. 964, 79 N. E. 905, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 708, is a leading case sustaining the position assumed by the plaintiffs, that where the insurer issues a policy upon an oral application without making any inquiries as to the nature of the title of the property, it will be presumed to have written the policy on its own knowledge, and, hence, to have waived the condition which would have invalidated the policy.

We have carefully examined several of the leading cases on both sides of the question, and, it being a new one in this State, we are at liberty to decide it in accordance with what we think to be the better rule, and that [28] which we deem to be the more reasonable and more in accord with a spirit of fairness and justice.

It is true, as contended, that the policies were in the standard form, but the condition upon which the policy is now sought to be invalidated was not in the body of the policy, but was printed upon the back thereof. It is also true that a contract of insurance, like any other contract, should be given force and effect according to its terms; but it is equally well settled that provisions in the printed forms inserted by the insurance company for its own benefit may be waived. Forms for insurance policies are usually prepared by the insurance companies for general use and without reference to particular cases. The insured has little voice in framing the terms of his insurance, and none whatever in preparing the form of the policy issued. He must accept the policy as it is prepared and tendered to him by the insurance company.

As a rule, the insured has no knowledge of the necessity of disclosures which long experience has taught insurance companies are necessary for their protection, or of what disclosures are important or material. In ordinary contracts of importance, the terms are agreed upon after careful consideration and discussion by the contracting parties and contracts are usually prepared in duplicate and carefully examined by the parties before they are signed.

As we have already seen, insurance contracts are prepared by the insurance company, and the terms used are the result of long experience on their part of things necessary to guard their interests. It is not the custom of fire insurance companies to place the policy to be issued by it before the person whose property is to be insured prior to its delivery to him. He has no opportunity to examine the many printed conditions and stipulations contained on the back of the policy until he has paid the premium for the insurance and the policy has been delivered to him. Under such circumstances, it ought not to be said that he was bound by the conditions and stipulations [29] in the policy declaring that the policy should be void if there was any encumbrance against the property where he had no knowledge of such condition, and was not aware that the giving of a mortgage on the property insured in any way affected the risk.

(1) In this case, the anti-mortgage clause was not in the body of the policy, but was in the printed conditions on the back of the policy along with numerous other conditions and stipulations concerning which no inquiry was made by the agents of the insurance company. The policies sued on were issued upon an oral application, and the agents of the insurance company made no inquiries of the plaintiffs concerning liens or encumbrances on the property. No stipulations or statements in reference thereto were made by the assured, and they had no knowledge that such information was material, or that the policies subsequently issued would contain any provision in reference thereto.

They were not aware that if the insurance company knew that any mortgage had been given on the property, it would decline the risk. They paid, and the agents of the insurance company received the premium, and the property was destroyed by fire during the life of the policies, and before the plaintiffs had any notice whatever of the anti-mortgage clause in the policy or that such condition would invalidate the policy if there was a mortgage on the property when the policy was issued. The agents who issued the policies had authority to waive conditions in the policy.

No question is raised, but that the loss was an honest one, and none but that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount for which judgment was given if the defendant was liable. Under such circumstances, to urge the conclusion that the anti-mortgage clause avoided the policies would be to impute to the insurance company a fraud intended to deceive the assured by issuing policies not binding as contracts of insurance, although it received [30] and accepted therefor the premiums, knowing that the assured believed the contracts to be valid.

The defendant asked for a directed verdict, and no other instructions were asked by it. The effect of a directed verdict would have been to hold that the contract of insurance was void from the beginning, and that the policies never in fact had any force or validity because of the anti-mortgage provisions inserted therein by the insurance company without the knowledge of the insured. If that view should be adopted, the insurance company would not only have wrongfully received and accepted the premium from the assured, but would have also misled them into the belief that their property was insured when in fact it was not. So, we think the court was justified, under the circumstances, in finding that the insurance company had waived the anti-mortgage provision in the policies. Allesina v. London, etc. Ins. Co. 45 Ore. 441, 2 Ann. Cas. 284, 78 Pac. 392; Farmers, etc. Ins. Co. v. Mickel, 72 Neb. 123, 9

Ann. Cas. 993, 100 N. W. 130; Humble v. German Alliance Ins. Co. 85 Kan. 140, 116 Pac. 472, Ann. Cas. 1912D 630; Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Monroe, 101 Ky. 12, 39 S. W. 434; Dooly v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 16 Wash. 155, 47 Pac. 507, 58 Am. St. Rep. 26; Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Bohn, 48 Neb. 743, 67 N. W. 774, 58 Am. St. Rep. 719; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Holmes, 75 Miss. 390, 23 So. 183, 65 Am. St. Rep. 611; 3 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 2630, 2631.

The complaint in this case, as originally filed, asked for the amounts named in the face of the policies, $2,000 on one, and $2,500 on the other. After the fire, plaintiffs had a conference with the adjuster of the insurance company, and arrived at the amount of the losses which was agreed upon at $1,517.04 upon one policy and $1,896.30 on the other. After this had been agreed upon, the agents of the insurance company found out that a mortgage existed on the property at the time the policies were issued, and on this account refused payment. As soon as plaintiffs discovered the mistake in their original complaint, [31] they filed an amendment thereto in which they asked judgment for the amount which had been agreed upon between them and the agents of the insurance company. They recovered judgment for this amount.

(2) Under this state of facts, it is insisted by counsel for the insurance company that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the attorney's fees and penalty provided for under the Acts of 1905, but we do not agree with them in this contention. Soon after the original complaint was filed, it was amended and judgment was asked for the amount which had been agreed upon between the plaintiff and the adjuster of the insurance company as the amount of loss sustained by reason of the fire. Judgment was recovered against the insurance company for this amount. If the insurance company had desired to avoid the penalty and attorneys' fee provided for by the statute, it should have offered to confess judgment for the amount sued for in the amended complaint. It did not do so; on the other hand, it denied all liability under the policy. The plaintiffs having recovered the amount sued for in the amended complaint, the court properly allowed the attorney's fee and penalty provided for by the statute. Queen of Arkansas Ins. Co. v. Milham, 102 Ark. 675, 145 S. W. 540; Queen of Arkansas Ins. Co. v. Bramlett, 103 Ark. 1, 145 S. W. 541.

The judgment will be affirmed.

NOTE.

Waiver of Conditions in Insurance Policy by Insurer's Failure to Inquire into Existing Facts.

The reported case conforms to the rule laid down in Farmers', etc. Ins. Co. v. Mickel, 72

Neb. 123, 9 Ann. Cas. 992, that the failure of an insurance company to inquire as to the existence of facts, which by the terms of its policy avoid the insurance, estops the company to object after the issuance of the policy to the applicant's inability to comply with the condition or conditions of the policy in the particulars as to which no inquiry is made, and precludes the insurance company from an avoidance of the policy on the ground of a violation of the conditions thereof in that respect. To the same effect see the following recent cases: Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Colorado Leasing, etc. Co. 50 Colo. 424, Ann. Cas. 1912C 597, 116 Pac. 154; Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. O'Keefe, 133 Ga. 792, 66 S. E. 1093; Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Swaney, 53 Ind. App. 429, 101 N. E. 843; Independent L. Ins. Co. v. Rider, 150 Ky. 505, 150 S. W. 649, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 560; Commonwealth L. Ins. Co. v. Rider, 153 Ky. 130, 154 S. W. 906; Hause v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co. 172 Mich. 59, 137 N. W. 694; Roloff v. Farmers' Home Mut. Ins. Co. 130 Wis. 402, 110 N. W. 261. But compare North British, etc. Ins. Co. v. Wright (Okla.) 154 Pac. 654. Thus in Commonwealth L. Ins. Co. v. Rider, 153 Ky. 130, 154 S. W. 906, it appeared that an insurance company, issuing a policy of life insurance containing a clause barring applicants with consumption or kidney disease, accepted an applicant with both of those diseases without medical examination or without inquiry of the applicant with respect thereto, and accepted the premiums under the policy until the death of the insured. It was held that the insurance company could not avoid payment of the policy. The court said: "It is not alleged by appellant that it made any inquiry of insured as to the condition of his health, or that he made in respect thereto any statement or representation, false or otherwise, upon which it relied in issuing the policies. Therefore, the facts alleged in the answer do not show fraud on the part of the insured in procuring the policies. The effect of appellant's contention is that although it issued to the insured the policies without a medical examination or inquiry as to the condition of his health, and, as long as he lived, accepted of him the premiums as they fell due, the question of its liability upon the policies is by the provision in question, to be determined after the insured's death by then ascertaining whether the conditions, the provision declares shall relieve it of liability, existed when the policies were issued. In view of the fact that appellant had every means of ascertaining when the policies were issued whether the insured was then afflicted with the diseases mentioned in the provision referred to, such an interpretation of the contract will not be allowed, for to give it that meaning would be against public policy. In other words, as said in the opinion of the circuit court: 'If the company can write on the back of its policy without inquiry a condition that it shall be void if the insured before its delivery has had consumption or disease of the kidneys, then it can write any and all of the multitude of diseases, family history, etc., ordinarily found in insurance applications, and this without inquiry at the time of the issue of the policy, or as a condition to its issue, and then after the death of the insured, enter upon an investigation which could be made while the insured is alive, and if it can find in that great catalog of diseases, one which would affect the risk, procure through the courts, relief from its obligation.' In Humble v. German Alliance Ins. Co. 85 Kan. 140, Ann. Cas. 1912D 630, 116 Pac. 472, wherein the facts were substantially the same as in the reported case, the court said: "That there was an existing incumbrance on the property when the policy in suit was issued was denied by appellee and appears to have been a disputed question of fact at the trial. In the absence of the evidence it may be assumed that the court ruled that the findings of the referee on this point were not sustained by the evidence. It was claimed that the contract between the insured and the coal company, in connection with which a mortgage was given, had been abrogated and that a mortgage under the new agreement had not been executed. Aside from that there is an allegation and contention by appellee that the application for the insurance in question was oral, that no questions were asked the insured as to incumbrances or additional insurance and that no representations as to these things were made by the insured or by anyone for him. If this be true, and there was no fraudulent concealment of the fact, the existence of a mortgage on the property would not necessarily invalidate the policy. It has been said: 'The issuing of a policy on an application which without fraud contains no answer to certain questions is a waiver of answer to those questions, even though in answer to another question the insured may have said there were "no other circumstances affecting the risk;" and to avoid the policy in such cases the insurers must prove untrue statements other than those inquired about.' (1 May, Ins. 4th ed. § 166.) Volume 1 of the second edition of Wood on Fire Insurance states the rule as follows: 'When no inquiries are made, the intention of the assured becomes material, and in order to avoid the policy, they must find, not only that the matter was material, but also that it was intentionally fraudulently concealed.'"

Likewise the failure of an insurance company to insist on a responsive answer to an inquiry, and its willingness to accept an evasion of a question, has been held to bar it from claiming a right to avoid the policy because of the insured's inability to conform to a condition in the policy relating to the matter as to which no sufficient answer is required. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Beck, 84 Ark. 57, 104 S. W. 533, rehearing denied 84 Ark. 59, 104 S. W. 1102; Buffalo Forge Co. v. Mutual Security Co. 83 Conn. 393, 76 Atl. 995; Allen v. Phoenix Assur. Co. 14 Idaho 728, 95 Pac. 829; Peterson v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. 244 Ill. 329, 18 Ann. Cas. 96, 91 N. E. 466, reversing 115 Ill. App. 421; Sterling L. Ins. Co. v. Rapps, 130 Ill. App. 121; Enright v. National Council, etc. 161 Ill. App. 365; Van Wormer v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 188 Ill. App. 166; O'Connor v. Modern Woodmen of America, 110 Minn. 18, 124 N. W. 454, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1244; L. Black Co. v. London Guarantee, etc. Co. 159 App. Div. 186, 144 N. Y. S. 424; French v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 135 Wis. 259, 115 N. W. 869, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011. Thus in Peterson v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "But the company did not elect to require an answer to the question. On the contrary, it issued the policy with that evasion appearing in the medical examination. If the answer was good enough when the company desired to collect premiums from the applicant, it ought to be good enough when the company is called upon to pay. By issuing the policy the company waived any answer to this question. Hall v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 6 Gray (Mass.) 185." And in L. Black Co. v. London Guarantee, etc. Co. 159 App. Div. 186, 144 N. Y. S. 424, the court stated the rule as follows: "The law applicable to such a situation is well stated in Richards on Insurance Law (3d ed. § 113): 'Questions unanswered or partially answered. If a question in the application is not answered at all, or if the answer is not false in any respect, but upon its face is only incomplete, there is no breach of warranty, provided the insurer accepts the application without objection; since, if not satisfied, the company should demand fuller information. So also to avoid forfeiture, equivocal answers are construed most strongly against the company, but notwithstanding this, the applicant must answer in good faith and not attempt to evade, conceal or mislead.'"

MASTELLAR ET AL.

ATKINSON ET AL.

Kansas Supreme Court—February 6, 1915.

*94 Kan. 279; 146 Pac. 367.Wills — Construction — "Desire."

In the will of one who died and left surviving him a wife, one son and six daughters, he devised a life estate to his wife and added that after her death "I will and desire that the said property shall revert to my beloved son Artie Atkinson provided that in such event he shall pay to each of his sisters, Annie Hendrickson, Nancy Hooks, Ida Mastellar, Sarah Jackson, Lydia Wilson and Daisy Teach, the sum of two hundred dollars (\$200.00). Said two hundred dollars to be paid in yearly payments of sixty-six and two-thirds dollars (\$66 $\frac{2}{3}$) to each sister as above enumerated. The first payment to be made on the first day of September, following the first day of April after the death of my wife, Ellen Atkinson." In a proceeding to determine the ownership of the property and to partition the same it is held that the fee of the land vested in the son upon the death of the testator but that the enjoyment of possession is postponed until the life estate is terminated, and that the son takes the fee charged with the payment of the legacies given to the daughters of the testator, and that any one who succeeds to the estate and interest of the son prior to the completion of the payments takes the land subject to such charges.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

As used in a will expressing a will and desire to make certain disposition of property, the word "will" is mandatory, comprehensive, and dispositive in nature, and is broad enough to dispose of both real and personal property, and is as effective as the expression "devise and bequeath," and the word "desire," though frequently used as a precatory term, must be construed, in view of its use in connection with the word "will," as mandatory rather than as advisory, where it is evident that testator undertook to dispose of his entire estate.

Construction of "Revert" in Will.

In a loose way the term "revert to" is sometimes used in a will as the equivalent of "go to," and, where the language of a will so indicates, it will be construed as used to designate the person to whom the testator wished the land to be given.

Appeal from District Court, Lincoln county: GROVER, Judge.

Action by Ida Mastellar et al., plaintiffs, against Sarah Atkinson et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

S. N. Hawkes and W. W. McCanles for appellants.

John J. McCurdy and Z. C. Millikin for appellees.

[280] JOHNSTON, C. J.—This action involves the interpretation of a will and the ownership and partition of a quarter section of land described in the will. George Atkinson, who owned the land, died in 1904, and left surviving him his widow, one son and six daughters. In the will which he made he devised a life estate to his widow, and further provided that after her death:

"I will and desire that the said property shall revert to my beloved son Artie Atkinson, provided that in such event he shall pay to each of his sisters, Annie Hendrickson, Nancy Hooks, Ida Mastellar, Sarah Jackson, Lydia Wilson and Daisy Teach, the sum of two hundred dollars (\$200.00). Said two hundred dollars to be paid in yearly payments of sixty-six and two thirds dollars (\$66 $\frac{2}{3}$) to each sister as above enumerated. The first payment to be made on the first day of September, following the first day of April after the death of my wife, Ellen Atkinson."

Artie Atkinson, the son of the testator, died in 1912, and left surviving him Sarah Atkinson, his wife, and [281] two children. This action was brought by the daughters of the testator against the heirs of Artie Atkinson to recover the land and partition the same among the plaintiffs. The defendants answered claiming to be the owners of the land subject to the life estate devised to the widow of the testator and to the payment of certain sums of money which the will directed should be paid to the plaintiffs. A reply to the answer was filed, which was subsequently withdrawn and a demurrer to the answer filed. The demurrer was overruled and, the plaintiffs failing to plead further, a trial was had which resulted in a finding in favor of the defendants and a judgment that the plaintiffs had no interest or title in the land.

The purpose of the testator is reasonably manifest. Evidently he undertook to make a complete disposition of his entire estate. A life estate in his land was given to his wife, and then he proceeded to make a disposition of the fee. While some unusual words were employed by the scrivener, who was evidently without legal training, it is reasonably clear that it was the intention of the testator to give the fee to his son, Artie, charged with the payment of the legacies given to the daughters of the testator. (Donohue v. Donohue, 54 Kan. 136, 37 Pac. 998.) Nothing in the will indicates a purpose to give the fee of the land to either the widow or the daughters, nor that the daughters should have more than the sums of money which the son was directed to pay to them. All the inferences derivable from the language in the will proceed on the theory that the entire estate is given to the members of the testator's family, and under such circumstances the presumption is that he intended to dispose of his entire estate and not to die intestate as to any of his property. (Singer v. Taylor, 90 Kan. 285, 133 Pac. 841; Twist v. Twist, 91 Kan. 803, 139 Pac. 377.) In giving the land to his son the testator used the expression, "I will and desire that the said property shall revert to [282] my beloved son," while in the earlier provision the words, "give, devise and bequeath," were employed. The word "will" is mandatory, comprehensive and dispositive in its nature, is broad enough to dispose of both real and personal property, and is as effective as the expression, "devise and bequeath." The word "desire," although frequently used as a precatory term, is sometimes used as a direction or command. (Harrison v. Langfitt, 158 Ia. 479, 139 N. W. 1076; Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 103; Wood v. Camden Safe Deposit, etc. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 460, 14 Atl. 885; Philadelphia's Appeal, 112 Pa. St. 470, 4 Atl. 4; Oyster v. Knull, 137 Pa. St. 448, 20 Atl. 624, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890; McMurry v. Stanley, 69 Tex. 227, 6 S. W. 412; Collins v. Williams, 98 Tenn. 525, 41 S. W. 1056.) Used here in connection with the word "will," and where it is evident that the testator had undertaken to dispose of his entire estate, the word must be taken as mandatory rather than as advisory.

The word "revert" was evidently not used in its technical sense. It was not employed to express the idea that the property should be turned back to the son, as it had never been owned or held by him. In a loose way the term "revert to" is sometimes used as the equivalent of "go to," and the language of the will, taken together, indicates that the term was used to designate the person to whom the testator wished the land to be given. It has been so interpreted in a number of cases by other courts. (Johnson v. Askey, 190 Ill. 58, 60 N. E. 76; In re Bennett, 134 Cal. 320, 66 Pac. 370; Bates v. Dewson, 128 Mass. 334.)

It is contended that the use of the phrase "provided that in such event" indicates that the testator was not making a mandatory provision. The proviso does not imply a doubt that the son might not accept the land with the condition attached, nor that the testator had in mind a contingency that the fee would not vest at his death. The term as used in the will means [283] no more than that, having given the land to the son, he had required the payment of specific sums to his daughters and charged the estate devised with such payments. If it be necessary to show an acceptance of the devise by the son it is supplied by an averment in the answer to the effect that the son took and received a vested remainder in fee in the land, and is now the owner thereof, and on the trial the court found these averments in the answer to be true. The title to the land vested in the son at the death of the testator, and the rights of the daughters to the legacies also vested at the same time, to be paid by the son in accordance with the directions in the will. The son was not entitled to the possession of the land until the widow died and the life estate had ended, and no part of the legacies were to be paid until the first day of September following the first day of April after the death of the widow. These provisions, however, did not postpone the vesting of the title in the son, and as the will does not provide a limitation over in case of nonpayment, the legacies required to be paid by the son became fixed charges upon the land devised to him. Any one who succeeds to the interest of the son prior to the making of the payments takes the land, of course, subject to these charges.

There is complaint of the ruling of the court which refused leave to plaintiff to file an amended reply. The application was not made until some time after the case had been submitted and the judgment had been rendered. No sufficient grounds for opening the case at that time were stated, and in any case it must have been held that the refusal was not an abuse of discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONSTRUED AS ADVISORY TERM.

"Desire" Used Alone.

The courts are frequently called on to place a construction on the word "desire" as used in a will whereby a testator makes a devise or bequest of his property and then expresses his "desire" to the immediate devisee or legatee that the property shall be subsequently used or applied in a specified way. Under such circumstances the question arises whether by the word "desire" as used by the testator the conduct of the person to whom it is addressed is meant to be governed absolutely, in which case the word "desire" is a mandatory term, or whether it is merely an indication to the person of the testator's wish but allowing an exercise of discretion, under which circumstances the word "desire" is an advisory term. It being the cardinal rule in the construction of wills that the testator's intention must control and this being largely dependent on the surrounding circumstances of each particular case no rule can be stated as to when the word "desire" is a mandatory term and when it is an advisory term. But it may be said that in arriving at the testator's intention from the word itself the tendency seems to be to look on it as an advisory term, this view being taken on the ground that the testator would have used a stronger and more emphatic expression if he had intended it to be an indication of his absolute will.

In each of the following cases the word "desire" was held to be an advisory term.

In Kauffman v. Gries, 141 Cal. 295, 74 Pac. 846, the following provisions of a will were before the court: "I also give and bequeath and devise to my said husband all that portion of my real property in Ventura county, California, lying on the east side of the Saviers road, and north of the row of gum trees and more particularly described as follows, to wit: . . . containing 99.58 acres, as shown upon map of my real property made by George C. Power in June, 1895. It is my desire and I hereby request my said husband to convey in such manner and at such times as he may deem best, under contract or otherwise, the said above-described 99.58 acres of land to Ventura Lodge, No. 214, A. F. & A. M., of the town of San Buena Ventura, California, or to trustees for its use and benefit in such manner as to impose upon said lodge or the trustees thereof the obligation to properly care for, protect, and maintain in good order the cemetery lot in said Springfield Cemetery in which I may be buried." It was held that the testator expressed only a wish that her burial lot should be left in repair and it was not her purpose to bind her husband to that object in such a way that the trust and confidence she reposed in him could be enforced in a court of equity.

In the case of In re Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071, the court was called on to construe the following provisions of a will: "Secondly. I give and bequeath to my wife, Elizabeth Jenny Marti, all the other property, real and personal, and wherever situated, of which I may die possessed [giving a description thereof]. I appoint my wife as executrix of this my last will and testament, to serve without bonds; with full power of disposition, and to manage the business, to sell, to lease, and manage the property without order of the court or interference whatever. Upon the death of my wife, I desire that one half of the property bequeathed to her shall be devised by her to my relatives." In holding that no command was expressed and that the wife took an absolute title free from any trust, the court said: "The precatory words in the present will are: 'Upon the death of my wife, I desire that one-half of the property bequeathed to her shall be devised by her to my relatives.' These words stand in the will in a paragraph separate from that by which the property is given to the wife, and there is nothing in the context, or in any other part of the will, which throws any light upon the intention with which the words were used. The words themselves fall far short of a command or a direction, and are rather in the nature of an expression of the testator's feelings, and a suggestion or recommendation to be considered by her in making a testamentary disposition of her estate, or as a reason to influence her therein. While the desire of a testator for the disposition of his estate will be construed as a command when addressed to his executor, it will not, when addressed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest which he has given to him in absolute terms."

In Van Gorder v. Smith, 99 Ind. 404, it was held that the word "desire" was used in a precatory and not mandatory sense in a will by which a testator bequeathed all his personal property to his wife to be held, used and controlled by her as long as she might live, and to be disposed of by her at her death by will or otherwise, and which also contained the following provision: "It is my desire that my wife, with . . . the interest she shall receive on the moneys invested in registered government bonds, will provide and keep a good comfortable home for my two sons and herself, and that she will use every endeavor to give them a good education, . . . and she may, from time to time as she may deem proper and just, divide and apportion the property herein bequeathed to her among my children, after first becoming satisfied that such property, when so given to them, will not be uselessly squandered and wasted." The provision was construed as rather enlarging than restraining the power of disposition. The court said: "These subsequent provisions of the will expressed by way of . . . 'desire' we construe as rather enlarging than restraining the power of disposition. While it was the manifestation of unbounded confidence in the prudence, discretion and maternal affection of his wife, it was in no sense the creation of a trust, nor a limitation upon her power to dispose of the property 'by will or otherwise' at her pleasure."

In Bills v. Bills, 80 Ia. 269, 45 N. W. 748, 20 Am. St. Rep. 418, 8 L.R.A. 696, it appeared that a testator by the first clause of his will provided thus: "First, I give and bequeath to my wife, Irene Bills, all of my real and personal property situated in Jones county, Iowa, except as hereinafter specified." Then after making certain devises and bequests, in the fifth clause he said: "Fifth, all the real and personal property herein bequeathed to my wife, Irene Bills, remaining at her decease, I desire to be divided into five equal shares, to [certain beneficiaries]." It was held that an absolute title vested in the wife and that "desire" was not an imperative term, the court saying: "When there is an absolute or unlimited devise or bequest of property, a subsequent clause expressing a wish, desire or direction for its disposition, after the death of the devisee or legatee, will not defeat the devise or bequest, nor limit the estate or interest in the property to the right to possess and use during the life of the devisee or legatee. The absolute devise or bequest stands, and the other clause is to be regarded as presenting precatory language. The will must be interpreted to invest in the devisee or legatee the fee-simple title of the land, and the absolute property in the subject of the bequest."

In Jewell v. Barnes, 110 Ky. 329, 61 S. W. 360, 53 L.R.A. 377, it appeared that a will by which a testator left his interest in a business to his wife and brother, making them equal partners, contained the following clause: "I desire that my friend Robert M. Jewell be retained in the employ of the firm on such liberal terms as his long and faithful service entitles him to." It was held that no trust was established in favor of Robert M. Jewell since the language imported no command on the testator's part but only an expression of his desire, and was no doubt put in tacit shape so as not to embarrass the devisees in the management of their affairs.

It appeared in Jacob v. Macon, 20 La. Ann. 182, that a bequest was made in the following terms: "I give and bequeath to my wife the further sum of ten thousand dollars, which I desire her to use for the benefit of her brothers and sisters, Eugene, Louise, Mathilde, and Louis H. Malarcher, according to her best judgment and discretion, which is to be paid after the discharge of the debts." The court held that there was an absolute disposal of the money in favor of the wife and whether the other persons named in the will were to receive any benefit therefrom was addressed entirely to the conscience and discretion of the wife as devisee. It was said: "He [the testator] desires her to use the money for the benefit of her brothers and sisters, but she has the absolute disposal of it and may spend the money donated. . . . The desire or request of the testator, Charles D. Yancey, is simply addressed to the conscience of the devisee. . . . We do not consider the bequest a trust."

In Dufour v. Deresheid, 110 La. 344, 34 So. 469, it appeared that the will of a testator read thus: "I declare I have brought in marriage the sum of six thousand five hundred dollars. I institute as my universal legatee my wife, Katharina Deresheid, to whom I give and bequeath the totality of the property which I shall leave on the day of my decease. At the death of my wife, I desire that, after deduction made of the above sum of six thousand five hundred dollars which shall be paid to my natural heirs, the balance of what she will leave on the day of her decease shall be divided equally between my natural heirs and her own." It was held that neither the testator's heirs nor his wife's heirs took anything under the will; that the testator's heirs would receive none of the estate unless the wife saw fit so to provide in her will; and that the wife's heirs would share in the estate only in case she died either leaving a will so providing, or intestate, under which circumstances they would take under the law of inheritance.

In the case of Ogden's Petition, 25 R. I. 373, 55 Atl. 933, the court was called on to answer the question whether there was a limitation on the location by the town within its limits of a monument provided for in the following bequest: "To the town of North Providence five thousand ($5,000) dollars to erect a monument to the memory of the soldiers and sailors who fell or died in the late war, enlisting from this part of the town existing A. D. 1885; and my desire is that the monument be erected at the junction of Olney and Fruit Hill avenues in said town, on a triangular piece of land thereat located." The court held there was no limitation, saying: "The testator expresses a desire for a certain location, but he does not require it. The expression is precatory, not imperative. It was evidently intended only as a personal recommendation of a site. As such it is not binding on the town."

The court held in Rowland v. Rowland, 29 S. C. 54, 6 S. E. 902, that no trust was created in favor of the children by the testator's expression of desire as to advances to be made by the wife in the following clause of a will: "I direct that all my just debts and funeral expenses be paid out of my personal estate; then all the balance of my estate, real and personal, I direct be and remain in the possession of my wife and children for their support and the education of my children; and as my children shall arrive of age or marry, I desire that my wife shall advance to such child or children such an amount, either in property or money, as she deems prudent, but not exceeding a distributive share of my estate, as it is my intention for my said wife to keep as much of my estate as will make her comfortable during her widowhood, but should she marry again, then she is to have no part of my estate." That it was intended to be left a discretionary matter the court held was clearly evidenced by the vagueness of the amount to be paid, the language being "such an amount . . . as she deems prudent," as well as by the distinction made in the use of the words "direct" and "desire" in the various provisions of the clause.

It appeared in the case of In re Diggles, 39 Ch. D. (Eng.) 253, 59 L. T. N. S. 884, that a testatrix, after bequeathing and devising all her property both real and personal to her daughter in her will, said: "It is my desire that she allows to my relative and companion, Anne Gregory, an annuity of £25 during her life." It was held that the testatrix did not intend to bind her daughter to pay the annuity but only to express a wish that she should do so.

In the case of In re Oldfield [1904] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 549, 90 L. T. N. S. 392, it appeared that a testatrix having devised and bequeathed all her real and personal property equally among her two daughters as tenants in common for their own absolute use and benefit, used the following words: "My desire is that each of my said two daughters shall during the lifetime of my son pay to him one-third of the respective incomes of my said two daughters accruing from the moneys and investments under this my will." The word "desire" was held not to have been used in a mandatory sense, the court saying: "This is a desire expressed with regard to the income of the share which each daughter was to take absolutely under the first clause of the will. Under these circumstances, one has to ask oneself this: Would anyone desiring to create a trust have created it by the use of such language as is used by this testatrix? Is it not more probable that, if she had intended to create such a trust, she would have left her property to the daughters, charging one-third of the income of the property with a trust in favor of the son, and then have given the residue of the income or of the property, subject to the life interest to the son, to the daughters? In my judgment there is nothing in this expression of desire sufficient to cut down the absolute gift for the use and benefit of the daughters which is comprised in the first part of the will."

In Re Soulliere, 24 Ont. W. Rep. 400, 4 Ont. W. N. 1092, 9 Dominion L. Rep. 879, it appeared that a testator after willing all his property to his wife, added the following clause: "I also desire that at her death she will divide the estate that I now give to her among our children in the most just manner possible." It was held that no trust was created. The court said: "It is said that this constitutes a precatory trust and that it operates to cut down the gift to a life estate with the power of appointment among the children. At one time this would probably have been so; but the tendency of the more recent legislation is all the other way. I think that in this will the gift to the wife is absolute, and that the clause quoted recognizes this and falls far short of what is now regarded as necessary to cut down the absolute estate given."

"Desire" Used with Similar Words.

Where the word "desire" coupled with other words of similar meaning has been addressed to a devisee or legatee it has in certain cases been construed by the courts as being used in an advisory sense. For instance, the term has been so construed where the testator expressed his "wish and desire." Thus, in Toms v. Owen, 52 Fed. 417, where a testator expressed his "wish and desire" that his wife should make free use of all property conveyed to her by a deed of earlier date and devised to her by the will, for her own use or for charitable purposes, stating that he knew that in case any of his immediate relatives or her sister should by misfortune or otherwise need any aid or assistance, she would cheerfully and generously share with them, it was held that there was no trust created. The wife's power to carry out the wish expressed was left to her own sense of generosity, which implied the discretion to act or not to act in the event the objects named needed assistance. In Holmes v. Dalley, 192 Mass. 451, 78 N. E. 513, it appeared that in the fourth clause of a will in which by previous provisions a trust for the benefit of the testator's wife and daughter was created it was provided as follows: "Fourth—After the decease of my said wife, one half of the principal of said trust estate is to be paid over and conveyed to such person or persons, and in such proportions as my said wife shall by will appoint, but it is my wish and desire that if my wife has received from my daughter and her family the affection and respect, to which she is entitled, that she then will appoint said share of said trust estate to my daughter and her children, in such way and manner, and in such proportions, as to her may seem best—but in case my said wife shall die without making any appointment of her share of said trust estate, then the same shall be added to the share held in trust for my daughter and her children and be held upon the same trusts." On the wife's decease in her will she devised and bequeathed the property constituting one-half of the trust estate to others than her daughter. It was held that the words "wish and desire" did not constitute a trust but were merely an expression of hope on the part of the testator. In Post v. Moore, 181 N. Y. 15, 2 Ann. Cas. 591, 73 N. E. 482, 106 Am. St. Rep. 495, it appeared that a testator having devised and bequeathed all his property to his wife, her heirs and assigns forever, by a subsequent item declared: "It is my wish and desire that my said wife shall pay the sum of three hundred dollars a year to my sister-in-law Miss Nellie Post." It was held to be discretionary with the wife whether she would pay such sum, no trust being created by the precatory words. The view was taken that no man would use indefinite and optional forms of expression toward those whom he expected to assume a binding duty and obligation in regard to the corpus or income of a bequest. In Montreal Bank v. Bower, 18 Ont. 226, 17 Ont. 548, it appeared that a testator by his will had made an absolute gift of the residue of his estate to his wife, and then inserted a clause in his will reading: "And it is my wish and desire, after my decease, that my said wife shall make a will dividing the real and personal estate and effects thereby devised and bequeathed to her among my said children in such manner as she shall deem just and equitable." It was held that the wife took an absolute title to the property, no trust being created.

The term has also been construed as advisory in nature where a testator expressed his "desire and request." Thus, in Clay v. Wood, 153 N. Y. 134, 47 N. E. 274, affirming 91 Hun 398, 36 N. Y. S. 317, it appeared that a testator gave a house and lot to his wife and "to her heirs and assigns forever," and then after making certain legacies to other parties and providing that the same should not be charges on the house and lot given the wife, gave all the residue of his estate to his wife and to her heirs and assigns forever. But to this was added the following provision: "And it is my desire and request that my said wife do sustain, provide for and educate Lucretia M. Wood, the daughter of my said adopted daughter Josephine M. Wood. And it is my further desire and request that my wife do make the said Lucretia M. Wood, Josephine M. Wood and my nephews and nieces, the children of my brothers Caleb S. Clay and George Clay, joint heirs after her death in the said estate which by this will I have bequeathed to my said wife." It was held that the precatory words in the will were not of such force as to deprive the wife as donee of the absolute right of disposal, but were only morally binding upon her and therefore no trust or power in trust was created thereby in favor of the persons named. In the case of In re Forscht's Estate, 2 Pa. Dist. 294, in holding that no trust was created by the words "desire and request," it was said: "It is well settled that merely precatory words, following an absolute bequest or devise—words not importing imperative direction, but of desire and request merely, will not create a trust or serve to reduce the estate or interest previously given. Such are the words used in this will: 'It is my desire and request.' They follow an absolute gift of one-third of testator's estate to Israel; they are dependent on a contingency that may never happen, 'in case my said son Israel has no children to inherit his estate;' they apply not to the corpus or thing bequeathed to Israel, but to 'so much of his estate as he receives from me under this will.' They are insufficient to create a trust of this fund for the children of Mrs. Miller, or to reduce the gift to Israel to a life estate."

Likewise, the word has been construed as advisory in nature where a testator stated that he "expected and desired" the devisee or legatee to use the property in a particular way. Thus, in the case of In re Gardner, 140 N. Y. 122, 35 N. E. 439, it appeared that by the residuary clause of his will a testator gave the residue of his estate to his wife to have and to hold the same and every part and parcel thereof to her and her assigns forever, provided, however, that if any part of it should remain unexpended or undisposed of at her death what should so remain he gave to his son and his heirs and assigns, adding this clause: "And I expect and desire that my said wife will not dispose of any of said estate by will in such a way that the whole that might remain at her death shall go out of my own family and blood relation." It was held that the gift to the wife, subject to the condition that any part not disposed of at her death should pass to the son, was in no way limited or qualified by the clause expressing desire and expectation above quoted, and that the wife at her death could dispose of the property in any way she desired.

"Desire" Used with Words Evincing Advisory Intent.

The word "desire" has been held to be used as an advisory term where the testator's intention to use it in a mandatory sense is expressly negatived by the provisions of another clause of his will.

Thus, in Burnes v. Burnes, 137 Fed. 781, 70 C. C. A. 357, affirming 132 Fed. 485, wherein it appeared that a testator bequeathed all of his property to his two brothers "to be held and disposed of by them absolutely as their own property," added it was his "desire" that they should so adopt his children that they would share equally with their own in their advancements and estate, and then concluded with the provision that "nothing in this will, and no request, direction or bequest made herein, shall be so construed as to create a charge or incumbrance upon any of the property bequeathed," it was held that no trust was created in favor of the children.

In Lumpkin v. Rodgers, 155 Ind. 285, 58 N. E. 72, it appeared that a testator had devised and bequeathed all his property to his wife and then by his will provided as follows: "(2) 'It is my desire that the business be so conducted that all of our children, or their heirs, shall finally share equally in the distribution of our property.' (3) 'I would advise that the said Nancy Adamson shall at some suitable time call to her counsel two or three good discreet men to assist her in making a proper and equitable division of the real estate, as well as other property that she may think proper, among all the children aforesaid, retaining, however, if she choose so to do, the title and possession of said property to herself until after her death.' (4) 'Nothing in the above shall be construed to effect a perfect and indefeasible title to her, the said Nancy Adamson, which this will conveys to her, to all the said property, both real and personal, with the right to control, sell, and convey the same at her pleasure.'" It was held that the said second clause should be construed as advisory only.

In Enders v. Tasco, 89 Ky. 17, 11 S. W. 818, it appeared that the second clause of a will read thus: "All the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal and mixed, after the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I will, devise and bequeath to my dear wife, Candace J. Enders, to have, control, use and enjoy as her own absolute property, if she should survive me long enough to enjoy or take possession or control of the same; and, in the event of her surviving me, it is my desire that it may suit her pleasure, and if so, I request, but without intending to create any trust therefor, that she allow and pay Ann Tasco, a mulatto, who has been for some time in our service, the sum of fifteen dollars per month, at the end of each month, so long as said Ann may live, to be used and applied toward her maintenance and support." In holding that "desire" was not used as an imperative term, the court said: "The testator's wish is, that it may suit the pleasure of his wife to make this allowance out of her absolute estate, which is equivalent to saying that, if it does not suit the pleasure of his wife to make the allowance, then he does not desire her to make it; that her pleasure, upon the subject of allowance, is to be the law unto him; if she is in favor of making the allowance, it will accord with his wish; if not, then her will be done, not his, for his is to be subordinate to hers, in proof of which . . . he says his wish or request is not to create a trust in favor of the appellee. If this clause establishes a precatory trust in favor of the appellee, it would be a difficult task for a testator to so express himself as not to create one, in expressing a mere wish to the object of his bounty, but leaving it entirely optional with the object of the bounty as to carrying out the wish."

CONSTRUED AS MANDATORY TERM.

"Desire" Used Alone.

The courts have construed the word "desire" in the cases hereinafter set out as a mandatory term, thus making the direction which the testator expressed as his desire binding on the devisee or legatee to whom the testator addressed the same.

In the case of In re Buhrmeister, 1 Cal. App. 80, 81 Pac. 752, it appeared that a testator by one article of his will devised all his property to his six children "in equal shares, share and share alike," and by a subsequent article declared that it was his "desire" that his son Walter should have the use and occupation of a certain fruit ranch for a period of five years immediately following his death and directed the other children to execute a lease for that period. It was held that more than a mere wish or request was intended and that there was an absolute direction.

In Major v. Herndon, 78 Ky. 123, it appeared that the fourth and fifth clauses of a will before the court for construction read as follows: "Fourth. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Elizabeth Jane Herndon, the farm upon which I now reside, together with the remainder of my property, after taking out the legacies above named, during her life time or while she remains my widow, which I desire she shall manage and control for the benefit of herself, and mine and her children; and at her death, or the termination of her widowhood, it is my desire that said property may be equally divided among my children, after charging my three eldest sons with the sum of eleven hundred dollars each, as aforesaid. Fifth. It is my desire that the property of which I may die possessed, after the payment of the legacy of eleven hundred dollars to my son, John Chapman, shall be kept together, my younger children receive an education equal with what my three eldest sons have received, and made equal with them in a horse, saddle, and bridle, and everything else I have given them after which I desire an equal division." "Desire" as therein used was held to be a mandatory term clearly indicating the testator's intention that the children should share in the testator's estate. A precatory trust was therefore held to have been created. The court said: "The first part of the fourth item of the will is sufficient to vest in the widow an absolute estate for life or during her widowhood, and there are no words following the gift which expressly limit it; but both in this and in the succeeding item the 'desire' of the testator that she shall manage and control the property, not for her own benefit alone, but for the benefit of his and her children as well, is three times distinctly and unequivocally expressed, and after reading these two items, no doubt can remain that he intended that his wife and his and her children should enjoy his bounty in common."

In Maught v. Getzendanner, 65 Md. 527, 5 Atl. 471, 57 Am. Rep. 352, it appeared that a testator provided in his will as follows: "I give and bequeath and devise unto the Reverend H. G. Bowers, of Jefferson, Maryland, all the rest and residue of my estate, and desire him to use and appropriate the same for such religious and charitable purposes and objects, and in such sums and in such manner as will, in his judgment, best promote the cause of Christ." The word "desire" it was held was therein used in an imperative sense and a trust would have been created thereby had it not been for the vagueness and uncertainty in the expression of its objects and purposes.

In Erickson v. Willard, 1 N. H. 217, it appeared that a testatrix gave property by the following provision: "I give and bequeath unto him the said Joseph Willard aforesaid, clerk and rector of St. John's Church, his heirs and assigns forever all my real and personal estate at the time of my decease after my just debts and funeral charges are paid." The will contained also this clause: "And I desire that the said Joseph Willard should at his discretion appropriate a part of the income of my estate aforesaid not exceeding fifty dollars a year to the support of the widow Margaret Erickson my sister's daughter during her natural life, and it is my express direction that my executor place the aforesaid Margaret in some pious and Christian family in the country at a distance from this town where she may be removed from temptation." In an action to compel the fulfillment of the provisions of the clause last quoted it was held that "desire" as therein used was an imperative term and created a trust in favor of the plaintiff. But in that case it should be noted that Joseph Willard was also named executor of the testator's estate and the court laid considerable stress upon this fact in holding as stated above.

In Vandyck v. Van Beuren, 1 Caines (N. Y.) 84, it appeared that a testator provided as follows: "I desire (b) my three sons Cornelius, Jacobus, and Ephraim, that in case any of my daughters above mentioned should be inclined to purchase of them the land in the Bruyn's patent (here above bequeathed to them) for a living for herself and family, that then they let such of my daughters have it at the same price they had it for." It was held that an election was given to any of the daughters to purchase the premises and a trust was raised by the will for that purpose.

In Riker v. Leo, 115 N. Y. 93, 21 N. E. 719, the evidence showed that a testator left a fund in trust to his executors to apply the income thereof to the support of a nephew and on his death were directed to pay the same "to any responsible corporation in this city, existing at the time of the death of my said nephew, whose permanent fund is established by its charter for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the Jews in Jerusalem, Palestine, and I desire such corporation annually to transmit the interest received on said fifty thousand dollars to Jerusalem, Palestine, to ameliorate the condition of the Jews living there, by promoting among them education, arts and sciences, and by learning them mechanical and agricultural vocations." It was held that the word "desire" as therein used to express the object of the gift was equivalent to a command to the donee. The court said: "The 'desire,' which he expresses, has here the force of a command, because it expresses the object the testator had in view when making the bequest. It is very clear that where the donee of property is 'desired' or 'requested' by the testator to dispose of that property in favor of others, those words are imperative and their use will create a trust."

In the case of In re Dewey, 45 Utah 98, 143 Pac. 124, a testatrix, it appeared, had inserted the following provision in her will: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my property of every kind and nature whatsoever, if any, which remain after paying and discharging all the debts, bequests, legacies, and obligations hereinbefore mentioned and provided for, I hereby give, devise, and bequeath to the said Hubbard Tuttle, Sr. It is my desire that he shall distribute the same, or the proceeds thereof, among my nephews and nieces, and to such of them, and in such proportions, as he shall deem just and proper, and his decision upon such matters shall be final, conclusive and binding upon all parties." The court held that from the provisions of the will generally and from the language of the clause quoted the intention of the testator was to create a trust on the property devised and bequeathed to the said Hubbard Tuttle, Sr. In other words the court said that the language used was equivalent to a command.

In Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. (Eng.) 469, 470, it appeared that the will under consideration gave "to Elizabeth his wife all his estate, leases, and interest in his house in Hatton Garden, and all the goods, furniture, and chattels therein at the time of his death, and also all his plate, linen, jewels, and other wearing apparel, but did desire her at or before her death, to give such leases, house, furniture, goods and chattels, plate and jewels, unto and amongst such of his own relations, as she should think most deserving and approve of." It was held that at his wife's death the testator's next of kin then living were entitled to have the property divided among them, a trust having been created.

"Desire" Used with Similar Words.

Where the word "desire" has been used in connection with other words of similar meaning in addressing a devisee or legatee, it has in some cases been considered to be a mandatory term placing the duty on the devisee or legatee to act in accordance with the direction so expressed.

It has been so held where a testator expressed his "wish and desire" to his devisee or legatee as to their conduct with the property. Thus in Murphy v. Carlin, 113 Mo. 112, 20 S. W. 786, 35 Am. St. Rep. 699, it appeared that a will devising the residue of the estate to the testator's wife after the payment of certain legacies provided by its sixth clause as follows: "It is my wish and desire that my wife continue to provide for the care, comfort and education of Thomas Joseph Murphy, now aged nearly five years, who has been raised as a member of my family since his infancy, and to make suitable provision for him in case of her death, providing that he continue to be a dutiful child to her and shows himself worthy of such consideration." It was held that the words being a positive and unequivocal expression of the will of the testator established a precatory trust and placed an absolute duty on the wife to carry out the same. The court said: "That it was his intention that she should be imperatively charged with that duty, is apparent from the circumstances surrounding the transaction as well as upon the face of the will. Here was a helpless infant, an affectionate boy, reared in his family without means and without friends to assist him in the battle of life, taught to regard the testator as his father and to look to him for protection, and for whom he seems to have had a father's affection; a woman young enough to contract future marital relations that might seriously interfere with the protection which he knew she was then disposed to give him. Is it not more reasonable that he should have intended to make the provision for him obligatory upon his wife rather than to leave his fate to the whim and caprice of herself or some future husband? If this boy had been the testator's natural born son, who would have a doubt of it? And yet he seems to have entertained the same sort of affection for this boy 'who had been raised as a member of his family since his infancy.' Why then make a distinction in interpreting his will? That his wife was to be charged with the obligation 'to continue to provide for the care, comfort and education' of the child, and 'in case of her death, make a suitable provision for him,' seems manifest from the fact that he placed in the will itself the condition upon which she was to be released from that obligation, i. e., 'should he show himself unworthy of such consideration.' There was no necessity for this provision, if his wife was to have unlimited discretion to provide for the plaintiff or not, as she might choose. He named the condition and (expressio unius exclusio alterius), the only condition upon which her failure to execute his wishes in that behalf should be excused. Hence, the condition being performed, the duty became imperative."

In Deacon v. Cobson, 83 N. J. Eq. 122, 89 Atl. 1029, a trust was held to be created by the following provisions: "Third. All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed . . . I give, devise and bequeath to my daughter, Theodosia Borden, her heirs and assigns forever, but it is my wish and desire, and I hereby request my said daughter, Theodosia Borden, to keep intact so far as may be possible and practicable the body of my estate which she is to receive by virtue of this third item of my will, using only the rents, issues, profits and income therefrom for her own separate use and maintenance. And I further desire and hereby request my said daughter, Theodosia Borden, to make a will wherein and whereby she shall devise and bequeath all the corpus of my estate which she is to receive by the third item of this will, or so much as may be intact and remaining at the time of her death, as follows." [Directions for bequests and devises then following.] The court said: "The question for determination is whether the words 'wish,' 'desire' and 'request,' as used in that will and codicil, are operative to create a trust in favor of the persons named by testatrix. A rule of construction early adopted by the English court of chancery was to the effect that when, by will, property is given absolutely to a person, and the same person is by the testator 'recommended,' 'entreated,' 'requested' or 'wished' to dispose of that property in favor of another, the recommendation, request or wish will be held to be imperative and to create a trust, if the subject and objects of the trust are certain. That rule of construction was adopted by our court of last resort more than half a century ago, and has since been uniformly recognized by the courts of this state; it cannot be now questioned in this court. . . . It necessarily follows that the requests of testatrix in the will and codicil here in question must be given the same force as though the language adopted by testatrix had been, wherever the word 'request' occurs, it is my will and I do hereby order and direct. With this rule of construction uniformly recognized by our courts for so long a period of time, testators and scrivener may be said to have been privileged to rely upon its existence and future recognition."

In Foster v. Willson, 68 N. H. 241, 38 Atl. 1003, 73 Am. St. Rep. 581, it was held that a command was expressed and a trust established by the words "wish and desire" as used in the following provisions of a will: "2. As to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, I give, bequeath, and devise the same to my said husband, Fred H. Willson, to have and to hold the same to him and his heirs and assigns forever; but it is my wish and desire that he shall furnish a home, maintenance, and care to and for my said father during life, should he need and require it."

In the case of Re Walton, 20 Manitoba 686, a precatory trust was held to be created by the words "wish and desire" as used by a testator in the following clause: "I bequeath to each of my sons [names following] one-third of my stock or shares in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the share of each to be transferred in the books of the company to each of such legatees. My wish and desire, however, is that, though each of my said three sons shall have had such shares so transferred to them as aforesaid, they shall not dispose of them but only the income derived therefrom shall be expended by them respectively, and that upon the death of each of them his share shall be disposed of and the proceeds thereof divided equally amongst all my grand children."

The word "desire" has been construed as mandatory where a testator expressed his "will and desire" to his devisee or legatee as to their conduct with the property. Thus, in McMurry v. Stanley, 69 Tex. 227, 6 S. W. 412, it appeared that the third and fourth clauses of a will were as follows: "3rd. It is my will and desire that my beloved husband shall have all my property, both real, personal and mixed, whatever the interest may be, whether separate or community interest. And that he shall have full power and control over same to use and dispose of as he may desire. 4th. It is my will and desire that at his death, should he have any of said property still remaining in his possession not disposed of or used by him, that the same shall be given by him to my nieces, Jessie McMurry and Flora Brown, daughters of Vina and Taylor Brown." The words "will" and "desire" having been interpreted to have been used in an imperative sense in the third clause it was held that they should be given a like meaning in the fourth clause, thereby reducing the estate in fee to the husband to a fee in trust except as it was subject to be disposed of by the husband during his lifetime. In Girdler v. Girdler (Ky.) 113 S. W. 835, it appeared that a testator expressed it as his "will and desire" that none of the real estate given and devised to his sons under previous provisions of his will should be sold or alienated for a certain period. It was held that while there might be some question as to whether the expression "it is my desire" amounted to a positive restriction, there could be no question that the phrase "it is my will" amounted to a restriction and was equivalent to the expression "direct."

When Not Addressed to Devisee or Legatee.

CONSTRUED AS DISPOSITIVE TERM.

The word "desire" when not addressed to a devisee or legatee but used to indicate the wish of the testator as to the disposition of his property has in certain cases hereinafter set out been construed as a dispositive term by which a testator evinces his will to make a devise or bequest as positively by the use of that term as if he had made the direction in the mandatory language customarily employed for that purpose.

Thus, in the case of In re Tooley reported in full, post, this volume, at page 516, the will before the court for construction read as follows: "I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley. If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother." It appeared that Logan Mattie Tooley survived the testatrix but was unmarried at the time of her death and had no children. The court in sustaining the claim that the property belonged to the sisters and brother said that the word "desire" was a dispositive expression showing the absolute will of the testatrix to make a gift of the property. The court further held that there was no question in that case whether a trust was established for that would only arise where the request was made to a devisee or legatee, or construed to have been so made.

In Keplinger v. Keplinger (Ind.) 113 N. E. 292, it appeared that the will under consideration provided as follows: "First. It is my desire that after all my just debts including funeral expenses and doctor's bills are paid, that the rest and residue of said estate both real and personal I hereby give and bequeath unto my wife, Mary A. Keplinger, she to have the full control for and during her natural life. Second. At the date of the death of my wife, it is my desire that after a suitable monument is erected at my grave the same to cost not less than five hundred dollars, the rest and residue of what is left shall be devised as follows, to wit: To Glen Keplinger the sum of five hundred dollars. . . . And after the above distributions are distributed it is my desire that the rest and residue of said estate be devised equally between John A. Keplinger and Lizzie Middaugh. Third. I hereby appoint my wife, Mary A. Keplinger, executrix of this will during her life and at her death, I hereby appoint said John A. Keplinger and Lizzie Middaugh to execute it according to the above bequests." The court said: "The question of the character of the words or terms used, whether precatory or imperative, is not material in considering a primary gift. A devise of a simple remainder by the use of the word 'desire' is as effective as one by the use of the technical word 'devisee.' . . . It is only where there is a primary gift to one, followed by an apparent attempt to impress on the estate given a use for the benefit of another, that the character of the words used in such attempt, whether mandatory or advisory, becomes important. Consequently, if the first item . . . devised a life estate only [and it was so held] leaving the remainder in fee for further disposition, it is unnecessary to consider the proper definition of 'desire' as found in the second item, whether as signifying command or entreaty."

In Weber v. Bryant, 161 Mass. 400, 37 N. E. 203, the word "desire" was held to be equivalent to a command in a polite form, working a good charitable bequest as used in the following residuary clause: "If, after all the aforesaid legacies and annuities are fully provided for, any surplus should remain in the hands of trustees, I desire the same to be then distributed among and applied to such objects and purposes of benevolence or charity, public or private, including educational or charitable institutions and the relief of individual need, regardless of nationality or color, as the trustees for the time being shall deem worthy thereof; and I give the trustees for the time being of such remaining property and estate full power and discretion and authority to appropriate and expend such remaining property in such manner as in their judgment may best promote the objects and purposes above mentioned."

In Moseley v. Bolster, 201 Mass. 135, 87 N. E. 606, it appeared that a will contained the following clause: "All the rest and residue of my estate in whatsoever it may consist and wheresoever situated, I give bequeath and devise to my son Oliver H. Perry and my daughters Martha Ann Perry and Mary Augusta Moseley wife of John G. Moseley of said Boston as follows to my son Oliver H. one undivided half part and I desire that my real estate in Needham County of Norfolk & Commonwealth of Massachusetts shall be held by my son Oliver in the division of my estate, together with the farm stock utensils and other personal property on said estate in Needham, to my said daughter Martha Ann one undivided quarter part and to my daughter Mary Augusta one undivided quarter part." It was held that the word "desire" expressed the absolute will of the testator that his son Oliver should have the real estate described. The court said: "The expression of the testator's 'desire' that this property should be held by his son was not the mere expression of a hope that the beneficiaries of his will would use his bounty in a certain manner; it was an operative disposition of his property. . . . Full effect can be given to the intent of the testator by treating this disposition of a part of the residue in favor of the son as a partial division made by the testator of the undivided estate which he gave to all his children."

In the case of Matter of Copeland, 38 Misc. 402, 77 N. Y. S. 931, the court, disregarding the fact that the word "desired" was addressed to a devisee or legatee, held that the testator clearly showed an intention to make a gift when he used it as in the following clause of his will: "First: After all my lawful debts are paid and discharged, I give and bequeath to my ever beloved son Edward Copeland, all of my estate, both real and personal, of whatever kind or nature of which I may die seized and possessed, but out of this inheritance he is desired by his mother to pay as soon after as possible that it comes into his ownership five hundred dollars ($500) to her grandniece, the daughter of William P. Clark, of Newburgh, Orange County, State of New York, now known as Ellie Clark, recognizing in this form the kindness bestowed upon your mother in her youth by her brother, the grandfather of said Ellie Clark." Therein the court said: "While the words 'give, devise and bequeath,' are the usual words used in wills, yet they are not essential to the validity of a gift, and if it appears that it was the intention of the testator to have the property go to the person named as legatee, even if the words 'wish or desire' are used, then the intention of the testator will be followed out. . . . I think that the plain intention in this case, although there was only the word 'desired' used shows an intention to make this a gift. The testator had given everything that she had, after the payment of her debts, to her son, and stated, however, that she desired that as soon as possible that five hundred dollars should be paid to the person named, Ellie Clark, and stated that she did this for the purpose of 'recognizing in this form the kindness bestowed upon your mother in her youth.' There is no doubt therefore but that the testator firmly believed when she made this will that she was making an effectual provision, by which the person toward whom she was kindly disposed would receive the contemplated gift."

In the case of Matter of Compton, 72 Misc. 289, 131 N. Y. S. 183, where it appeared that part of the second clause of a will read thus: "I desire that the sum of $1,800 (eighteen hundred dollars) invested in the Lord's work in care of Miss S. A. Lindemberger (of which I receive the income during my lifetime), shall not be withdrawn from said work at my decease, but shall wholly remain in that work," the words "I desire" were held to be equivalent to "I direct," and it was said that the said provision of the will would have amounted to a gift in trust valid and enforceable had the trust been valid in other particulars. The court therein said: "The words 'I desire' are equivalent in meaning to the words 'I direct,' and should be so interpreted. The language used amounts to a declaration that the testatrix had previously invested in the 'Lord's work,' in care of Miss S. A. Lindemberger, the sum of eighteen hundred dollars, and to a direction that the fund should not be withdrawn upon her death, but should forever remain in that work."

The court in Cook v. Ellington, 59 N. C. 371, held that the words "I desire" were equivalent to the words "I give" when used as in the following clause of a codicil: "I desire that my wife, . . . shall have all the crop of cotton that I may have on hand at the time of my death."

In Oyster v. Knull, 137 Pa. St. 448, 20 Atl. 624, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890, it appeared that a testator provided as follows in his will: "I give and bequeath to my son Napoleon Kiever Oyster my Mount Airy farm . . . for his support, and if he should be spared to have family, I desire the above estate to go to the use of his children." The word "desire" was held to be mandatory and to work a gift of the property. The court said: "The words, 'I desire,' etc., as employed by the testator, are equivalent to the words 'I will and direct.' The clause in question may then be read thus, 'I will that the above estate shall go to the use of his children.'"

In the case of In re Dickinson, 209 Pa. St. 59, 58 Atl. 120, it appeared that a testatrix disposed of her estate in the following language: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed, and wherever situated, I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved husband, Henry B. Dickinson, his heirs and assigns. . . . And should my husband not expend the whole of my estate, then it is my desire at his death to give so much of it as remains to my sister, Annie Ulrich, and my two brothers, Algernon J. Martin and John J. Martin." It was held that the word "desire" as used by the testatrix expressed her will and intention and was a mandatory term passing whatever property remained undisposed of at the husband's death to the persons designated. The court said: "The concluding sentence expresses the desire of the testatrix to give the whole of her estate, not expended by her husband, to her sister and brothers. It is her wish to thus give her estate. It is not her desire or wish or recommendation that her husband shall give the unexpended estate to them. The estate is not committed to him with expressions of desire as to how he disposed of it. The testatrix makes the disposition herself. She gives him the estate. This carries with it the power to convert, sell, convey, assign and transfer. He could have expended the whole of it, for there is no limitation, restraint or condition attached to the bequest. But if he did not consume or expend it, then what remained at his death she gave to others. This is the reasonable interpretation of the will. He did not consume the whole; what remains, therefore, is her estate, and passes by her will to the legatees. . . . Where the words 'wish' and 'desire' are used in expressing a desire for an act to be done by some person named by the testator, they are generally precatory merely, but no such presumption necessarily arises when the words are used to express the intention and will of the testator. In such cases they are held to be mandatory."

In McCreary v. Burns, 17 S. C. 45, by a clause of a will reading: "I desire that the land and other property remaining shall continue in the possession of my beloved wife, Leah Burns, during her life," a gift of a life estate was held to pass, the court saying: "The first part of the second paragraph of the will undoubtedly gives a simple life estate to Leah. There is no direct gift in terms, but being in a will the word 'desire' means that."

But, in Hunt v. Hunt, 18 Wash. 14, 50 Pac. 578, the court construed a clause in a codicil reading as follows: "I desire fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) to be given to our foster son, Edward Woods Hunt, at any time convenient to my executrix." It was held that the codicil constituted neither a bequest nor a trust, it appearing that the wife, who was appointed executrix and was by the terms of the will given all the testator's property for life, after being directed by the codicil to pay a bequest of five thousand dollars, was authorized if the revenues from the estate were not sufficient for her support "to use such part of the principal as she may require," and that the payment of the five thousand dollars bequest and the fifteen thousand dollars claimed for the son would more than exceed the amount of the property coming into the wife's hands.

A bequest or devise in a will has been held to be revoked by a testator expressing his "desire" to do so in a clause of a codicil. In Harrison v. Langfitt, 158 Ia. 479, 139 N. W. 1076, wherein it appeared that a clause in a codicil was as follows: "I desire to change the will in regard to J. W. Langfitt, he having received his share in land under value," it was held that such heir was thereby precluded from sharing in the estate. The court said: "It is also urged by the appellant that the codicil did not in fact change the will, but only expressed a 'desire' to do so. It is well settled that mere precatory words in a will are not binding as a disposition of property. But this usually has reference to the expression of a wish or request as to the future conduct or action of other parties. But the expression of a wish or desire is by no means fatal to the form of a bequest or devise. Indeed, bequests frequently appear in just such form, and are sustained as sufficient."

The word "desire" when used in connection with words of similar import has been construed as a positive direction of the testator to make a disposition of his property to the persons named. Thus, in the reported case it appears that a testator expressed it as his "will and desire" that certain property in which he had devised a life estate in his wife should revert to his son, provided he paid certain specified legacies. In earlier provisions of the will it appears that the testator had used the words "give, devise and bequeath." The court holds that while "desire" is sometimes used as a precatory term still in this case where it is used with the word "will" which is mandatory in its nature and where the testator's intention to dispose of his entire estate clearly appears it must be taken as a mandatory term. And in Young v. McKinnie, 5 Fla. 542, a clause of a will reading: "It is my will and desire that my property . . . be equally divided," etc., was held to import a present gift. In Meehan v. Brennan, 16 App. Div. 395, 45 N. Y. S. 57, where a testatrix declared in her will that in the event of her death her "wishes, desires and intentions" were that all her real estate be disposed of to persons and in a manner thereafter enumerated, it was held that the testatrix being at liberty to do what she chose with her property, expressed her intention by the use of the above words which were there used in an imperative sense and had the same force as though the word "direct" had been used. In Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 103, mandatory effect was given to the words "wish and desire" as used in a clause of a will, reading thus: "I also wish and desire that all my real estate be equally divided between my children, namely," etc. In Taylor v. Martin (Pa.) 8 Atl. 920, the court was called on to construe the following provisions of a will: "I do hereby will, devise, and bequeath unto my beloved and faithful wife, Mary Raybold, all my estate, real, and mixed, whatsoever and wheresoever the same may be at the time of my decease, to her sole and separate use, behoof, and control forever. Item 5. It is also my desire and wish, after my wife's death, that my house and lot, number 2,007 Fitzwater street, shall go to my daughter Mary C. Martin, wife of Thomas J. Martin, for her sole and separate use during her natural life; and after her death the above said house and lot of ground, number 2,007 Fitzwater street, shall revert and go to my son Joshua C. A. Raybold, to him, his heirs and assigns, forever." It was held that the words "desire and wish" were used to show the absolute intention of the testator and thereby a life estate was given to the daughter, Mary C. Martin, in the property mentioned with remainder over to the son, the gift to his wife being limited to a life estate. In Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, it appeared that a testator inserted in his will the following clause: "It is my wish and desire that my grandson, William Armstrong Cocke, be brought up and educated at the cost and expense of my estate." It was held that the terms "wish" and "desire" must be construed as creating a change on the testator's estate.

CONSTRUED AS COMMAND TO EXECUTOR.

In cases where a testator has expressed it as his "desire" that his executor should act in some particular manner with regard to the estate, the word has been held to express a command from the testator with which the executor must comply.

Thus, in the case of In re Pforr, 144 Cal. 121, 77 Pac. 825, it appeared that a provision of a will read as follows: "A. Third. I desire that my executrix and executor, at the expiration of two years from the date of my demise, shall have the property sold at public auction or otherwise, and after paying all indebtedness standing against it, to divide the net proceeds of such sale into six equal parts or divisions, and to distribute the same, share and share alike, to my heirs and devisees as hereinafter set forth." The court said: "The provision for the sale of the property and the distribution of its proceeds among the six beneficiaries operated as an equitable conversion of the real estate into personalty. . . . This result is not overcome by reason of the testator having used the word 'desire' instead of 'direct' in authorizing the sale. The words 'I desire' that my real estate shall be sold are the equivalent of the words 'I will' that it be sold. . . . While the desire of a testator for the disposal of his estate is a mere request when addressed to his devisee, it is to be construed as a command when addressed to his executor."

In Bohon v. Barrett, 79 Ky. 378, mandatory effect was given to the word "desire," as used in the following clause of a will: "I desire that my executor shall, at such time, on such terms, and in such quantities as he may think best, sell all my real estate, of every kind, and wherever situated, and convey the same to the purchaser or purchasers by deed or deeds duly executed."

In Stewart v. Stewart, 61 N. J. Eq. 25, 47 Atl. 633, the word "desire" was held to be used in an obligatory sense and to be equivalent to a positive direction as used in the following provisions of a will: "Fourth. I desire the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000) set apart and invested by my executors, the revenue from which I give to my said wife for life for her support and the maintenance of the household. . . . Seventh. All the rest and remainder of my estate, of every nature and kind, I desire invested and added to my residuary estate, the income from which shall be shared equally by my two sons and paid to them after deducting the taxes paid on the same."

In Philadelphia's Appeal, 112 Pa. St. 470, 4 Atl. 4, there was involved a clause in a will reading thus: "I desire all my other estate, real, personal or mixed, shall, as soon after my decease as practicable, be sold, and the proceeds arising therefrom be invested in first bonds and mortgages." The court said: "We regard this as a direction to sell. The words 'I desire' are the equivalent of the words 'I will' that my real estate shall be sold, etc., while the added words, 'as soon after my decease as practicable,' left no discretion to his executors excepting as to the matter of time."

In Turrill v. Davenport, 173 App. Div. 543, 159 N. Y. S. 814, it was held that such clearly appearing to be the intention of the testatrix the words "I desire" must be construed to have been employed in a mandatory sense and equivalent to "I will" when used as in the following clause of a will: "Realizing that the present income from the investments and securities is extremely small and that even this must be constantly diminished by taxes on real estate, I desire that in order to augment said income the landed property be sold as soon as profitable sales can be negotiated and the proceeds reinvested in safe interest bearing bonds and mortgages. . . . Sales and reinvestments in the discretion of Mrs. Turrill; after her demise, of the other executors."

But in Hazlewood v. Webster, 7 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 164, construing a will wherein the testator declared his "greatest desire" to be that his executor see that his two brothers were well taken care of during their lives that they might lack for nothing that would render them comfortable, and then bequeathing a saddle horse and saddle and some private papers to his executor and devising and bequeathing the rest of his estate, which was considerable, to his relatives, it was held that by such language no trust was created which a court would enforce either on the specific devises or the estate generally.

In a case where a testator expressed it as his "desire" that an executor should place a certain fund in trust, it was held to be equivalent to a direction or a command. Wood v. Camden Safe Deposit, etc. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 460, 14 Atl. 885. In that case it appeared that a testatrix by will directed that the residue of her estate should be divided into three equal parts and then gave and devised one-third to each of her three daughters. Subsequently, she executed a codicil thereto in these words: "I desire that one-half of the share of the property inherited from me by my daughter, Lydia C. Wood, shall be placed in trust, The Camden Trust Co. acting as trustee." It was held that the word "desire" was not in the application made by the testatrix the expression of a request, recommendation or entreaty addressed to the legatee or devisee; but it was an order, direction or command to the executors of the will clearly placing on them the duty to place in trust one-half of the one-third originally left to Lydia C. Wood.

CONSTRUED AS APPOINTING OR CONTROLLING TRUSTEE.

Where a testator has addressed a trustee with the word "desire" the provision has been held to be mandatory and controlling on the trustee. Central Trust Co. v. Egleston, 47 Misc. 693, 98 N. Y. S. 1055, wherein the court construed the following clause of a will: "For the first year and one-half after my death (if any child is under age) I desire that the Central Trust Company advance to my wife in the ratio of my previous expenditure from five thousand dollars to about nine thousand dollars, so as to give time to adjust family affairs—this to be for the benefit of my wife and sons, not one, but all—but if all of the children are of age (twenty-one) then for one year, not one year and one-half ($5,000 to $9,000)" It was held that the testator intended to control and direct the disposition and not to leave it as a discretionary matter.

Where the word "desire" was addressed to the court in respect to the appointment of an executor named in a will as trustee, it was held in Wolbert v. Beard, 128 Wis. 391, 107 N. W. 663, that the request for the appointment must be considered as equivalent to an appointment by the will.

MATTER OF ESTATE OF TOOLEY.

California Supreme Court—May 12, 1915.

170 Cal. 164; 149 Pac. 574.

Wills — Construction — Words Construed in Ordinary Sense.

The words of a will are to be taken in the ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected.

Construction of "Desire."

Civ. Code, § 1322, provides that a distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or by any other words not equally clear, or by inference from other parts of the will, or by an inaccurate recital of, or reference to, its contents in another part of the will. A will provided: "I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley. If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother." It is held that the word "desire" indicated the wish of testatrix regarding the disposition of the property, and was a dispositive and testamentary provision, binding upon the court in the distribution of the estate, so that, where the daughter survived the testatrix and died unmarried, the property was to be distributed to the brother and sisters of the testatrix.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such provision is a command sufficient to effect a testamentary disposition of the property, and not an expression of a wish or preference directed to the daughter, so that there is no precatory trust reposed in her.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn county: FINCH, Judge.

Distribution of estate of Martha L. Tooley. From a decree rendered, brother and sisters of decedent appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Frank Freeman for appellants.

Glenn West, Ben F. Geis and Duard F. Geis for respondents.

[165] SHAW, J.—The transcript presents an appeal by the brother and sisters of the decedent from a decree of the superior court making distribution of her estate. The sole question presented is the construction of the last will of the decedent.

The will reads as follows:

"I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley.

"If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother.

"MARTHA L. TOOLEY."

The daughter, Logan Mattie Tooley, survived her mother, the testatrix, but died before the petition for distribution was filed. She also left a will by which she gave all her property to Leonard Lenus Klemmer subject to a small annuity. She was unmarried at the time of her death and had no children. Letters of administration with the will annexed were granted upon her estate. In the petition for distribution of the mother's estate the executor asked that distribution thereof [166] be made to the brother and sisters of Martha L. Tooley. The administratrix of the daughter's estate filed an opposition to this petition and asked that distribution be made to said administratrix for the benefit of the estate of said Logan Mattie Tooley. The court denied the petition for distribution and sustained the opposition thereto. Distribution was made accordingly to the administratrix of the estate of the daughter for the benefit of said estate.

The contention of the respondents is that the first paragraph of the will vests the estate in the property of the mother absolutely in the daughter, Logan Mattie Tooley, and that the second paragraph is ineffectual to change this disposition. They rely upon the rule set forth in section 1322 of the Civil Code. It is as follows:

"A clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or by any other words not equally clear and distinct, or by inference or argument from other parts of the will, or by an inaccurate recital of or reference to its contents in another part of the will."

The argument is that the words of the second paragraph of the will are not as clear and distinct as those of the first paragraph, and, consequently, that they cannot affect the clear and distinct devise and bequest contained in the first paragraph. The basis of this argument is that the word "desire" in the second paragraph is not to be taken as a positive disposition of the property but only as an expression of a wish or preference directed to the devisee Logan Mattie Tooley. We are of the opinion that this position is untenable. The words of a will are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected. The second clause of the will, if taken alone, would constitute a clear disposition of the remainder at the death of the testatrix to her brother and sisters. The rule is practically universal that words in a will indicating the wish of the testator regarding the disposition to be made of her property by the law at her death are to be taken as a dispositive provision. The correct rule is clearly stated in Presbyterian Board, etc. v. Culp, 151 Pa. St. 467, 470, 25 Atl. 118, as follows:

"Where, however, words of recommendation, request and the like are used in direct reference to the estate, they are prima facie testamentary and imperative, and not precatory. [167] Should the testator say merely 'I desire A. B. to have one thousand dollars,' it would be as effectual a legacy as if he were expressly to direct or will it, or were to add 'out of my estate,' or that it should be paid by his executor. The reason is obvious. A will, in its nature, is the disposition which the testator desires to have made of his estate after his death. All the expressions indicative of his wish or will are commands. It is different when, having made a disposition, he expresses a desire that the legatee or devisee should make a certain use of his bounty." In the case of In re Marti, 132 Cal. 671, 61 Pac. 965, 64 Pac. 1071, the court, upon this subject, said: "While the desire of the testator for the disposition of his estate will be construed as a command when addressed to his executor, it will not, when addressed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest which he has given in absolute terms." In the Tooley will the words of the second clause are, in the sense here referred to, "addressed to the executor," and are mandatory.

The respondents here deny that there is either a precatory trust or disposition of the remainder. The Marti case establishes beyond question that there is here no trust. The result would be that the second clause would be wholly ineffectual, which is contrary to the rule of section 1325 (Civ. Code) that a will is to be so interpreted as to give some effect to every clause, rather than so as to render any expression inoperative.

The proposition that words expressing desire or wish, when directed to the estate, and not to some devisee with respect to the property received by such devisee, are to be deemed as dispositive expressions evincing the will of the testator with respect to the property, is thoroughly well established. In the case of In re Wood, 36 Cal. 80, the will began as follows: "I wish five thousand dollars to go to John C. Cole, in the event of my dying intestate." Notwithstanding the use of the word "intestate," the court held that this constituted a will, saying: "It clearly fills the definition of a will given by approved writers on that branch of the law, viz.: 'The declaration of a man's mind as to the manner in which he would have his property or estate disposed of after death.'" To hold otherwise, the court remarked, would be to assert that he went through the solemn form of executing such an instrument for no purpose whatever. The following cases declare that the word "desire," or other similar expression, when used to [168] declare the disposition to be made of property at the death of the testator and not as a request or prayer directed to a devisee or legatee concerning such devise or legacy, is a dispositive command, testamentary in character and not precatory, but a positive direction binding upon the court in the distribution of the estate: Barney v. Hayes, 11 Mont. 571, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495, 29 Pac. 282; McMurry v. Stanley, 69 Tex. 231, 6 S. W. 412; Stewart v. Stewart, 61 N. J. Eq. 28, 47 Atl. 633; Weber v. Bryant, 161 Mass. 403, 37 N. E. 203; Philadelphia's Appeal, 112 Pa. St. 474, 4 Atl. 4; Meehan v. Brennan, 16 App. Div. 395, 45 N. Y. S. 58; Taylor v. Martin (Pa.) 8 Atl. 922; Oyster v. Knull, 137 Pa. St. 448, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890, 20 Atl. 624; Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 111; Wood v. Camden Safe Deposit, etc. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 460, 14 Atl. 885; Phillips v. Phillips, 112 N. Y. 205, 8 Am. St. Rep. 737, 19 N. E. 411.

In view of these authorities it cannot be said that the words of the second paragraph of the will are not equally clear and distinct as those of the first paragraph. We think no case can be found, in which a will indicating a disposition of property by the word "desire" or "wish" has been held not to be sufficient to constitute a will. The meaning of the word, when used in such connection in a will, is as clear as that of any other word in the language.

The decisions upon the question whether or not words of recommendation, entreaty, or desire directed to a devisee or legatee asking or enjoining a disposition of the thing devised or bequeathed, are precatory words sufficient to establish a trust, or are mere expressions leaving the matter to the discretion of the devisee or legatee, have no bearing upon this case. Such questions arise only when the request is made, or from the context is construed to be made, to the devisee or legatee. Where the words are used to describe a disposition of property, that is where they are directed to the executor or to the law and not to a devisee or legatee, the authorities are uniform that the word is sufficient to declare a disposition of the property. The second paragraph of the will is not directed to Logan Mattie Tooley at all, but is a clear statement that, upon her death without husband or children, whatever of her mother's estate then remains is to be divided equally among the sisters and brother of Martha L. Tooley. For these reasons [169] we are of the opinion that the court below erred in making the decree complained of.

The decree of distribution is reversed.

Sloss and Lawlor, JJ., concurred.

Hearing in Bank denied.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (dissenting).—I dissent from the order denying a rehearing.

To my mind it is correctly stated in the petition for rehearing that the theory of the department opinion apparently is that words which may properly be held sufficient to show a primary or direct devise of property, will necessarily be sufficient to qualify or cut down an absolute estate in the same property given in unequivocal language by a preceding provision of the will. Such a theory, I think, finds no support in the authorities. The question is, not whether such words as are used in the second paragraph of the will here involved would be taken as a positive disposition by the testatrix of the property referred to, if they were the only words in the will relative to such property, but whether, considered in connection with the words of the first paragraph referring to the same property and clearly and distinctly devising an absolute estate therein, they show an intent on the part of the testatrix to limit the effect of the disposition made by such paragraph. In the determination of this question, section 1322 of the Civil Code is applicable. I am of the opinion that the judge of the lower court was correct in his conclusion that the words used in the second paragraph with relation to this property are "not equally clear and distinct" as those used in the first paragraph, that, considered in connection with the first paragraph, they fail to show any intention on the part of the testatrix that her daughter should take less than an absolute estate, and that they should be considered as nothing more than the expression of a wish or desire on the part of the testatrix, addressed to her daughter.

NOTE.

The reported case places a construction on the word "desire," as used in the clause of a will, by the first sentence of which a testatrix gave all her property to her daughter, and in the following sentence provided that if at the death of that daughter she had neither husband nor children the testatrix desired any property that might be left should be divided equally among her sisters and brother. It appeared that the daughter survived the testatrix and died without husband or children. The court, saying that the question whether a trust was created under the clause did not enter into the case since that could arise only where the desire was addressed to a devisee or legatee, holds that the word "desire" was a dispositive term passing to the testatrix's sisters and brother title to the remaining property.

For a general discussion of the meaning of the word "desire" as used in a will, see the note to Mastellar v. Atkinson, reported ante, this volume, at page 502.

JUDD AND DETWEILER, INCORPORATED.

v.

GITTINGS ET AL.

District of Columbia Court of Appeals—
March 1, 1915.

48 App. Cas. (D. C.) 304.

Attorneys — Personal Liability for Incidental Expenses — Printing Briefs.

An attorney at law is personally liable for the cost of printing briefs where it appears that in previous similar dealings with the same printers he has habitually paid for the printing on bills rendered to him personally.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Supreme Court of District of Columbia.

Action by Judd and Detweiler Incorporated, plaintiff, against Gittings et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[305] Appellant, Judd & Detweiler, a corporation engaged in the printing business in the city of Washington, brought suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against appellees Gittings & Chamberlin, a law firm in this city, for the recovery of a bill for printing briefs in two cases in which defendants were counsel.

The case was submitted to the court below upon an agreed statement of facts, in which it appeared that about the 8th day of Noember, 1911, defendants ordered from plaintiff fifty briefs for use in a case then pending in the Supreme Court of the United States; that on or about the 27th day of January, 1911, they ordered the same number of briefs printed for use in a case then pending in the supreme court of the state of South Carolina, and that the briefs so ordered were printed and delivered to defendants, with an accompanying bill. The material part of the agreed statement of facts is as follows: "Plaintiffs had done similar printing for defendants for a number of years, and bills were delivered with above mentioned work, made out in the name of Gittings & Chamberlin, as had been the custom. Bills for previous work of a similar nature had always been paid to plaintiff by defendants, plaintiff having no knowledge whether or not there had been previous payments to defendants by any or all of their clients; on the other hand, defendants never paid any of said bills without first receiving payment from the client, of which prior payment by defendants' clients plaintiff had no knowledge. On receipt of manuscript, plaintiff knew that defendants were attorneys for their respective clients, and that the work was ordered by them in no wise different from the manner in which other orders had been given by them to plaintiff, to wit, a telephone order by defendants to call for copy for their brief, and when the brief was printed, delivery of the same to defendants by plaintiff with a bill made out in defendants' name. The account was kept in the name of defendants on plaintiff's books, of which fact the defendants, however, had no knowledge. Defendants [306] did not dispute the bills or liability therefor until suit brought, namely, on the 24th day of June, 1912." On submission of the case to the court below, judgment was entered for defendants, from which this appeal was taken.

John B. Daish and J. Raymond Hoover for appellant.

John C. Gittings and J. Morrill Chamberlin for appellees.

[309] VAN ORSDEL, J. (after stating the facts).—The court below in its opinion attached no importance to the fact that these parties for a long period of time had been conducting transactions similar to the one sued upon, and that it had in all instances been the custom for plaintiff to send its bill to defendants, made out in their name, and for which in each instance it received in payment thereof defendants' check. We think the question of defendants' liability turns largely upon this conceded fact. One set of the briefs was for use in the supreme court of South Carolina. It is inconceivable that plaintiff would have printed and delivered the briefs, if dependent upon the client for payment, without either the money in advance or an assurance that the attorneys would pay the bill. While it is stipulated that no such guaranty was expressly given by defendants, we think there was an implied assurance to that effect arising out of the custom which had been established between the parties in past transactions. In Wires v. Briggs, 5 Vt. 101, 26 Am. Dec. 284, a case in which it was held that an attorney was not liable for the costs of the service of a writ, the rule of implied liability was stated as follows: "It is true that in some cases the law may imply a promise on the part of a lawyer to pay fees for the services of client's writs; as where the officer had been in the constant practice of charging his fees for such services to the lawyer, who from time to time had settled such charges without questioning their legality; from such practice the law may imply a promise to pay for subsequent services."

Unquestionably, it is a settled rule of the common law that [310] where one contracts with the agent of another, and the contracting party is apprised of the agency, the principal, and not the agent, is responsible. In other words, an agent is not generally liable when transacting business for a disclosed principal. It must be conceded in this case that plaintiff had notice on the face of the briefs printed of defendants' agency and the names of their principals. While it is true that an attorney is the agent of his client, the relation between them, we think, is such that it calls for some modification of the general rule which the law recognizes as existing between principal and agent. In ordinary transactions, the agent is subordinate to the principal, the principal standing out as the real actor, and the agent merely as a subordinate representative. But the relation between attorney and client is different. The attorney has complete charge of the litigation, is so recognized by the court, and, as such, dominates in all matters pertaining to the conduct of the litigation. "While in one sense the client is the principal and the attorney the agent, and while the attorney is professionally and constantly acting for clients, whose names from the records of the courts and other means of publicity are almost always known or may be so, yet there are peculiarities in his case which make it necessary to apply to it with some qualification the general principles of agency. In most cases of agency the principal is what the name imports,—the leading person in the transaction. The agent is, as the term implies, a mere subordinate, important only as the representative of the principal; often representing only one principal. An attorney at law, on the other hand, occupies a position of recognized importance in itself, not infrequently of great prominence before the public, in which he often has a large number of clients, his relations to whom are full of detail, and who are little noticed by the public." Heath v. Bates, 49 Conn. 342, 44 Am. Rep. 234. The attorney usually determines what steps are to be taken in his client's interest, and the acts of the attorney in the conduct of litigation are binding upon the client. We therefore deem the just and equitable rule of law thus established to be that, in the absence [311] of express notice to the contrary, court officials and persons connected, either directly or indirectly, with the progress of the litigation, may safely regard themselves as dealing with the attorney, instead of with the client. This applies not only to obligations incurred by the attorney for actual costs attending the litigation, but to the necessary expenses of attorneys, including the printing of briefs, which are not chargeable as costs in the case.

The court below attached great importance to the rules of court as imparting legal notice to plaintiff as to the filing and distribution of briefs in pending cases. Rules of court have the force of statutes to the extent of their operation. They are for the control of officers of the court, including attorneys and litigants, "and are binding upon the court, and upon the suitors and those who represent suitors." District of Columbia v. Roth, 18 App. Cas. (D. C.) 547. It would be extreme, indeed, to hold the rules of the supreme court of South Carolina legal notice to plaintiff of the disposition to be made of the briefs it was printing for the use of defendants. Besides the rules of the court in South Carolina, as in every other jurisdiction, impose the duties relative to the disposition of briefs equally upon the attorney and the litigant. The rules of court, therefore, have little, if any, bearing upon this case.

The judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

I. Introductory.

In the note to Simmons v. Liberal Opinion Limited, 21 Ann. Cas. 876, the personal liability of an attorney for costs is discussed. The present note discusses the personal liability of an attorney for the incidental expenses of an action, not by virtue of such expenses being taxed or being taxable costs, but on the ground that the attorney has rendered himself personally liable by a contract express or implied, in procuring the performance of the services on behalf of his client.

II. Liability on Express Contract.

An attorney in a cause is the agent of his client and like any other agent he may undertake to be liable personally on contracts which he enters into in the furtherance of his client's business. Hence, there is no doubt that an attorney is personally liable for the incidental expenses of an action where he has expressly contracted that he will be personally liable. Evans v. Phillpots, 9 C. & P. 270, 38 E. C. L. 115; Maddox v. Cranch, 4 Har. & McH. (Md.) 343; Cameron Sun v. McAnaw, 72 Mo. App. 196; Dinkel v. Wehle, 63 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 298; Crosby v. Kropf, 33 App. Div. 446, 54 N. Y. S. 76; Daniels v. Hand, 161 N. Y. S. 213; Pessano v. Eyre, 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 157. The foregoing rule has been applied to contracts for the printing of briefs, Cameron Sun v. McAnaw, 72 Mo. App. 196; stenographer's charges, Daniels v. Hand, 161 N. Y. S. 213; the fees of an ordinary witness, Evans v. Phillpots, 9 C. & P. 270, 38 E. C. L. 115; the fees of an expert witness, Pessano v. Eyre, 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 157; the fees of a sheriff, Maddox v. Cranch, 4 Har. & McH. (Md.) 343; and the fees of a referee in a cause, Dinkle v. Wehle, 63 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 298.

The fact that an attorney has rendered services gratuitously for a charitable institution does not affect his personal liability to those whom he has personally promised to compensate for assisting him. Crosby v. Kropf, 33 App. Div. 446, 54 N. Y. S. 78.

III. Liability on Implied Contract.

1. IN GENERAL.

In the reported case it is said obiter: "In the absence of express notice to the contrary, court officials and persons connected, either directly or indirectly, with the progress of the litigation, may safely regard themselves as dealing with the attorney, instead of with the client. This applies not only to obligations incurred by the attorney for actual costs attending the litigation, but to the necessary expenses of attorneys, including the printing of briefs." An examination of the specific illustrations enumerated, infra, will show that, in so far as the fees of public officers are concerned, there is a conflict of authority as to the personal liability of an attorney on implied contract. However, with regard to persons other than public officers, it would seem that the weight of authority is opposed to the dictum in the reported case, and sustains the rule that an attorney is not personally liable on an implied contract for their fees and charges, where the attorney has disclosed his client, has acted within the scope of his authority, express or implied, and is not a party in interest.

2. SHERIFF'S, CONSTABLE'S, BAILIFF'S, MARSHAL'S OR CLERK'S FEES.

a. View that Attorney Is Personally Liable.

It has been held that, in the absence of special circumstances indicating a contrary intention, there is an implied contract that an attorney will be personally responsible for the fees of a sheriff, constable, bailiff, marshal or clerk, on a writ delivered to such an officer, for execution or entry.

The reason for the foregoing rule was stated in Tilton v. Wright, 74 Me. 214, as follows: "Writs are usually handed to the sheriff for service and to the clerk of courts for entry, by the attorney by whom they were made. The attorney has a lien on the judgment recovered, for his fees and disbursements included in the taxable bill of costs, which embraces both the service of the writ and the entry of the action. The attorney having such lien hands the writ for service to the sheriff or to the clerk for entry. Neither the one nor the other is obliged to perform the services required, without a prepayment of their respective fees. The sheriff serving, and the clerk entering the action without prepayment, a promise on the part of the attorney to pay each their respective dues, may be reasonably inferred, unless notice to the contrary be seasonably given. Accordingly, it has been repeatedly held that the attorney is responsible to the sheriff and the clerk for the fees of writs handed by him to the one for service, and to the other for entry."

In Tarbell v. Dickinson, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 345, it was held that while an attorney is personally liable for the fees of a sheriff, his liability is similar to that of a guarantor, and as such he should be informed as to the extent of his liability. The court said: "Though the attorney makes himself originally liable for expenses, yet his liability is not on his own account, or for his own benefit, but in behalf and on account of his client. He stands somewhat in the situation of a guarantor, and should know the extent of his liability, in order that he may look to his principal for indemnity. The officer being requested to make return of his doings, the attorney may reasonably expect to be informed of what the officer has done, and for which he has claims, without going to him personally and particularly to inquire. Where there are constantly increasing expenses, it is most reasonable and important, that the attorney should have notice of them, in order that he may determine whether or not he will continue to be liable; and that he may have opportunity to obtain indemnity from his client."

In New York the leading case of Adams v. Hopkins, 5 Johns. 252 (decided in 1810) held that an attorney was by implied contract personally liable to a sheriff for his fees. However, the doctrine of Adams v. Hopkins, has been limited strictly to the fees of public officers. Tyrrel v. Hammerstein, 33 Misc. 505, 67 N. Y. S. 717. And the courts have refused to extend it to analogous cases. Judson v. Gray, 11 N. Y. 412. In that case, the court said: "It is clear, therefore, that the decisions in this state, in which attorneys and solicitors have been held liable for the fees of the officers of the court, upon a promise implied from their acts done as attorneys merely, are in conflict with principle, and with the whole current of authorities elsewhere on the subject. In all such cases, it is a sound and salutary rule, that while the court, for the mere sake of restoring the harmony and symmetry of the law, will not interfere to overthrow a doctrine which has, through a series of decisions, come to be universally regarded as fixed and settled, they will, nevertheless, circumscribe the anomaly within as narrow limits as possible. It is never admissible to extend such a rule, by a resort to analogy; for the obvious reason, that every new case, to which the erroneous rule is applied, affords the basis of a still wider departure from principle."

b. View that Attorney Is Not Personally Liable.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that, in the absence of special circumstances indicating a contrary intention, there is no implied contract that an attorney will be personally responsible for the fees of a sheriff, constable, bailiff, marshal, or clerk on a writ delivered to such an officer of execution or entry. Royle v. Busby, 6 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 171, 50 L. J. Q. B. 196, 43 L. T. N. S. 717, 29 W. R. 315; Mayberry v. Mansfield, 9 Q. B. 754, 58 E. C. L. 754; Preston v. Preston, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 292; Moore v. Porter, 13 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 100. Compare Foster v. Blakelock, 5 B. & C. 328, 11 E. C. L. 246, 108 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 122; Walbank v. Quarterman, 3 C. B. 94, 54 E. C. L. 94, 136 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 38; Breuer v. Jones, 10 Exch. (Eng.) 655, 1 Jur. N. S. 240.

In Preston v. Preston, supra, the court said: "In conducting the suit, so far as third persons are concerned, the attorney is simply the agent of his client. The rule of law is well settled that an agent does not become personally liable, unless his principal is unknown, or there is no responsible principal, or the agent exceeds his powers, or becomes liable by an undertaking in his own name. From the very nature of the business done by the clerk of the court in the progress of a suit, he has before him a knowledge of the principal for whom the attorney acts, and that the latter acts only in his capacity of attorney. The statute fixes the amount to be paid to the clerk for the services required of him. He may refuse to perform any of those services until he receives his pay, or a personal promise by the attorney to pay him. If, however, the clerk performs the services without requiring immediate payment, or a personal undertaking by the attorney to pay him, the credit must be understood to be given to the client, and not to the attorney." See also Royle v. Busby, 6 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 171, 50 L. J. Q. B. 196, 43 L. T. N. S. 717, 29 W. R. 315, wherein the court said: "This appeal raises the question whether a sheriff's officer can maintain an action for his fees and possession money against the solicitor of an execution creditor, where the solicitor has done nothing more than deliver a writ of fieri facias to the sheriff for execution? It is not contended that the law, apart from contract (express or implied), casts any such liability upon the solicitor. The sheriff is an officer of the law, with subordinate officers of his own appointment, for whose acts and defaults he is responsible. He and his officers are, by statute, entitled to certain fees, but the statute does not say that the solicitor of the execution creditor is to pay them: and, whatever the remedy for them may be, when the proceeds of an execution are insufficient, there is no reasonable ground on which it can be implied that the solicitor, who, in the proper and ordinary course of his duty to his client, simply delivers a writ to the sheriff for execution, thereby enters into a personal contract to pay such fees. It was held, in several cases which preceded Brewer v. Jones, 10 Exch. 655, that a request by the solicitor that a particular bailiff might be employed to execute the writ was evidence of a contract by him to pay that bailiff's fees and possession money; and in one of those cases, Foster v. Blakelock, 5 B. & C. 328 [11 E. C. L. 246], the distinction was expressly pointed out by Mr. Justice Bayley between such a state of circumstances and that which exists where the solicitor merely delivers the writ for execution to the sheriff. Mayberry v. Mansfield, 9 Q. B. 754 [58 E. C. L. 754] and Seal v. Hudson, 4 D. & L. 760 (Eng.), were cases in which there was in fact nothing more than the delivery of the writ to the sheriff, and in both those cases it was held that there was no evidence of any contract, and that the solicitor was not liable. In Brewer v. Jones, 10 Exch. 655, the Court of Exchequer arrived at an opposite conclusion, upon the authority (as it considered) of Walbank v. Quarterman, 3 C. B. 94 [54 E. C. L. 94], and it is remarkable that the judges who pronounced that decision themselves regarded it as at variance with sound principle, and only justified it by that (supposed) precedent. Walbank v. Quarterman, 3 C. B. 94 [54 E. C. L. 94], however, was decided upon the authority of Foster v. Blakelock, 5 B. & C. 328 [11 E. C. L. 246], in which the distinction already noticed was pointed out, and it was determined upon a state of facts similar to that which existed in Foster v. Blakelock, 5 B. & C. 328 [11 E. C. L. 246]. It is therefore no precedent at all for Brewer v. Jones, 10 Exch. 655, which thus stands self-condemned as against sound principle, and is opposed to the judgment of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and of equal authority, in Maybery v. Mansfield, 9 Q. B. 754 [58 E. C. L. 754]. We have no hesitation in following Maybery v. Mansfield, 9 Q. B. 754 [58 E. C. L. 754], in preference to Brewer v. Jones, 10 Exch. 655."

A statute of New Hampshire (Laws 1899, ch. 20, § 1; Pub. Stat. 1901, p. 686) expressly provides that "no attorney shall hereafter be personally liable to any sheriff or other officer authorized to serve process for his fees or expenses incurred in the service of any writ or other process placed in his hands for service, except upon an express contract to pay the fees and expenses thereon." Prior to the enactment of that statute, the rule in New Hampshire was that an attorney was personally liable to a sheriff to whom he delivered a writ for service. Eastman v. Coos Bank, 1 N. H. 23; Towle v. Hatch, 43 N. H. 270; Joyce v. Morgan, 66 N. H. 487, 23 Atl. 78.

a. Where Attorney Has Collected Fees.

It has been held that an attorney is personally liable to a sheriff for his fee where he has collected the sheriff's fee after it has been taxed in favor of the attorney's client. Knott v. Kirby, 10 S. D. 30, 71 N. W. 138.

d. Effect of Custom.

In Iowa and Vermont, while it is said that no liability on the part of an attorney for the fees of court officers arises from the relation itself, it has been held that the personal liability of an attorney for the incidental expenses of an action may be fixed by custom. Doughty v. Paige, 48 Ia. 483. See also Wires v. Briggs, 5 Vt. 101, 26 Am. Dec. 284; Russell v. Ferguson, 77 Vt. 433, 60 Atl. 802. Thus in the case last cited, the court said: "Whatever the rule may be in other jurisdictions, it has long been the settled law of this state that an attorney is not, by virtue of that relation alone, liable for fees accruing in suits brought by him.

. . . But attorneys may by custom become responsible for fees of this kind, if the custom is of the requisite character, for it is simply the case of an agent becoming personally liable on contracts made for his principal." The foregoing rule has been held to be applicable to court fees, Russell v. Ferguson, supra; and sheriffs' fees, Doughty v. Paige, supra. In passing on the requisites necessary, in order that a custom may fix a personal liability on attorneys for sheriffs' fees, the court in Doughty v. Paige, supra, said: "Plaintiff claims that, aside from the custom on the part of the Pottawattamie county attorneys to agree to become responsible for sheriffs' fees, there was a custom of paying sheriffs independent of an express agreement, and that the evidence so shows. It is urged, therefore, that the defendant's acts in employing him, interpreted in the light of such custom, raised an implied contract to pay him. Before we could hold that the defendant's acts had that effect, it should be made to appear to us, at least, that the attorneys were accustomed to pay, not only in the absence of an express agreement, but regardless of the responsibility of their clients, and whether they had money in their hands or not, belonging to their clients, and that such practice was uniform and of long standing."

In the reported case a personal liability on the part of an attorney for the cost of printing briefs is held to arise by virtue of a custom, it being, however, intimated in that case that irrespective of custom such a liability exists.

3. WITNESSES' FEES AND EXPENSES.

An attorney is not personally liable for the fees and expenses of witnesses summoned in behalf of his client, in the absence of facts showing an express undertaking to be so bound. Robins v. Bridge, 3 M. & W. (Eng.) 114, 6 Dowl. 140, M. & H. 357; Sargeant v. Pettibone, 1 Aikens (Vt.) 355. Thus in the case last cited, the court said: "An attorney is not, of course, liable to pay witnesses in his client's suits. They may refuse to attend till their fees are paid, or some person whom they will trust becomes personally holden. And, if the attorney thus undertakes, he will be holden." And see Robins v. Bridge, supra, wherein the court said: "The question in this case is, whether an attorney, who has caused a witness to be subpoenaed, without any express contract, and without any circumstances from which a special contract can be inferred, is liable to be sued by the witness for his expenses at the trial. The importance of the question induced the court to take some time for consideration, as no instance has yet occurred of any decision in banc, as far as we are informed, though there was a case of a somewhat similar complexion to this tried before my Brother Parke, who nonsuited the plaintiff, at Guildhall, but it was never brought before the court. . . . This is the first case in which the question has arisen, whether there is an implied contract to pay the expenses of a witness, by the attorney or agent by whom he has been subpoenaed. It is sufficient for the decision in this case to say that there is no implied contract by the attorney to pay the witness. The attorney is known merely as the agent—the attorney of the principal, and is directed by the principal himself. The agent, acting for and on the part of the principal, does not bind himself, unless he offers to do so by express words."

As in the case of ordinary witnesses, an attorney is not personally liable for the fees of expert witnesses summoned on behalf of his client unless the attorney expressly assumes personal liability. Lee v. Everest, 2 H. & N. (Eng.) 285. See also Pessano v. Eyre, 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 157. In Ross v. Niles, 84 N. Y. S. 142, an attorney was held personally liable for the fees of an expert witness on the ground that the attorney had not disclosed his client and, in addition, the facts indicated that the attorney was a party in interest. And see Pessano v. Eyre, supra.

It has been held that an attorney in a cause, who attends at a coffee house with witnesses summoned on behalf of his client, is personally liable for refreshments furnished them. Fendall v. Noakes, 3 Jur. (Eng.) 726, 7 Scott 647.

4. REFEREE'S FEES.

It has been held that, in the absence of an express contract, an attorney is not personally liable for the fees of a referee appointed by the court. Howell v. Kinney, 1 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 105; Judson v. Gray, 11 N. Y. 408.

5. COMMISSIONER'S FEES.

It would seem that a solicitor is not personally liable for commissioner's fees. Lamoureux v. Morris, 4 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 244, wherein the court said: "This court has held that the attorney is liable for sheriff's fees, upon the ground that the sheriff is obliged to serve process. (1 Caines 192; 5 Johns 255, 368; 4 Wend. 474.) A different rule prevails in Vermont (1 Vt. 101), but I believe in this state it has never been decided that the attorney was liable for witnesses', referee's or commissioner's fees. In Howell v. Kinney, 1 How. Pr. 105, it was decided that the attorney was not liable for referee's fees. I think the petitioner could not have recovered if he had brought an action against the solicitor."

6. EXAMINER'S FEES.

In Watertown v. Cowen, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 510, it was held that a solicitor was personally liable for the fees of an examiner for taking the testimony of witnesses on behalf of the solicitor's client. The court said: "It appears to have been the uniform practice in this state for the sheriffs, clerks, masters, registers and other officers of the several courts of record, to charge their fees to the attorney or solicitor of the party for whose benefit the services are performed; and there are no good reasons for distinguishing the case of an examiner from that of any other officer of the court, in this respect. From the uniform practice on this subject, there is an implied assumpsit by the attorney or solicitor, to pay for the services done for his client in the cause, by his express or implied request. And where the solicitor for a party notices the taking of the testimony of witnesses before an examiner, or attends or procures the cross-examination of the witnesses of the adverse party, there is an implied assumpsit on the part of the solicitor to pay the fees of the examiner for taking such testimony on behalf of the client."

7. ASSOCIATE COUNSEL'S FEE.

It has been held that an attorney could not recover from his client the fee of an associate counsel whom the attorney employed without authority from his client. Meany v. Rosenberg, 32 Misc. 96, 65 N. Y. S. 497, wherein the court said: "An attorney's employment is undoubtedly one of personal trust and confidence requiring his personal services, and he has no implied authority to retain associate counsel or to employ a substitute to act in his place, unless such conduct has been assented to by his client, with full knowledge of the facts. . . . Under the record before us, plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to recover for the services performed by the witness Brown."

8. NOTARIAL FEES.

Where an attorney employed another to prepare a notarial certificate, without disclosing that the work was being done for a client, it was held that the attorney was personally liable on the contract. Dulon v. Camp, 28 Misc. 548, 59 N. Y. S. 508.

9. STENOGRAPHER'S FEES.

It has been held that an attorney is not personally liable for the services of a court stenographer in the absence of facts showing a special agreement. Bonynge v. Waterbury, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 534; Sheridan v. Genet, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 660; Bonynge v. Field, 81 N. Y. 159. Thus in Sheridan v. Genet, supra, the court said: "The defendant was sued to recover compensation for a copy of the testimony given in the case of Hazewell v. Cousin, on the trial of which the defendant acted as the counsel of Hazewell. The stenographer knew that he so acted, having been present at the trial. The defendant, however, ordered the copy to be made and it was done at his request. The stenographer then knew that the defendant was the counsel for Hazewell. He had been advised of that on the trial. It was not to be supposed that he had any personal interest in the copy in the absence of proof to the contrary. What was said, therefore, in the case of Bonynge v. Waterbury, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 534, recently decided by this court, is applicable, namely: 'The defendant was an agent for a known principal, and ordinarily would not incur a personal liability, simply by requesting a performance of such a service for his client. Of course he could bind himself personally, and that would be the result when it followed from the nature of the agreement made, and the intention of the parties. But without something more than the mere performance of his duties as counsel for his client, such a liability would not be created unless it might be for the fees of clerk, sheriff and other similar officers,' and the same rule should be applied in this case which was declared in that case, namely, that the counsel ordering such services will not be responsible, unless he intended to become personally bound to pay, a fact to be determined by the jury upon the trial."

However, in Bloomfield v. Nevett, 24 Colo. App. 91, 131 Pac. 801, it was held that an attorney was personally liable to a court stenographer where the stenographer had been employed by the attorney without authority from his client.

10. EXPERT ACCOUNTANT'S FEES.

It has been held that attorneys are not personally liable for the services of an experienced bookkeeper whom they employ to examine books of a partnership, where the bookkeeper knows he is being employed for the attorneys' client. Covell v. Hart, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 252. On the other hand, an attorney has been held to be personally liable to an expert accountant whom he employed without disclosing his client. Good v. Rumsey, 50 App. Div. 280, 63 N. Y. S. 981

11. EXPENSE OF ADVERTISING.

In Gray v. Journal of Finance Pub. Co. 2 Misc. 260, 21 N. Y. S. 967, wherein it appeared that an attorney personally entered into a contract for the publication of a legal citation in connection with the probate of a will, paid the cost of publication and took a receipt in his own name, and the publishers knew no one in the transaction except the attorney, it was held that the attorney was acting as a principal or at least the agent of an undisclosed principal and hence might sue in his own name for breach of the contract.

12. EXPENSE OF PRINTING BRIEFS, ARGUMENT, ETC.

In the reported case it is held that the attorneys in a cause are personally liable for the cost of printing briefs ordered by them, when it has been the custom of the attorneys for a long time personally to pay the printer for similar services. And in Trimmier v. Thomson, 41 S. C. 125, 19 S. E. 291, it was held that attorneys are personally liable for the cost of printing briefs unless they expressly contract to the contrary. In that case the court said: "It may be remarked, in the beginning, that the action involves the liability of an attorney, who procures a printer to print briefs and arguments in causes of his respective clients, to answer himself for the debt thereby contracted. In other words, does the printer, in such a case, look for payment to the attorney or to the attorney's clients, for whom the printing is done? All this, it seems to us, must depend upon the contract. If Thomson, as an attorney at law, contracted with Trimmier to print his clients' briefs and arguments, unless in such contract he stipulated that he was having such work done as the agent of his clients as his principals, he will be liable to pay for such work. It is true, an attorney at law is the agent of his client, but only in the sphere of his agency in the transaction of his clients' law business. Such an attorney has no power, as such attorney, to bind his principal except within the sphere of his special agency. If he acts beyond such sphere, he must have special authority, and to make his acts, as such special agent, binding on third parties, they must have notice of such special power. When Mr. Thomson, as an attorney, contracted with Mr. Trimmier for this printing he was bound in law, either to have contracted for himself or for another. The legal result is, that such a contract is his, until he makes the contrary appear. To hold otherwise would require that courts should hold clients responsible for any contracts made by their attorneys, whether such clients authorized such contracts, or not. These wholesome truths had better be observed in the conduct of lawyers with their clients, and by third parties as well."

However, there is authority to the effect that it is within the scope of the implied authority of an attorney to have abstracts and briefs printed at the cost of his client. George Hornstein Co. v. Crandall, 156 Ill. App. 520; Sanders v. Riddick, 127 Tenn. 701, 156 S. W. 464. And it has also been held that the fact that the printing is charged to the attorney is by no means conclusive on the question whether the credit is given to the attorney or to his client. George Hornstein Co. v. Crandall, supra. The manuscript has been held to be sufficient notice that the attorney is acting as agent for his client. Livingston Middleditch Co. v. New York College of Dentistry, 31 Misc. 259, 64 N. Y. S. 140; Argus Co. v. Hotchkiss, 121 App. Div. 378, 107 N. Y. S. 138. And in New York and Tennessee, it has been directly held that in the absence of circumstances showing a contrary intention, an attorney is not personally liable for the cost of printing briefs, arguments, etc. Livingston Middleditch Co. v. New York College of Dentistry, 31 Misc. 259, 64 N. Y. S. 140; Tyrnel v. Hammerstein, 33 Misc. 505, 67 N. Y. S. 717, 8 N. Y. Ann. Cas. 432; Sanders v. Riddick, 27 Tenn. 701, 156 S. W. 464. Thus in the case last cited, the court said: "The next ground of complaint by Sanders is that the expense of printing the briefs of his attorneys should have been borne by them, and not by himself. We concur with the chancellor in his view that the expenses of a lawsuit are the expenses of the client, and that, where the service of a third person is needed to the better conduct of the cause, such as a stenographer or a printer, that service, when called into requisition, is prima facie at the expense of the client. Referring to such services, it was said in Bonyng v. Field, 81 N. Y. 159, that 'attorneys cannot be held personally responsible for services of this kind rendered in a suit, unless there is a special obligation to that effect.' No such special undertaking is claimed to have existed in the case under review. Attorneys have implied power to cause briefs to be printed at the cost of their client." And in Argus Co. v. Hotchkiss, 121 App. Div. 378, 107 N. Y. S. 138, it was said: "It was recognized upon the trial of the action and it is undoubted law that an attorney's negotiation for work to be done in a law suit is the act of an agent for a known principal and for the expense of that service the agent does not become personally responsible. . . . Whether or not at the time of the making of the contract for the printing of the case defendant Hotchkiss revealed to Mr.

Speer the nature of the case and the nature of his interest therein, when the case was sent to the printer it was a fair notice that the action was one for divorce, a purely personal action in which the defendants could only be interested as attorneys or counsel. It was not a case involving property rights in which the defendants might have a property interest which would make probable their entering into a personal obligation for the payment of these fees. Mr. Speer must have known as all lawyers know that in this class of cases usually the husband provides for the expenses of the litigation on behalf of the wife. In case of failure by the husband to pay the same neither the attorney nor the counsel of the wife incurs any personal liability for the expenses of a law suit unless by special contract. The question is not only what in fact Mr. Speer understood from the conversation with Mr. Hotchkiss, but what inferences he had the natural right to draw therefrom, considering the fact as it appeared to him when the copy was furnished him that the action in which the papers were to be printed was purely a personal action between third parties for divorce. The mere procurement of the printing of a case by counsel certainly does not create personal liability. Nor can the statement by Hotchkiss of a personal interest that the work be done cheaply be construed to be a special promise to pay a debt for which he would not otherwise be liable."

13. EXPENSE OF TAKING PHOTOGRAPHS.

It has been held that prima facie the client and not the solicitor is liable for the price of photographs taken at the direction of the solicitor for use in the trial of his client for manslaughter. Wakefield v. Duckworth [1915] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 218, 84 L. J. K. B. 335, 112 L. T. N. S. 130, 59 S. J. 91, 31 Times L. Rep. 40, wherein the court said: "I am of opinion that the decision of the county court judge was right. The plaintiff is a photographer, and a member of the defendants' firm went to him and asked him to supply some photographs for the purposes of a trial in which the defendants were acting on behalf of a client. There is no question that the plaintiff knew that the defendants were solicitors acting on behalf of a client, and that being so, apart from any other considerations, they were agents acting on behalf of a principal. Prima facie in such a contract the plaintiff would have to have recourse to the principal and not the agent."

In the foregoing case it was, however, intimated that had the solicitor acted without authority he would have been liable personally.

WHITE ET AL.

v.

STATE EX REL. HUFF ET AL.

Indiana Supreme Court—October 29, 1915.

183 Ind. 649; 109 N. E. 905.

Intoxicating Liquors — Liquor Dealer's Bond — Transfer of License — Liability of Surety on Transferor's Bond.

Under Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 8323o (Laws 1911, c. 119, § 12), providing that if, upon hearing of a petition for transfer of a liquor license, the commissioners approve the application for a license, it shall grant the holder permission to sell and the applicant permission to purchase, and upon filing of a bond by such purchaser, with the approval of the county auditor, the board shall issue to the purchaser of the license a certified copy of the order of transfer, where, on transfer of a license, the transferee files no bond, but, the surety on his transferor's bond having assented to the substitution, such surety's assent to the change is filed with the approval of the commissioners, the old bond meets the requirements of the statute and binds the surety.

Same.

In such case both transferee and surety are bound to discharge the statutory conditions of the bond, under Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 1278, providing that no bond shall be void for want of form or substance or recital or condition, nor the principal or surety be discharged, but shall be bound to the full extent contemplated by the law requiring the same.

Civil Damage Act — Complaint Sufficient.

Where, in an action against a liquor dealer for a death caused by intoxication, the complaint alleged that the intoxication incapacitated the decedent to manage his horses properly, that because of such incapacity they became unmanageable, and that, while decedent was intoxicated and the team in such state, he leaned out over the dashboard, and one of the horses, irritated by his acts, kicked him on the head and face, inflicting injuries from which he died, such complaint sufficiently avers connection between decedent's intoxication and his injury.

Appeal and Error — Questions Reviewed — Refusal to Direct Verdict — Necessity of Motion for New Trial.

The refusal of the trial court to direct verdict by peremptory instruction cannot be made the basis for an independent assignment of error on appeal; such action must be presented to the trial court as cause for new trial, and the court's refusal to grant it assigned as error.

Briefs — Failure to Argue Question as Waiver.

Where the part of appellant's brief devoted to propositions and authorities made no specific reference to any instruction given or refused or to any testimony admitted, such causes for new trial are waived under Rule 22, cl. 5 (55 N. E. vi), providing that the brief of appellant shall fully present every error and exception relied on.

Civil Damage Act — Liability for Death from Intoxication.

In an action against a liquor dealer for a death caused by intoxication, evidence considered and held to warrant finding that defendant sold liquors to decedent while the latter was intoxicated.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action against a liquor dealer for a death caused by intoxication, evidence considered and held to justify finding that decedent's intoxication was the cause of his physical disability and death.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Posey county: CLEMENTS, Judge.

Action by State, on the relation of Ida Huff et al., plaintiffs, against James White et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Transferred from Appellate Court. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

William Espenschied, George Wm. Curtis and George C. Taylor for appellants.

G. V. Menzies for appellees.

[651] Cox, J.—This appeal is from a judgment recovered by appellees, the widow and children of Lewis E. Huff, deceased, in an action on a retail liquor dealer's bond to recover statutory damages for loss of support through his death. § 8355 Burns 1908, § 5323 R. S. 1881; § 8323 Burns 1914, Acts 1911, p. 363, § 8. The first error assigned by appellants is that the trial court erred in overruling their demurrers to the complaint. The complaint was in one paragraph and alleged: "That relators are the widow and only surviving children of one Lewis E. Huff, deceased; that said relators were entirely dependent for their support and maintenance upon said Lewis E. Huff, who died on March 13, 1912, as a result of the grievance herein-after alleged; that on April 3, 1911, one Alfred Spillman made application for, and was granted, a license by the board of commissioners of Posey County, Indiana, to sell intoxicating liquors at the town of New Harmony, Indiana, and executed his bond in the penal sum of $3,500 with the defendant, The Bankers Surety Company of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, as surety thereon, conditioned that said Spillman, among other things would pay all civil damages growing out of unlawful sales of intoxicating liquors, or other unlawful conduct on the part of said Spillman, which bond was filed with the auditor of Posey County, Indiana, and a copy thereof is attached to the complaint [652] and marked exhibit A; that, on October 2, 1911, Spillman made application and request to the board of county commissioners of Posey County, Indiana, and was granted the right by said board to transfer said license to the defendant James White, and that White accepted said sale and transfer and entered into business as a saloon keeper upon the same terms and conditions mentioned in said license to Spillman, in the same premises in New Harmony, Indiana; that on the sale and transfer of said license the defendant, The Bankers Surety Company of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, filed its written consent with said board of commissioners to said sale and transfer and its covenants with said board to be bound thereon, as obligor to said White, in all things the same as it had theretofore been bound for said Spillman, and that said covenant is filed with said complaint and marked exhibit B; that this covenant was approved by the auditor of Posey County, which approval is filed with the complaint and marked exhibit C; and that thereupon White commenced to sell intoxicating liquors and keep a saloon under and by virtue of said license. That Huff, on March 13, 1912, was a farmer about 42 years old living on a public highway four miles south of New Harmony and was a strong, healthy and industrious man who earned a good support and maintenance for the relatives who were at that time entirely dependent upon the decedent for their support and maintenance; that Huff, on the afternoon of March 13, 1912, while sober drove a road wagon, with a gentle team of horses attached thereto, from his home over the highway to New Harmony, that he arrived at New Harmony and visited the saloon of defendant, White; that on the said thirteenth day of March, 1912, the defendant White or his barkeeper and agent, unlawfully sold or gave decedent intoxicating liquor when decedent was in a state of intoxication, which was known to White, his barkeeper or agent; that by reason of and as a result of the intoxication of decedent, caused as aforesaid by the unlawful selling or giving [653] to decedent, intoxicating liquors by White or his agent, the defendant became incapacitated for managing and driving his team of horses, and, as a result of said intoxication, when driving his team of horses decedent was liable to receive fatal injuries, that the decedent when intoxicated started, after dark, on March 13, 1912, to drive said team of horses, attached to said wagon, from New Harmony over said public highway to his home. That as a result of and caused by said intoxication, the decedent was incapacitated from properly managing, controlling or driving said team of horses; that said team of horses, on account of and caused by decedent's incapacity to properly drive and control them became irritable, fractious and unmanageable by decedent; that the decedent when intoxicated leaned over the dashboard of said wagon and as he leaned over said dashboard, said team, or one horse thereof, was irritated and made fractious and unmanageable by the acts of decedent, when so intoxicated, to such an extent that the horse kicked decedent on the head and face, causing him fatal injuries and as a result of his injuries decedent died and was found dead the next morning in said wagon near his home. That the death of decedent was caused by the unlawful selling or giving to him by defendant, White, or his agent, of intoxicating liquors as aforesaid. That by reason of the premises relatives have been injured in their means of support in the sum of $3,500 for which sum they demand judgment."

Exhibit "A" was the usual form of bond provided by law for liquor dealers and originally executed by Alfred Spillman and The Bankers Surety Company as surety. Exhibit "B" shows by endorsement on the original Spillman bond that on October 2, 1911, the interest of Spillman was assigned to appellant White, subject to the consent of The Bankers Surety Company, and this was signed by Alfred Spillman and thereafter there appears endorsed on said bond the consent of The Bankers Surety Company that the bond be assigned to White, subject to all its terms and conditions. [654] This was signed by The Bankers Surety Company by Edwin Wade, its attorney in fact. Exhibit "C" was the approval of the auditor of Posey County to such assignment and consent and the order of the board of commissioners thereon.

In behalf of appellant surety company it is claimed that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against it for the reason that the law which permits the transfer of a retail liquor dealer's license, by its terms, requires that the transferee, before he can secure approval of the transfer and rights thereunder shall give a new bond. § 8323c Burns 1914, Acts 1911, p. 254, § 12. And it is contended that the bond counted upon by complaint is not such a bond and hence does not impose any liability upon appellant surety company. The statute in case a license is transferred requires the "filing of a bond by such purchaser . . . with the same penalties and upon the same conditions as is required of applicants for licenses." There is no doubt that the bond in question meets all of the requirements of the statute as fully as if an entirely new instrument had been executed by appellants. Even if a new bond were intended by the statute the assignment of the old bond, as made, amounts to a new agreement on the part of appellant surety company to become the guarantor of White in his undertaking legally to conduct a licensed saloon, such agreement being in an instrument with the "same penalties and upon the same conditions" as the bond of the transferer of the license. It was in no respect the same undertaking as that which was the guaranty of the conduct of Spillman, the original licensee. In any event, § 1278 Burns 1914, § 1221 R. S. 1881 would require us to hold appellants bound to discharge the statutory conditions of the bond in the circumstances averred, for it has often been held that the force and effect of this section is to cure defects and supply omissions in such bonds, whether the defects and omissions be of form or substance, and to hold the obligors, both principals [655] and sureties to the full extent of the law requiring the bond. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Poetker (1913) 180 Ind. 255, 102 N. E. 372, and cases there cited.

There is further contention by both appellants that the complaint fails to allege that the death of Huff was the result of his intoxication and for that reason that the demurrers of both should have been sustained. The averments of the complaint charge in sufficient terms that the intoxication incapacitated decedent to manage his horses properly; that because of his incapacity to control and direct them the horses became irritable, fractious and unmanageable; that while decedent was so intoxicated and while the team was in this state, he leaned out over the dashboard and as he did so one of the horses irritated and made fractious by his acts kicked him on the head and face, inflicting injuries from which he died. The connection between Huff's intoxication and his injury is sufficiently averred. Homire v. Halfman (1901) 156 Ind. 470, 60 N. E. 154.

Refusal of the trial court to direct a verdict for appellants by peremptory instruction is assigned as error. This cannot be made the basis for an independent assignment of error on appeal. Such action must be presented to the trial court as a cause for a new trial and the court's refusal to grant such new trial assigned for error to be available. Bane v. Keefer (1899) 152 Ind. 544, 53 N. E. 834; U. S. Health, etc. Ins. Co. v. Batt (1912) 49 Ind. App. 277, 97 N. E. 195; Deeter v. Burk (1915) 59 Ind. App. 449, 107 N. E. 304.

A joint motion for a new trial filed by appellants was overruled and this ruling is assigned as error. The motion was based on the alleged insufficiency of the evidence in fact and law to sustain the verdict, on the giving of certain instructions and the refusal to give others and on the admission of certain testimony alleged to have been incompetent. No specific reference is made in that [656] part of appellant's brief devoted to propositions or points and authorities to any instruction either given or refused nor to any testimony admitted. These causes for a new trial are, therefore, under the rules waived. Clause 5, Rule 22; Kaufman v. Alexander (1913) 180 Ind. 670, 103 N. E. 481; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Dinius (1913) 180 Ind. 596, 103 N. E. 652; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Finkelstein (1915) 58 Ind. App. 27, 107 N. E. 557.

This leaves for consideration only the question whether there was error in overruling the motion for a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. We understand that appellants claim that the evidence fails in two particulars. The first is that there was no evidence to show that appellant White or his agent or servant "unlawfully sold or gave intoxicating liquor" to Huff at the time when he was intoxicated; and the second that there was none to prove that Huff was intoxicated at the time of his death or that his death was the result of his intoxication. A review of the evidence shows the following as to these contentions: Huff was sober when he came to town on the afternoon of his death; he was a quiet, inoffensive man when sober; he was in and about appellant White's place from before 5 p. m. to about 9 p. m.; he drank some in White's saloon during the afternoon; while there he got into a very boisterous and threatening argument which was so serious as to cause his expulsion from the saloon; he bought liquor at other saloons during the afternoon; he was boisterous and noisy on the streets and in front of White's saloon during the afternoon and evening; two witnesses testify that he was drunk at or near 5 p. m. at which time he was in and about White's place; one witness, on cross-examination, admitted that he was "kinda drunk" when he saw him at 5 p. m. near White's; another witness testified Huff drank a glass of beer in White's saloon sometime between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon. In the face of this evidence it cannot be said that there was no evidence [657] from which the jury might reasonably find that appellant White sold intoxicating liquors to decedent while decedent was intoxicated. It was warranted in finding it from his conduct within and without the saloon, and from the direct testimony of competent witnesses. 23 Cyc. 325, § d, and cases there cited.

On the questions of his continuing drunkenness and the cause of his death the following appears: Huff was found the following morning lying on his back in his wagon, his feet bent back underneath him and his knees up against the dashboard, as if he had been sitting on his knees. His face was mashed, his teeth knocked in, and his nose broken. No other wounds were seen. He was cold and stiff. Underneath him was an open, half-emptied flask of whiskey. There was some horse hair on the right hand side of the dashboard the same shade as that on the right hand horse's leg, where some had been freshly knocked off just above the hoof. Huff's cap was found in the ditch some distance from where his body was found. The horses had not kept the road all the way; in some places the track waved about. Where the cap lay there were tracks which impressed the witness as having been made by a sudden forward motion of the right hand horse; as if he had "perted up and stepped further than the other." A witness testified, "and the tracks seemed like something had hit him and scared him;" this of the right hand horse. Huff had been a successful and careful farmer. From these facts it cannot be said that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment. Huff was a good farmer with years of experience in managing horses. The circumstances including the character of his driving on the night of his death were ample evidence of his physical incapacity to handle the team in his accustomed manner. Having found that he was drunk shortly before he left town and that he carried with him a flask of whiskey which had been partly emptied the jury might well [658] conclude that the cause of his physical disability and the cause of his death was his intoxication.

No harmful error is shown and the judgment is affirmed.

I. Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to review the more recent cases concerned with the question of damages for death by intoxication. Earlier cases are reviewed and collated in the notes to Stafford v. Levinger, 1 Ann. Cas. 132, and Mastad v. Swedish Brethren, 85 Am. St. Rep. 446. The present note excludes, however, consideration of cases involving the liability for death by the criminal act of an intoxicated person, those cases having been fully treated in the note to Waller v. Collinsworth, Ann. Cas. 1913A 510.

II. In Absence of Civil Damage Act.

In the absence of a statute imposing liability for death caused by intoxication, a liquor dealer can be held liable for the death by intoxication of one to whom he furnishes liquor only where he is guilty of actionable negligence in selling the liquor, and that negligence is the proximate cause of the death. Bolen v. Still, 123 Ark. 308, 185 S. W. 811.

It has been held that, in the absence of a statutory right of recovery for death by intoxication, a statute making it a misdemeanor to sell liquor to an habitual drunkard after notice from his wife forbidding sales to him makes a sale in violation of that statute negligence per se and gives the wife a right of recovery for the death of her husband caused by such negligence on general principles of tort liability. Riden v. Grimm, 97 Tenn. 220, 38 S. W. 1097, 35 L.R.A. 587, wherein the court said: "The principal question presented under the demurrer is, that for the acts complained of there is no common-law liability, and that the statute simply makes them a misdemeanor, and prescribes a penalty, which the state alone can enforce, but confers no right of action for damages upon the wife. The principle involved in this case is the same as that involved in Queen v. Dayton Coal, etc. Co. 95 Tenn. 458. In that case a minor had been employed to work in a mine, contrary to the prohibition of the statute, which made such employment a misdemeanor. The minor brought civil suit for personal damages sustained while so employed, and this court held that the employment of the infant in the mine, in violation of the statute forbidding such employment and declaring it a misdemeanor, made it, per se, such negligence as rendered the employer liable for all injury sustained by the infant in the course of the employment. 'The breach of the statute is actionable negligence whenever it is shown that the injuries were sustained in consequence of the employment.' It is also actionable negligence whenever it is shown that the breach of the statute inflicts or results in the damage or injury complained of. In Bishop on Non-contract Law, sec. 71, it is said: 'A civil wrong and a criminal wrong are legally distinct things, though both may proceed from one act of the offender. If the injury is of a nature falling on the entire community, one individual suffering from it only as others do, can maintain no action against the wrongdoer, even should it in a degree casually press more heavily upon him than upon others. But he who suffers a special damage may have his suit, though by reason of the public harm the defendant is also indictable."

But it has been held that a statute requiring that an applicant for a license to sell liquor shall enter into a penal bond, conditioned that the applicant will pay all damages that may be occasioned by reason of liquor sold at his house of business, creates no statutory liability for the death of a purchaser occasioned by reason of liquor sold at the place of business of a retail liquor dealer, in the absence of a civil damage act giving an action for injuries caused by intoxication. Bolen v. Still, 123 Ark. 308, 185 S. W. 811.

It is not actionable negligence for a licensed saloon keeper to sell two quarts of whisky to a man of reasonable intelligence, fifty-six years of age, and sober at the time, with nothing indicating that the purchaser was an excessive drinker, and such a sale will not entitle the administrator of the purchaser to recover damages for the death of the decedent caused by his falling off his horse while returning home intoxicated. Bolen v. Still, 123 Ark. 308, 185 S. W. 811.

III. Under Civil Damage Act.

1. IN GENERAL.

Under the so-called civil damage statutes giving an action for injuries caused by or resulting from intoxication, the recent cases are practically unanimous in holding that recovery for death caused by intoxication, or by the act of an intoxicated person, may be had against the person selling, giving, or furnishing the liquors contributing to the intoxication, or against the owner of the premises wherein the liquors are sold, given or furnished.

In Gardner v. Day, 95 Me. 558, 50 Atl. 892, the court said: "It is evident that the statute not only gives a remedy when one is injured in his person, or property, by an intoxicated person, but also when a person is injured in his or her means of support 'by reason of the intoxication of any person.' The most obvious and common injury of this latter character is where a wife or child is dependent upon the husband or father for support, and by reason of the intoxication of the husband or father he is rendered wholly or partially incapable to furnish such support. It is unquestioned that in such case an action will lie if the total or partial incapacity to provide support is only temporary, or even if it is lasting, caused by some permanent disability sustained while in a state of intoxication, so long as the husband continues to live; but it is claimed that this injury to the wife's means of support does not continue after the death of the husband. In other words, the contention is, and it is supported by a number of decisions of courts of high authority, under substantially similar statutes, that while a wife's means of support may be injured within the meaning of the statute by reason of the temporary or permanent disability of the husband, by reason of his intoxication and consequent incapacity, or diminished capacity to provide support, she cannot be injured in this respect by his death following and resulting from his intoxication. We cannot agree to this proposition. We are unable to perceive any legal distinction, except in degree, between the temporary injury to a wife's means of support through the husband's inability to provide support by reason of some accident sustained while intoxicated, and the permanent injury suffered by her of the same nature by reason of the husband's death resulting from his intoxication. In either case, the injury is to her means of support by reason of his intoxication. 'Otherwise, minor and temporary injuries to the plaintiff's means of support would be within the protection of the statutes, while the greatest and most permanent injury of all would be without remedy.' 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 54 and cases cited. A wife cannot of course recover under this statute for the death of her husband, nor for her mental suffering caused thereby, nor for any of the consequences of his death, except for the injury to her means of support by reason of his intoxication; but if his death is the proximate result of such intoxication, she is none the less injured in her means of support thereby, within the meaning of the statute as we construe it."

Recovery for death by intoxication has been had where the deceased met his death in the following ways:

—Killed by train or locomotive while intoxicated. Buck v. Maddock, 167 Ill. 219, 47 N. E. 208; Deel v. Heiligenstein, 244 Ill. 239, 91 N. E. 420, affirming 147 Ill. App. 307; Greenacre v. Filby, 276 Ill. 294, 114 N. E. 536; People v. Brumback, 24 Ill. App. 501; Johnson v. Gram, 72 Ill. App. 676;

Lahey v. Crist, 130 Ill. App. 152; Johnson v. Bush, 154 Ill. App. 494; Lawlor v. State, 53 Ind. App. 24, 99 N. E. 487; In re Bennett, 160 Mich. 309, 125 N. W. 2, 17 Detroit Leg. N. 50; Merrill v. Tinkler, 160 Mich. 575, 125 N. W. 717; Sellars v. Foster, 27 Neb. 118, 42 N. W. 907; Pilkins v. Hans, 87 Neb. 7, 126 N. W. 864; Roach v. Wolff, 96 Neb. 43, 146 N. W. 1019; Hauth v. Sambo (Neb.) 158 N. W. 1036; Bier v. Myers, 61 Pa. Super. Ct. 158.

—Killed by reason of mismanaging horses while intoxicated. Smith v. People, 141 Ill. 447, 31 N. E. 425; Brown v. Butler, 66 Ill. App. 86; Johnson v. Gram, 72 Ill. App. 676; Wanack v. Alexander, 78 Ill. App. 356; Poole v. Lansden, 183 Ill. App. 609; Wall v. State, 10 Ind. App. 530, 38 N. E. 190; Jarozewski v. Allen, 117 Ia. 632, 91 N. W. 941; Moran v. Slattey, 99 Neb. 360, 156 N. W. 663; Fink v. Garman, 40 Pa. St. 95. And see the reported case.

—Suicide as result of intoxication. White-side v. O'Connors, 162 Ill. App. 108; Hammers v. Knight, 168 Ill. App. 203; Dice v. Sherberneau, 152 Mich. 601, 116 N. W. 416, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 765, 15 Detroit Leg. N. 255; Neu v. McKechnie, 95 N. Y. 632, 47 Am. Rep. 89; Garrigan v. Kennedy, 19 S. D. 11, 8 Ann. Cas. 1125, 101 N. W. 1081; Dickmann v. Thomas, 36 S. D. 283, 154 N. W. 811.

—Death by freezing or exposure due to intoxication. McCarty v. State, 162 Ind. 218, 70 N. E. 131; American Surety Co. v. State, 46 Ind. App. 126, 90 N. E. 99; Curran v. Percival, 21 Neb. 434, 32 N. W. 213; Scott v. Chope, 33 Neb. 41, 49 N. W. 940; Juckett v. Brennaman, 99 Neb. 755, 157 N. W. 925; DeStruve v. McGuire, 25 Ont. L. Rep. 491, 21 Ont. W. Rep. 138.

—Killed in fight while intoxicated. Parsons v. Smith, 164 Ill. App. 509; Hilliker v. Farr, 149 Mich. 444, 112 N. W. 1116; McClay v. Worrall, 18 Neb. 44, 24 N. W. 429; Woodring v. Jacobino, 54 Wash. 504, 103 Pac. 809.

—Death from falling down stairs while drunk. Marschall v. Langhran, 47 Ill. App. 29; Greener v. Niehaus, 44 Ind. App. 674, 89 N. E. 377.

—Death resulting from excessive drinking. Gardner v. Day, 95 Me. 558, 50 Atl. 892; Young v. Beveridge, 81 Neb. 180, 115 N. W. 766.

—Death by drowning while intoxicated. Weatherbee v. Byam, 100 Mich. 600, 125 N. W. 686; Chmelir v. Sawyer, 42 Neb. 362, 60 N. W. 547.

—Death by suffocation in drunken stupor. Triggs v. McIntyre, 115 Ill. App. 257, judgment affirmed 215 Ill. 369, 74 N. E. 400.

—Death from injuries to arm, complicated by delirium tremens. Whipple v. Rosenstock, 99 Neb. 153, 155 N. W. 898.

—Death from being kicked by drunken husband, whereby miscarriage resulted. Phair v. Dumond, 99 Neb. 310, 156 N. W. 637.

—Death as result of intoxication of deceased, particular manner not appearing. Woods v. Dailey, 211 Ill. 495, 71 N. E. 1068; Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185; Jopp v. Fairburn, 186 Ill. App. 280; Terre Haute Brewing Co. v. Newland, 33 Ind. App. 544, 70 N. E. 190; Sisson v. Lampert, 159 Mich. 509, 124 N. W. 513; Fitzgerald v. Donohoe, 48 Neb. 852, 67 N. W. 880; Horst v. Lewis, 71 Neb. 365, 98 N. W. 1046, 103 N. W. 460; Squires v. Young, 58 N. H. 192; Bower v. Fredericks, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 540; Palmer v. Schurz, 22 S. D. 283, 117 N. W. 150.

It has been said that the civil damage statutes are penal in character and must be strictly construed. Walker v. Dailey, 101 Ill. App. 575. But it has also been said that a civil damage statute must be given such a construction as, without doing violence to its terms, will carry out its spirit, and accomplish the purpose for which it was enacted. Johnson v. Gram, 72 Ill. App. 676. And while such a statute which gives a remedy unknown to the common law should not be enlarged, it should be so construed, when the language is clear and explicit, as to give it its true meaning, having in view the purpose of the statute. Gardner v. Day, 95 Me. 558, 50 Atl. 892.

To entitle the plaintiff to recover for death under the civil damage statutes, it is necessary to prove three things: the sale or gift of liquor, the consequent intoxication, and that such intoxication caused the death. Baker v. Summers, 201 Ill. 52, 66 N. E. 302; Greener v. Niehaus, 44 Ind. App. 674, 89 N. E. 377. The proof of those three things is sufficient to constitute a cause of action, although there are other allegations not proved. Hammers v. Knight, 168 Ill. App. 203; American Surety Co. v. State, 46 Ind. App. 126, 90 N. E. 99, rehearing denied 46 Ind. App. 130, 91 N. E. 624.

Liability for death by intoxication may be predicated on a sale by an agent or servant of the defendant as well as on a sale by the defendant personally. Deal v. Heiligenstein, 244 Ill. 239, 91 N. E. 429, affirming judgment 147 Ill. App. 307; Pennington v. Gillaspie, 66 W. Va. 643, 66 S. E. 1009.

Under a statute making a general provision for recovery for injury to means of support caused by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication of any person, recovery may be had for death caused by the intoxication of one who had been treated to liquors by a third person, and to whom the defendant did not sell or give drinks, but did serve such drinks as were ordered on the account of the person treating. Johnson v. Gram, 72 Ill. App. 676, wherein the court said: "What possible difference can it make to the defendants in error whether Johnson paid for the liquor he drank or it was paid for by others? The liquor was set out upon their bar for him to drink, and he drank it in their presence, they knowing the probable consequence would be that he would become intoxicated, as he did, which according to common observation is not an unusual result when a number of men in a saloon indulge in the practice of treating each other to intoxicating drinks. We are of the opinion that the sad results shown in the case at bar were within the purview of the legislature in the adoption of the dram shop law, and among the evils sought to be remedied by that act. Any other construction than that we place upon it would not accomplish the purpose which the framers of the law evidently intended."

The fact that the defendant never received any pay for the liquors alleged to have caused the death is no defense to an action under the civil damage act. Hilliker v. Farr, 149 Mich. 444, 112 N. W. 1116.

Under a civil damage statute recovery may be had for death by intoxication against one who furnished liquor, not as a liquor dealer, but as a host to his guests. Peterson v. Brackey, 143 Ia. 75, 119 N. W. 967, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff and her deceased husband had made a social visit to the defendants, their neighbors, that in the course of the evening they were served at four different times, at least, with a mixture of alcohol and water, and of alcohol, water, and coffee; that the wife of the deceased, the plaintiff, felt "dizzy and funny" after the fourth round of drinks and went to sleep on a bed, the deceased lying down on the floor by the bed; and that the next morning the plaintiff found her husband dead on the floor. Verdict and judgment against the defendants were sustained.

Where a person is injured and dies because of intoxication, all persons who sold to him liquor materially contributing to that intoxication are jointly liable, under civil damage acts, for the death. Parsons v. Smith, 164 Ill. App. 509.

One causing intoxication in whole or in part cannot escape liability for damages to the means of support caused by such intoxication simply because he may not have foreseen the consequences of intoxication produced by the sales. Parsons v. Smith, 164 Ill. App. 509. And it is immaterial, in an action under a civil damage statute, whether the defendant knew that the deceased was in the habit of becoming intoxicated or not. In re Bennett, 160 Mich. 309, 125 N. W. 2.

All persons made liable by a civil damage act for death by intoxication, including sureties on the bond of the license, are jointly and severally liable and may all be joined as defendants in the same action. Hauth v. Sanbo (Neb.) 158 N. W. 1036.

Under the civil damage statute which gives the right of recovery only against a licensed dealer, the plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant was a licensed dealer. Paulson v. Langness, 16 S. D. 471, 93 N. W. 655.

Recovery cannot be had under a civil damage statute for death caused by the drinking of a bottle of lemon extract sold by the defendant, a grocer, to the deceased, unless it be shown that the defendant, or his clerk, who sold the bottle knew it was bought for use as an intoxicant, or unless the defendant was engaged in an evasion of the dram-shop act. Walker v. Dailey, 101 Ill. App. 575, wherein the court said, obiter, however, that if such knowledge or such intention to evade the law were proved, recovery could be had.

The fact that the deceased came to his death by drowning while fishing unlawfully does not deprive the widow of her statutory right to recover against one whose sale of liquor caused the intoxicated condition in which the deceased was when he drowned. Weatherbee v. Byam, 160 Mich. 600, 125 N. W. 686, 17 Detroit Leg. N. 223.

2. STATUTORY VARIATIONS.

The provisions of the various civil damage acts of the different jurisdictions show some diversity, the principal difference being that some of the statutes make a general provision for liability while others limit the liability to cases of intoxication resulting from certain classes of sales or gifts or to sales or gifts under certain circumstances. For the purposes of this note it will be sufficient to point out a few of these distinctions.

The broader type of statute is represented by that of Illinois (Rev. St. 1889, § 9), on which many of the other statutes are based, and which provides as follows: "Every husband, wife, child, parent, guardian, employer, or other person, who shall be injured in person, property, or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action in his or her own name, severally or jointly, against any person or persons who shall, by selling or giving intoxicating liquors, have caused the intoxication in whole or in part of such person or persons. And any person owning, renting, leasing, or permitting the occupation of any building or premises, and having knowledge that intoxicating liquors are to be sold therein, or who, having leased the same for any other purpose, shall knowingly permit the sale therein of any intoxicating liquors that have caused in whole or in part the intoxication of any person, shall be liable, severally or jointly with the person or persons selling or giving intoxicating liquors aforesaid, for all damages sustained, and for exemplary damages."

Some of the statutes confine the liability to cases of intoxication produced by or as a result of an unlawful sale or gift. Such is the statute of Indiana (Burns 1901, § 7279; R. S. 1881, § 5315); that of Iowa (Code 1897, § 2418); and that of Pennsylvania (Bright. Purd. Dig. p. 1082, § 47).

Others create liability only where sales or gifts of intoxicating liquors are made after the giving of notice not to serve them to the person in question. Such is the statute of Dakota (Polit. Code, 1885, c. 35, § 4); that of Massachusetts (St. 1885, c. 282); and that of New Hampshire (Gen. Laws, 1878, c. 109, § 28). The statute of Kentucky (Gen. St. 1888, p. 1235) gives an action for damages resulting from furnishing intoxicating liquors to a known inebriate.

For other statutory peculiarities, see the statutes of the various jurisdictions.

Under the Iowa statute, sales of liquor are presumptively unlawful, and the defendants must plead and prove that they were lawful in order to secure exemption on that ground. Jarozewski v. Allen, 117 Ia. 632, 91 N. W. 941.

3. CAUSATION IN GENERAL.

In order to fix liability on the defendant in an action for death under the civil damage acts, it is necessary to trace a chain of causation leading from the act of the defendant, in the selling or giving of liquor, up to the injury for which recovery is sought. Accordingly, an instruction to the jury basing liability wholly on the sale or gift of liquor by the defendants, without any requirement of proof that the sale or gift should have produced the intoxication, or that the intoxication should have been the cause of the death, is erroneous. Baker v. Summers, 201 Ill. 52, 66 N. E. 302.

In the consideration of the question of causation and proximate cause, the chain of causation divides naturally and logically into two links: first the causal relationship between the sale or gift of the liquor by the defendant and the intoxication; and second, the causal relationship between the intoxication and the injury to the means of support.

4. CAUSATION OF INTOXICATION.

To entitle a person to recovery for death caused by intoxication it is necessary, after having proved the sale or gift of liquor by the defendant, or on his premises with his consent, to prove that the gift or sale was the cause of the intoxication. Baker v. Sum- mers, 201 Ill. 52, 66 N. E. 302; Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185.

It need not be proved that the drinks furnished by the defendant were the sole, or even the most material, cause of the intoxication. It is sufficient if they contributed, with drinks obtained elsewhere, to produce the intoxication. Brown v. Butler, 66 Ill. App. 86; Kelley v. Malhoit, 115 Ill. App. 23; American Surety Co. v. State, 46 Ind. App. 126, 90 N. E. 99, rehearing denied 46 Ind. App. 130, 91 N. E. 624; Phair v. Dumond, 99 Neb. 310, 156 N. W. 637. In Brown v. Butler, supra, the court said: "It does not appear whether deceased had been drinking in any other saloon or not, nor is it material. If, by reason of his intoxication, deceased lost his life, then, if such intoxication was caused in whole or in part by intoxicating liquor sold or given to him by plaintiff in error, the liability exists, no matter how much may have been furnished by others. Parties engaging in the saloon business know that they incur just such risks as this, and that the sale of one single glass of intoxicating liquor may bring upon them a liability for the wrongful or careless acts of others, over whom they have no control; but it is one of the dangers of the traffic, and they must take the consequences if they follow the business." In Phair v. Dumond, 99 Neb. 310, 156 N. W. 637, it appeared that the defendant had furnished the deceased two glasses of whisky, and that deceased then, after the defendant had gone out, stole the whisky bottle, the contents of which combined with the effect of the two glasses to produce the intoxication. The court said: "It is strongly urged that, since the intoxication of Phair resulted from the drinking of whisky in the stolen bottle, the defendant is not liable. The evidence shows that Dumond furnished two glasses of whisky to Phair before the bottle was stolen. The whisky sold and given contributed to the resulting intoxication. This is sufficient under the statute."

However it has been held in one recent case that in order to create a liability on the part of a liquor dealer, his act must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the intoxication. West v. Leiphart, 169 Mich. 354, 135 N. W. 246.

Whether the intoxication was caused by the liquor sold, given, or dispensed to the deceased by the defendant is a question of fact for the jury. Brown v. Butler, 66 Ill. App. 86.

A chain of causation cannot be traced, however, from the sale by the defendant to the intoxication through intermediate sales by third persons. Therefore recovery cannot be had against a saloon keeper for the death of A by intoxication caused by liquor sold to A by B, B having bought it from the defendant saloon keeper. West v. Leiphart, 169 Mich. 354, 135 N. W. 246; Sullivan v. Conrad, 79 Neb. 303, 112 N. W. 660. In West v. Leiphart, supra, the court said: "In the case under consideration, the injuries complained of are not the natural and proximate consequence of the sales of liquor made by defendant Leiphart to Johnson and Stuebeck. Though the injury may be traced up to the unlawful act of one man, if it would not have happened but for the subsequent, independent, unlawful act of another, the latter alone is liable."

5. CAUSATION OF DEATH.

The plaintiff in an action under the civil damage acts must as a general rule in order to recover for death from intoxication further prove that the death of the deceased was caused by the intoxication by the sale or gift of liquor by the defendant, or on his premises. Baker v. Summers, 201 Ill. 52, 66 N. E. 302; Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185; Dudley v. State, 40 Ind. App. 74, 81 N. E. 89.

The intoxication need not, however, be proved to be the sole cause of the death, Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185; Hammers v. Knight, 168 Ill. App. 203; Moran v. Slattey, 99 Neb. 360, 156 N. W. 663; or even the principal cause, Moran v. Slattey, 99 Neb. 360, 156 N. W. 663; nor need it be proved that no cause other than the intoxication intervened. It is sufficient to prove that the intoxication superinduced or assisted in bringing on the condition which caused the death. Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185.

Proof that the death was not caused by the intoxication entitles the defendants to a verdict in their favor. Hart v. Duddleson, 20 Ill. App. 618.

Where recovery is sought for death by suicide the plaintiff need not even prove that the suicide was committed while the deceased was intoxicated, provided it was the result of a previous intoxication. Garrigan v. Kennedy, 19 S. D. 11, 8 Ann. Cas. 1125, 101 N. W. 1081, 117 Am. St. Rep. 927; Palmer v. Schurz, 22 S. D. 283, 117 N. W. 150.

But it has been held that a liquor dealer is not liable for the death of one to whom he has sold intoxicating liquors if the death was not the natural or proximate result of the intoxication. Roach v. Kelly, 194 Pa. St. 24, 44 Atl. 1090, 75 Am. St. Rep. 685, wherein the court said: "There are many cases where the question of remote or proximate cause is for the jury, but this is not one of them. The facts are undisputed; deceased had an old grudge against Atkinson; when heated by liquor he revived the old quarrel; in gratification of his ill will he also picked a quarrel with Pratt, the father-in-law of the man he hated; they proceeded some distance to private property and fought; Roach defeated Pratt, then attacked Atkinson; while engaged in this second flagrant breach of the peace the cry of police is raised, and all, both drunk and sober, fled; Roach, by the concurring circumstances of the slip on the bank and the fall into the open sewer, was killed. Admit that his resentment on account of the old grudge and his quarrelsomeness were prompted by the liquor and resulted in the fight; he received no injury in that consequence of defendant's act; the direct effect of the liquor ended with the fight; in a subsequent attempt, however, to escape arrest for a violation of law he met his death; this was an intermediate cause, disconnected from the primary one, for which, under no view of the facts, was defendant responsible. If Roach in his flight had been arrested by the officers, and in a scuffle to escape from them had met his death, it might as well have been argued the proximate cause of his death was the unlawful sale of liquor, yet it is too plain for argument that the resistance to the officers was the proximate and effective intervening cause, while at most the sale of liquor was the very remote cause."

And in Hart v. Duddleson, 20 Ill. App. 618, it was held that it is proper to instruct the jury that the intoxication must be proved to have been the proximate cause of the death.

It has been held, however, that the Indiana statute (Burns 1901, § 1337a) was intended to afford a remedy for an injury to the means of support, whether directly or remotely caused by the intoxication. McCarty v. State, 162 Ind. 218, 70 N. E. 131; Greener v. Niehaus, 44 Ind. App. 674, 89 N. E. 377; Hughes v. State, 50 Ind. App. 617, 98 N. E. 839. In the case last cited the court said: "The statute provides for a recovery by action for injuries to person or property or means of support, without any restriction whatever, and . . . both direct and consequential injuries were included; . . . it is evident that the legislature intended to go, in such a case, far beyond anything known to the common law, and to provide a remedy for injuries occasioned by one who was instrumental in the producing or who caused such intoxication. . . . The question was not whether the death of the deceased was the natural, reasonable or probable consequence of the defendant's act; but it was enough if intoxication, caused in whole or in part by liquor sold by the defendant, was the cause of the death of the plaintiff's husband, if by reason thereof the plaintiff's means of support were injuriously affected."

In Michigan it has been held that, where the injury to the means of support for which recovery is sought results from the suicide of the plaintiff's husband while intoxicated, the plaintiff need not prove that the suicide was caused by the intoxication, it being sufficient to show that the self-destruction occurred when the deceased was intoxicated. Dice v. Sherberneau, 152 Mich. 601, 116 N. W. 416, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 765, wherein the courts said: "The difficulty in proving that the deceased would not have committed suicide without the intoxication is apparent. It would substantially result in denying to a wife or children the benefit of this statute in cases of suicide. Even where a wife sought damages because her husband had committed the crime of burglary, while in a state of intoxication, the court instructed the jury that the defendant was liable if the husband formed the intent to commit the burglary by reason of the intoxication, or was so intoxicated that he was incapable of forming the intent. Dennison v. Van Wormer, 107 Mich. 461. In that case stress was laid upon the felonious intent essential to establish the crime. In such cases it is incumbent upon the wife or child to show facts and circumstances from which a jury may legitimately infer that the crime was the result of the intoxication, and not of a previously formed intent. Intoxication seldom leads to burglary and other crimes where the act implies a previously formed and intelligent criminal intent. In such cases mere proof of intoxication is not sufficient to sustain a right of action by the wife or child for damages resulting from loss of support. It is, however, a matter of common knowledge that persons long addicted to the excessive use of intoxicants—that was the case here—do, when under the influence of liquor, attack their families and often attempt their own destruction. In such cases the fact that the act was committed while in a state of intoxication is all that the statute requires."

By the terms of the Nebraska civil damage act (Ann. St. 1907, § 7168) a statutory presumption is raised that the intoxication caused the death and where intoxication is proved immediately preceding, or at the time of the death, the causal relation between the intoxication and the death need not be proved. Davis v. Borland, 83 Neb. 281, 119 N. W. 454, wherein the court said: "That there may be no misunderstanding, we quote from the defendants brief upon this point: 'The mere fact that a man kills another while intoxicated fixes no liability on the saloon keeper. Liability attaches only when the jury are satisfied that intoxication caused or contributed to cause the homicide. If Davis killed himself while intoxicated, there is no liability, unless the jury conclude that the drinking of intoxicating liquors caused or contributed to cause the suicide.' There can be no doubt that as a legal proposition the above quotation from the brief of the defendants is a correct statement of the general rule of law, and that in ordinary cases it is well settled that a petition, in order to state a cause of action, should set forth every essential fact which the plaintiff must prove in order to entitle him to recover. Our legislature, however, has created an exception in this respect in cases brought against the vendor of intoxicating liquors for damages sustained in consequence of intoxication arising from the sale thereof. Section 7168, Ann. St. 1907, is in the following language: 'On the trial of any suit under the provisions hereof, the cause or foundation of which shall be the acts done or injuries inflicted by a person under the influence of liquor, it shall only be necessary to sustain the action to prove that the defendant or defendants sold or gave liquor to the person so intoxicated, or under the influence of liquor, whose acts or injuries are complained of, on that day or about that time when said acts were committed or said injuries received; and in an action for damages brought by a married woman or other person whose support legally devolves upon a person disqualified by intemperance from earning the same, it shall only be necessary to prove that the defendant has given or sold intoxicating drinks to such person during the period of such disqualification. This section of itself supplies allegations and proof in respect to matters that are essential in the ordinary action. When damage has been suffered at the hands of an intoxicated person, the statute, in an action brought against the vendor to recover for such damages, raises a presumption in favor of the plaintiff that the sale which caused the intoxication, or which contributed thereto, was the cause of the injury.'

The causal relation between the intoxication and the death is a question of fact for the jury. Triggs v. McIntyre, 215 Ill. 369, 74 N. E. 400, affirming judgment 115 Ill. App. 257; Lahey v. Crist, 130 Ill. App. 152; Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185; Parsons v. Smith, 164 Ill. App. 509; Jarozewski v. Allen, 117 Ia. 632, 91 N. W. 941; Bower v. Fredericks, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 540; Garrigan v. Kennedy, 19 S. D. 11, 8 Ann. Cas. 1125, 101 N. W. 1081.

Under a civil damage act giving a right of recovery to one injured in means of support by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication of any person, a distinction is made in the application of the rules or proximate cause between actions brought under the first and those brought under the second of the alternative clauses of the statute. In an action for an injury by any intoxicated person, i. e. by the affirmative act of one intoxicated, the rules of proximate cause have been held not to apply, and the plaintiff need only show that the intoxication was the cause of the injury, either proximate or remote. Whiteside v. O'Connors, 162 Ill.

App. 108; Bristline v. Ney, 134 Ia. 172, 111 N. W. 422, 13 Ann. Cas. 196, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1158; Lee v. Hederman, 158 Ia. 719, 138 N. W. 893. In Whiteside v. O'Connors, supra, recovery was sought by the widow of the deceased because so crazed by intoxication caused by the sale of liquor to him by the defendant that he committed suicide. Holding this to be an action for an injury to means of support by the affirmative act of an intoxicated person, not simply in consequence of the intoxication of any person; and that hence the rules of proximate cause had no application, the court said: "We conclude that if the husband of plaintiff in error committed suicide while in a state of intoxication and the defendants in error contributed in whole or in part to produce such intoxication the rule announced in Jack v. Globe, . . . is applicable, and that it was only incumbent upon plaintiff in error to show that the intoxication of her husband was the cause of his suicide, either proximate or remote. . . . When the action is for an injury resulting from the direct, affirmative act of an intoxicated person the doctrine of proximate cause has no application, and a liability accrues upon proof of that fact, but where the action is for an injury resulting 'in consequence of intoxication habitual or otherwise,' it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that such intoxication was the proximate cause of the injury." In Bristline v. Ney, supra, it was said: "As already noted, there are . . . opinions which profess to apply the rule of proximate cause; but in each instance the term 'proximate' is used in the sense of an originating cause, from which the injurious effect is logically traced through an intervening series of acts or events. This rule is, of course, properly applicable where the right of recovery is based upon the second clause of the civil damage statute which makes the liquor dealer liable for injury sustained 'in consequence' of the intoxication of any person. But where recovery is sought under the first clause for injury done 'by an intoxicated person,' the adjudicated cases are practically unanimous that when the plaintiff has proved the unlawful sale to a person on whom she is dependent for support, and the intoxication of such person thereby produced and an injury done by him while in that condition to her means of support, she has made the case for which the statute provides. In other words, the statute indulges in the reasonable presumption that an act done to the injury of his family by a person whose faculties are abnormally excited, or confused by drink, especially where the act is of a character not ordinarily to be expected from a sane and sober person, is the result of his intoxication. If when these have been shown the defendant claims that notwithstanding the drunkenness so wrongfully occasioned, the injurious act is wholly chargeable to some other cause or influence, it is open to him to establish that fact in defense. It is certainly not required of the plaintiff, that, after proving the wrongful sale of the liquor by defendants to her husband, his resultant intoxication, and his suicide while in that condition (and upon each of these points there was evidence on which the jury could properly find in her favor), she must then proceed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the deceased would not have committed suicide had the defendants not sold him the liquor."

But when recovery is sought under the second clause of such a statute, i. e. for an injury to the means of support in consequence of the intoxication of any person, it seems that the plaintiff must show that the intoxication was the proximate cause of the injury. Whiteside v. O'Connors, 162 Ill. App. 108; Bristline v. Ney, 134 Ia. 172, 111 N. W. 422, 13 Ann. Cas. 196, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1158. The rules of proximate cause applicable to cases of injury to means of support in consequence of the intoxication of any person, under the civil damage statutes, were elaborated in the case of Whiteside v. O'Connors, supra, wherein the court said, adopting the language of the court in Seith v. Commonwealth Electric Co. 241 Ill. 252, 89 N. E. 425, 132 Am. St. Rep. 204, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 978: "The negligent act or omission must be the cause which produces the injury, but it need not be the sole cause nor the last or nearest cause. It is sufficient if it concurs with some other cause acting at the same time, which in combination with it, causes the injury, or if it sets in motion a chain of circumstances and operates on them in a continuous sequence, unbroken by any new or independent cause. The question is not determined by the existence or nonexistence of intervening events, but by their character and the natural connection between the original act or omission and the injurious consequences. To constitute proximate cause the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence, and be of such a character as an ordinarily prudent person ought to have foreseen might probably occur as a result of the negligence. It is not necessary that the person guilty of the negligent act or omission might have foreseen the precise form of the injury but when it occurs it must appear that it was a natural and probable consequence of his negligence. If the negligence does nothing more than furnish a condition by which the injury is made possible, and that condition causes an injury by the subsequent independent act of a third person, the two are not concurrent and the existence of the condition is not the proximate cause of the injury. Where the intervening cause is set in operation by the original negligence, such negligence is still the proximate cause, and where the circumstances are such that the injurious consequences might have been foreseen as likely to result from the first negligent act or omission, the act of the third person will not excuse the first wrongdoer." Within the rules thus stated the doctrine of proximate cause is properly applicable in an action for 'injury occasioned in consequence of' intoxication."

In a case wherein it appeared that the deceased, in a drunken stupor, got his neck and mouth in such a position as prevented the passage of air into his lungs, and, being unable to make any voluntary effort to help himself in his unconsciousness, died thus from suffocation, his intoxication was held to be the cause of his death within the meaning of the law. Triggs v. McIntyre, 115 Ill. App. 257, affirmed 215 Ill. 369, 74 N. E. 400.

In a case where it appeared that the deceased had been left drunk, sitting on the porch of the saloon when it was closed, on a freezing night, and that when found his body was in the vault of an out house behind the saloon, into which he could easily have fallen accidentally, the body when found being covered with the water in the vault, and showing no signs of external violence, it has been held that the jury were warranted in finding that the intoxication caused the death. McCarty v. State, 162 Ind. 218, 70 N. E. 131.

Evidence that the deceased was last seen staggering from the saloon toward the railroad, and that his dead body was found on the rear footboard of the engine, is sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the death resulted from the intoxication. Lawlor v. State, 53 Ind. App. 24, 99 N. E. 487.

A finding that the deceased died as the result of lessened physical and vital ability caused by excessive drink, the immediate cause of his death being exposure, of such a character as would not be calculated to cause death if the vital powers were not impaired, is sufficient basis for a finding that intoxication caused the death. Juckett v. Brennaman, 99 Neb. 755, 157 N. W. 925.

Under the Canadian civil damage act (27-28 Vic. c. 18, s. 40), which only creates liability "whenever in any inn, tavern, etc., any person has drunk to excess of intoxicating liquor of any kind, therein furnished to him, and while in a state of intoxication from such drinking has come to his death by suicide, or drowning, or perishing from cold or other accident caused by such intoxication," no recovery can be had for a death by apoplexy caused by excessive drinking, such mode of death not being by any "other accident caused by such intoxication," within the terms of the statute, but being death by natural causes induced by intoxication. Bobier v. Clay, 27 U. C. Q. B. 438, wherein the court said: "Had our statute declared that if any person shall die from excessive drinking, the person furnishing the liquor so drank shall be responsible in this action, the case would be wholly different. We must be careful not to extend the words used, creating as they do certain new liabilities, beyond their natural sense. If the deceased, having previously been drinking to excess, took in this tavern a tumbler of brandy, and drank it off at a draught, and thereby produced an immediate apoplectic seizure or asphyxia, and fell back insensible, and died at once or in a few hours, could we hold that to be death from accident caused by intoxication? We think not—that it would be death from natural causes produced by the intoxicating liquor, just as sunstroke might strike him down, as in the case cited. Then if no accident had occurred to cause death, we think no absence or presence of skillful or judicious treatment can affect the case."

6. WHO MAY RECOVER.

It has been held that a personal representative, given a general right of action for the wrongful death of his decedent, has no right of action under the civil damage statutes for a death caused by intoxication, the latter remedy being limited to the person entitled to damages by reason of injury to means of support. Couchman v. Prather, 162 Ind. 250, 70 N. E. 240; Murphy v. Willow Springs Brewing Co. 81 Neb. 223, 115 N. W. 761. In the case first cited, the court said: "An examination of the authorities relative to the construction of statutes giving special rights of action for death shows that this court has always endeavored to construe such statutes in such a way as to prevent their overlapping."

And it has been held that an administrator suing for the death of his intestate, alleging it to have been caused by unlawful sale of liquor to the deceased whereby he contracted the drink habit, became diseased, and died, is barred of his action by the maxim volenti non fit injuria, in the absence of allegation and proof that the sales were made to the deceased at a time or times when he was so drunk, or in such a state as to be incapable of giving consent. Bissell v. Starzinger, 112 Ia. 266, 83 N. W. 1065.

According to recent cases under the civil damage acts, recovery may be had by the widow for the death of her husband by intoxication.

Recovery may also be had by minor children for the death of their father by intoxication, Buck v. Maddock, 167 Ill. 219, 47 N. E. 208; Hammers v. Knight, 168 Ill. App. 203; Hughes v. State, 50 Ind. App. 617, 98 N. E. 839; and by minor children for the death of their mother, who supported them, the father being worthless, Phair v. Dumond, 99 Neb. 310, 156 N. W. 637; Neu v. McKechnie, 95 N. Y. 632, 47 Am. Rep. 89.

It seems that an illegitimate child may recover for the loss of means of support by the death by intoxication of its father under a civil damage statute, and a child born after the death of the father may recover. Goulding v. Phillips, 124 Ia. 496, 100 N. W. 516; Phair v. Dumond, 99 Neb. 310, 156 N. W. 637.

Recovery may be had by the widow and minor child or children jointly for the death of the husband and father. Triggs v. McIntyre, 115 Ill. App. 257, affirmed 215 Ill. 369, 74 N. E. 400; Lawlor v. State, 53 Ind. App. 24, 99 N. E. 487; Curran v. Percival, 21 Neb. 434, 32 N. W. 213; Sellers v. Foster, 27 Neb. 118, 42 N. W. 907; Chmelir v. Sawyer, 42 Neb. 362, 60 N. Parents may recover for the death of their minor son. Beckerle v. Brandon, 229 Ill. 323, 82 N. E. 266. And recovery may be had by a dependent mother for the death of a son contributing to her support, Hilliker v. Farr, 149 Mich. 444, 112 N. W. 1116; McClay v. Worrall, 18 Neb. 44, 24 N. W. 429; Fitzgerald v. Donohoe, 48 Neb. 852, 67 N. W. 880; or by a mother for the death of her minor son. Johnson v. Bush, 154 Ill. App. 494.

But where a mother is suing for the death by intoxication of her minor child, she cannot declare for herself and her other minor children jointly. West v. Leiphart, 169 Mich. 354, 135 N. W. 246, wherein the court said: "The deceased had neither wife nor minor children. He died a minor himself and unmarried. No authority is cited which holds that the interests of the brothers, sisters, and mother of a deceased person can be combined in one action in a suit brought in the name of the mother to recover a gross sum for all."

Recovery may also be had by a father for the death of his son who was contributing to his support, Jarozewski v. Allen, 117 Ia. 632, 91 N. W. 941; or by a sister for the death by intoxication of her twin brothers with whom she had a contract whereby they were to support her during her life in return for house work she should do for them. In re Bennett, 160 Mich. 309, 125 N. W. 2.

7. LIABILITY OF OWNER OF PREMISES.

The statute of Illinois (Hurd's Rev. Stats. 1905, c. 43, § 9) provides that the owner of the building, in specified contingencies, "shall be liable, severally or jointly, with the person or persons selling or giving intoxicating liquors aforesaid, for all damages sustained, and for exemplary damages." Under that statute exemplary damages may be assessed against the owner of the property, when justified by the facts. Beckerle v. Brandon, 229 Ill. 323, 82 N. E. 266, wherein the court said: "The court gave plaintiffs' instruction No. 8, which advised the jury that if they found for the plaintiffs and found certain alleged facts to be true, they might then return a verdict including exemplary damages. This is said to have been wrong so far as Willis, the owner of the property, is concerned, as the evidence did not show any intentional wrongdoing, or any reckless, malicious, wanton or oppressive conduct on his part. Section 9 of chapter 43, Hurd's Revised Statutes of 1905, gives a right of action against the liquor seller under certain circumstances, and provides that the owner of the building in specified contingencies 'shall be liable, severally or jointly, with the person or persons selling or giving intoxicating liquors aforesaid, for all damages sustained, and for exemplary damages.' The language just quoted received the consideration of this court in Hackett v. Smelsley, 77 Ill. 109, and the reasoning of that opinion warranted the circuit court in giving the instruction above referred to."

Under the foregoing statute a verdict and judgment against a brewing company, the owner of the building in which a saloon was located, has been sustained by evidence showing that the brewing company had knowledge that liquors were sold there. Jopp v. Fairburn, 186 Ill. App. 280.

All the owners of the premises wherein the liquor is sold, if they knowingly consent to such use of the premises, are jointly liable under the Illinois statute with the persons who sell the liquor, for the death of one to whom the liquor is sold. Johnson v. Bush, 154 Ill. App. 494; Parsons v. Smith, 164 Ill. App. 509.

8. DAMAGES RECOVERABLE.

Recovery under the civil damage acts is on an entirely different footing from individual actions to recover damages in tort. The action for death by intoxication is purely statutory. It is not an action for damages, but is predicated solely on an injury to means of support. Mayers v. Smith, 121 Ill. 442, 13 N. E. 216; Poole v. Lansden, 183 Ill. App. 609; American Surety Co. v. State, 46 Ind. App. 126, 90 N. E. 99, rehearing denied, 46 Ind. App. 130, 91 N. E. 624; Sharpley v. Brown, 43 Hun 374, 4 N. Y. St. Rep. 784. Therefore in determining liability in such an action no consideration may be given to other injuries, such as mental suffering, loss of companionship, loss of probable increase of estate, etc. Hapenny v. Huffman, 184 Ill. App. 351.

But it has been held in Nebraska that the right of recovery under the civil damage act of that state (Comp. St. 1895, c. 50) is not confined to damages specifically to means of support, but is coextensive with the right of recovery in actions under statutes similar to Lord Campbell's act, and that recovery may be had for all damages resulting from the unlawful sale. Murphy v. Willow Springs Brewing Co. 81 Neb. 219, 115 N. W. 763; Pilkins v. Hans, 87 Neb. 7, 126 N. W. 864. In the case first cited it was said: "There is no room for distinction in the character or extent of damages recoverable under Lord Campbell's act and under the Slocumb liquor law. At least there is no ground for restricting the recovery in actions brought under the latter act within narrower limits than those which depend upon the former." And in Pilkins v. Hans, 87 Neb. 7, 126 N. W. 864, referring to the foregoing language of the court in the case of Murphy v. Willow Springs Brewing Co. the court said: "This is undoubtedly the true rule of the measure of damages in such cases. The person licensed must pay all damages that a person sustains in consequence of such traffic, and the special provisions found in the statute subsequent to this general provision are intended to extend and enlarge the measure of damages rather than restrict it."

Where a widow is given a statutory action against a liquor dealer for injury to her means of support caused by the death of her husband occasioned by intoxication, the fact that she may have means or income of her own will not affect her right to recover damages, since she still is entitled to recover for the loss of the support she was entitled to receive from her husband. Deel v. Heiligenstein, 244 Ill. 239, 91 N. E. 429 (affirming 147 Ill. App. 307), wherein the court said: "The instruction given on behalf of the appellee which is particularly complained of stated that this was a suit brought by plaintiff for damages to her means of support, and that the fact that she had received money upon a policy of insurance on her husband's life was not to be considered, but if the jury found she had been deprived of her means of support she might recover, without reference to what money or property she had of her own—whether derived from insurance policies or from any other source. This instruction contained a correct statement of the law. It was proven that the deceased earned from $80 to $100 per month as a railway switchman and that he gave his earnings each month to his wife; that he supported her and kept her in comfortable circumstances. He was under a legal obligation to support his wife, and this obligation was not limited to supplying the bare necessities of life, but included supplying such comforts as were suitable to his condition in life. The fact that a wife may have means of her own or an income from a source other than her husband will not affect her right to recover damages under the dram-shop act for an injury to her means of support on account of the death of her husband. She still has the right to recover for the loss of support she was entitled to receive from her husband. . . . Though the deceased, at the time of his death, had in force a policy of insurance on his life payable to his wife, that fact would in no wise affect her right to recover for the injury to her means of support occasioned by reason of his death."

Especially is this so if her other income is not a sufficient means of support for her. Poole v. Lansden, 183 Ill. App. 609.

And the fact that the deceased husband was so worthless and addicted to drink that he did not support his wife, is no defense to an action by her for his death by intoxication. Knott v. Peterson, 125 Ia. 404, 101 N. W.

173, wherein the court said: "Defendant contends that, as plaintiff's husband failed to furnish his wife support prior to any sales made by Peterson, she lost nothing through his death, but really is better off in consequence thereof. This argument is answered, we think, by what is said in League v. Ehmke, 120 Iowa 464, wherein it is held, in effect, that, although the husband may have been a hard drinker before he purchased liquor of the defendant, it did not follow that he would continue to be, or that he would have met his death notwithstanding defendant's sales. And we may remark parenthetically that the doctrine contended for by appellant is not sound either in morals or in law. One is not justified in causing loss of human life because that life may not apparently be of much consequence either to his friends or to his family. But for defendant's sales, the husband might have reformed, and returned to his old manner of living. Of course, reformations from the drink habit, after it becomes fixed, are infrequent; but this the jury was authorized to consider in making up its verdict as to damages. Plaintiff was entitled in law to the support of her husband, and, no matter how worthless that husband may seem to be, neither a saloon keeper nor anyone else is justified in taking his life, and then saying that it was of no consequence anyway."

If a minor son contributed to the support of his parents, his death by intoxication is such an injury to their means of support as will sustain recovery by them against the person causing the intoxication. Beckerle v. Brandon, 229 Ill. 323, 82 N. E. 266. A mother may be injured in her means of support by the death of her minor son, if he contributed to her support, in spite of the fact that she is living with her husband. Johnson v. Bush, 154 Ill. App. 494, wherein the court said: "Appellants' main contention is, that the loss of wages resulting from the death of appellee's son, who was about eighteen years of age, was not an injury to appellee's means of support within the meaning of the statute, as she was living with her husband and he was entitled to the wages of the minor son, and he was the proper plaintiff; and that such instructions as authorized the jury to take into consideration the likelihood that the deceased would have contributed to the support of appellee in the future, were improper. The proof shows that the husband, who was also a coal miner, was in the habit of getting drunk from three to four times a week, and that for two years he had not furnished appellee any money for her support; that she had received some of his wages and some of the wages of the deceased in the form of orders from the store of the company, for which they both worked; and that deceased contributed to the support of the ap-pellee and her family by giving her from eight to ten dollars every two weeks when he worked. As the wages appellee received from deceased constituted a part of her means of support, she, by his death, suffered an injury thereto, and as means of support relate to the future as well as the present, she was therein injured, not only at the time of his death but in time to come, as one of the sources of her future support was thereby cut off and her means of future support were thereby diminished."

The measure of damages to which a widow is entitled for injury to means of support, is the present value of the husband's support during their joint expectancy of life. Minor children can recover only for loss of support during their minority. Young v. Beveridge, 81 Neb. 180, 115 N. W. 766. Humiliation, grief, and like injuries cannot be considered in determining the question of liability, but when a foundation for actual damages has been laid by proof of loss of means of support, such injuries as humiliation and grief may be considered in awarding exemplary damages. Pennington v. Gillaspie, 66 W. Va. 643, 66 S. E. 1009. It seems that in Michigan exemplary damages for shame, mortification, etc., caused by the intoxication may be recovered where proved. But they cannot be recovered unless the shame and mortification be proved. Spray v. Ayotte, 161 Mich. 593, 126 N. W. 630, 17 Detroit Leg. N. 388.

Under the West Virginia civil damage act (Code 1891, c. 32, § 20, p. 236) illegality in a sale of intoxicating liquors makes the sale wilful and wanton as a matter of law and justifies an award of exemplary damages. Pennington v. Gillaspie, 66 W. Va. 643, 66 S. E. 1009, wherein the court said: "Cases arising under our civil damage law are sui generis. If sales be made illegally, in violation of the express command of the statute, whether made by principal or agent, in the eye of the law, as heretofore construed, they are deemed to have been made wilfully and wantonly. The illegality thereof, the violation of the law by principal or agent, supplies all the elements necessary in other cases to show fraud, malice, oppression, or wanton, wilful or reckless conduct or criminal indifference to civil obligation on the part of defendant, and justifies the jury in imposing on the wrongdoer, for his infraction of the law, exemplary damages."

Where exemplary damages are awarded they should bear some reasonable proportion to the actual damage done, else they are unreasonable and excessive, evincing partiality and prejudice on the part of the jury, so as to justify the court in setting the verdict aside. Pennington v. Gillaspie, 66 W. Va. 643, 66 S. E. 1009.

A verdict of $275 is entirely inadequate as a recovery for the injury to the means of support of the plaintiff by the death by intoxication of her husband, it being shown that he earned from $1.50 to $3 a day, supported his family comfortably, and was paying for his home through a homestead loan association. Johnson v. Gram, 72 Ill. App. 676, wherein the court reversed and remanded the judgment of the lower court on the grounds of the inadequacy of the awarded damages.

A verdict of $1,000 for the death by intoxication of the plaintiff's husband, a farmer forty-two years of age, who had supported his wife during his life, is not excessive. Brown v. Butler, 66 Ill. App. 86.

In a case wherein it appeared that the deceased, the husband of the plaintiff, was employed as a buggy-washer in a livery stable, and later made a living as a vendor of pop corn, pop, horse-radish, etc., it was held that a verdict for $10,000 was an excessive award, and a remittitur of half the amount was required. Whipple v. Rosenstock, 99 Neb. 153, 155 N. W. 898.

9. EVIDENCE.

Although an action under a civil damage statute is somewhat penal in its nature, it is not strictly so, but is an action for damages. Therefore to be sufficient foundation for a verdict for the plaintiff, the facts in such an action need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. A preponderance is enough. Woods v. Dailey, 211 Ill. 495, 71 N. E. 1068; Brown v. Butler, 66 Ill. App. 86; Dickmann v. Thomas, 36 S. D. 283, 154 N. W. 811. In the case first cited the court said: "It is contended that the court erred in instructing the jury that a preponderance of the evidence was sufficient upon which to base a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. We do not view that question as an open one in this court. In the case of Hall v. Barnes, 82 Ill. 228, which was an action by the wife under the dram-shop act, the court, on page 229 said: 'Upon the remaining point we regard the evidence sufficient as to the loss of means of support in consequence of drunkenness caused by appellants. While it is true the action is penal and the material allegations in the declaration must be fully proved, yet it is not necessary the evidence should exclude all reasonable doubt. It is sufficient if there is a preponderance of evidence, and this may result from circumstantial as well as direct evidence.' This is an action to recover damages, and not to recover a fine or a penalty. . . . and this court, in that class of cases, has uniformly approved instructions which have informed the jury the plaintiff need only establish his case by a preponderance of the evidence."

Where the action for damages for death by intoxication is predicated on an injury to the means of support, what the plaintiff's means of support were is a proper subject of inquiry, and it is admissible to prove that the plaintiff had no other support than that furnished by the deceased. Mayers v. Smith, 121 Ill. 442, 13 N. E. 216.

Declarations of the deceased connected with the act resulting in his death, which have a tendency to show whether he had an intention to commit suicide, are admissible as a part of the res gestae and as bearing on the question whether the death was suicidal or was the result of intoxication. Greenacre v. Filby, 276 Ill. 294, 114 N. E. 536, wherein a liquor dealer was held to be liable for the death of a purchaser of liquor caused by his being run over by a train. It appeared that the deceased had gone home from the saloon in an intoxicated condition, had left his home later and was seen by the engineer of the limited train lying across the track, but too late to prevent the killing. It was held that evidence that when the deceased was going home he declared his intention to go home, kiss his wife and babies, and go to bed was competent and admissible as showing his last declared intention in connection with his act.

Unless so connected with the event as to be a part of the res gestae, declarations of the deceased, tending to show an intention to commit suicide, are inadmissible to show that the death was caused by suicidal intent rather than by intoxication. Greenacre v. Filby, 276 Ill. 294, 114 N. E. 536, wherein the court said: "If in every case where one since deceased considered at any time the question to be or not to be, with an inclination or decision toward the negative, his declarations neither connected with any act nor preliminary to or preparatory for any act could be proved, it would open a limitless field of inquiry as to the circumstances under which the declarations were made and whether in normal conditions or at times of exceptional misfortune, discouragement and despondency. It would raise all sorts of psychological questions of mental states and intentions at different times and changes of intention from external conditions."

Statements of the deceased as to where he got the whisky, made at a time so remote from the transaction causing the death as not to be part of the res gestae, are inadmissible. Horst v. Lewis, 71 Neb. 365, 98 N. W. 1046, 103 N. W. 460. In an action for death by intoxication evidence of conversations with the deceased, not a part of the res gestae, are inadmissible. Knott v. Peterson, 125 Ia. 404, 101 N. W. 173. And statements of an attending physician, made so long after the death as not to be a part of the res gestae are likewise inadmissible. Goulding v. Phillips, 124 Ia. 496, 100 N. W. 516.

But where it is admitted that the deceased committed suicide, the question being whether he did so as the result of intoxication, a writing left by him is inadmissible to show that the suicide was not caused by intoxication. Hammers v. Knight, 168 Ill. App. 203, wherein the defendants offered and secured the admission in evidence, under objection, of the following paper: "good Buy this is the last report Ed Hammers can give My wife is a hore sind [signed] by Ed Hammers." The court on appeal held that the paper should not have been admitted as tending to show that jealousy and not intoxication caused the suicide since the paper might just as well show that the intoxication caused the jealousy. The court said: "The only purpose for which this paper could be admissible would be for its supposed tendency to show the state of mind in which Hammers was when he wrote it at some period of time before he fired the fatal shot. There was no proof that it was written at the time of the shooting. If Hammers was wild or crazy because of intoxication, the charge in this paper may have been made by him because of his intoxicated condition. Hammers could not prepare and leave a paper which would be evidence of the truth of what he wrote, either against appellant or appellees. The natural tendency of this paper as evidence was to lead the jury to believe that he killed himself because he considered his wife unfaithful, whereas it might with equal propriety be concluded that he wrote the paper and harbored in his mind the charge therein contained because he was intoxicated and frenzied with drink. The impropriety of admitting the paper may be illustrated by supposing that it had said that he was intoxicated; that this intoxication had been produced by intoxicating liquors sold to him that day by appellees; and that he was about to kill himself because of that intoxication. Such a paper would be just as illustrative of his state of mind as the one put in evidence, but it is obvious that it would not be competent evidence against appellees. We conclude that it should not have been admitted."

Where there is evidence fairly tending to prove that the liquor procured from the plaintiff appreciably contributed to the condition of intoxication which resulted in the death, whether it did so contribute is a question properly left to the jury, and a peremptory instruction for the defendant is not proper. Deel v. Heiligenstein, 244 Ill. 239, 91 N. E. 429, affirming 147 Ill. App. 307, wherein it was said: "It is claimed by appellant that the proof shows that Deel was not intoxicated at the time of his death and that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence, and he assigns as error the refusal of the court to give a peremptory instruction to the jury, at the close of plaintiff's case and again at the close of the whole case, directing them to find for the defendant. The evidence strongly tends to show that the deceased was intoxicated at the time of his death and that the intoxication was caused wholly by the liquors he drank that day at Shumway, but it is not so conclusively shown that he procured from appellant sufficient intoxicating liquor to appreciably contribute to his condition. There was evidence fairly tending to prove this phase of appellee's case, however, and the trial court properly refused to give the peremptory instructions asked."

Where parents are suing for exemplary or vindictive damages for the death by intoxication of an infant son, evidence that the father and son had on previous occasions visited other saloons and drank together is competent to be considered in fixing the amount of the damages. Beckerle v. Brandon, 229 Ill. 323, 82 N. E. 266, wherein it was held, however, that although such evidence was competent its exclusion was not ground for reversal where evidence actually went to the jury that the father had previously consented to the son's drinking at the saloon in question. The court said: "It is then urged that the court erred in not permitting the defendants to show that the father and son visited and drank together at other saloons at other times. Inasmuch as the plaintiffs were claiming vindictive damages this evidence was competent. . . . The fact that the wife sued jointly with the husband did not warrant its exclusion. If the father had on other occasions consented to the sale of intoxicating liquor to his minor son, the jury had a right to take that fact into consideration in determining whether vindictive damages should be awarded and in fixing the amount thereof in case they awarded damages of that kind, no matter who sued. We think, however, that this error does not warrant a reversal. It was shown by the testimony of the father and others that on earlier occasions at Beckerle's bar the son had bought intoxicants, the father consenting, and that the son had there, in the presence of the father, partaken of the same without objection from the latter. Under these circumstances the exclusion of the evidence in question was not harmful."

In Kelley v. Malhoit, 115 Ill. App. 23, the court said: "In view of the statement made by counsel for plaintiff in open court that plaintiff made no claim to exemplary damages, the inquiry made of the plaintiff when on the witness stand as to whether she had drunk with her husband ought [not] to have been allowed, but no harm came to plaintiff thereby. She denied that she ever drank with him and there was no proof that she ever did."

Evidence of statements made by the defendant to his barkeepers with reference to selling liquor to or permitting liquor to be obtained by the deceased, while admissible in mitigation of exemplary or punitive damages, is inadmissible for the purpose of defeating the recovery of actual damages. Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185. Likewise evidence of statements by the deceased to the effect that the defendant would not allow his barkeepers to sell or give the deceased any liquor is admissible only on the question of punitive or vindictive damages and not for the purpose of showing that no sales were made to the deceased. Dunnigan v. Ellis, 162 Ill. App. 185.

Proof that one became intoxicated while drinking certain liquors is conclusive proof that those liquors were intoxicating and no other affirmative proof thereof need be given. Lahey v. Crist, 130 Ill. App. 152.

It is competent to prove that the deceased was in the habit of becoming intoxicated. Merrill v. Tinkler, 160 Mich. 575, 125 N. W. 717.

Where the civil damage statute gives a remedy only when the sale or gift by the defendant is unlawful, and where the sale or gift to an intoxicated person is unlawful, it is material to prove that, when the sale or gift on which the action is based was made, the deceased was intoxicated, and evidence of that fact is, of course, competent. Under those circumstances, evidence of the habits of the deceased in the matter of getting intoxicated is competent, as tending to show the illegality of the sale. Sisson v. Lampert, 159 Mich. 509, 124 N. W. 513, 16 Detroit Leg. N. 1032.

Evidence of the habits of the deceased as to the drinking of liquor and its effect on him is admissible as bearing on the question of the quantum of damages, Kelley v. Malhoit, 115 Ill. App. 23; and on the question of exemplary damages, Sisson v. Lampert, 159 Mich. 509, 124 N. W. 513. And, in like manner, evidence of the character of the business or occupation of the deceased, his habits of industry and thrift, age, and physical condition, is admissible on the question of damages. Marschall v. Laughran, 47 Ill. App. 29; Peterson v. Brackey, 143 Ia. 75, 119 N. W. 967; Lee v. Hederman, 158 Ia. 719, 138 N. W. 893.

But where a witness has testified to the facts showing the habits of the deceased for industry, it is proper to exclude opinion evidence on his part as to whether the deceased was industrious. Pilkins v. Hans, 87 Neb. 7, 126 N. W. 864.

Spontaneous declarations as to the state of his health, made by the deceased when there was no thought of any litigation or controversy and where circumstances negative any motive or design, are admissible. Juckett v. Brennaman, 99 Neb. 755, 157 N. W. 925. And life tables are admissible in evidence, as bearing on the question of the life expectancy of the deceased, and, hence, on the injury to means of support. Knott v. Peterson, 125 Ia. 404, 101 N. W. 173; Peterson v. Brackey, 143 Ia. 75, 119 N. W. 967; Sellars v. Foster, 27 Neb. 118, 42 N. W. 907; Horst v. Lewis, 71 Neb. 365, 98 N. W. 1046, 103 N. W. 460. But, although admissible, the tables of life expectancy are not the controlling guide as to the probable duration of the life of the deceased. Davis v. Borland, 83 Neb. 281, 119 N. W. 454.

Anybody with a sense of smell is competent to testify that the deceased, immediately after his death, vomited blood and whisky, and that one could smell whisky all over the house. The expert testimony of a chemical analyst is not needed, for whether the liquor was distilled from molasses or corn is immaterial, and any person with a sense of smell is competent to discover and testify to the presence of spirituous liquor on such an occasion. Marshall v. Laughran, 47 Ill. App. 29.

Where a sister predicates her right of recovery on the death by intoxication of her brothers with whom she had a contract whereby they should support her, it is competent to introduce in evidence an account book showing the expenditures of the plaintiff for two years alleged to have been made with money furnished by the brothers, this evidence being material and admissible on the question what it had cost to support the plaintiff. In re Bennett, 160 Mich. 309, 125 N. W. 2.

In an action by a widow for the loss of means of support by the alleged death of her husband by intoxication, it is competent to leave to the jury the question of the situation and condition of the defendant and her dependence on her husband for support. Martin v. Fisher, 143 Mich. 462, 107 N. W. 86, 13 Detroit Leg. N. 8.

Evidence that the defendants had sold liquor to the deceased on occasions previous to that immediately preceding his death is admissible. Pilkins v. Hans, 87 Neb. 7, 126 N. W. 864.

Where the bartender who made the sale has testified that he fooled the deceased and sold him ginger ale instead of liquor just before his death, it is competent to show that intoxicating liquor and not ginger ale was served to the deceased by introducing testimony of a conversation had at the time of the sale, between a bystander and the bartender, in which the bystander complained that enough liquor was served the deceased to kill him, and the bartender replied that he had given him (at some previous time) a "bolacek" of alcohol, that the deceased had lived through that all right, that if he could stand that he could stand all he drank then, and that he didn't care if the deceased died before morning. Young v. Beveridge, 81 Neb. 180, 115 N. W. 766.

Where the testimony is conflicting as to whether the defendant made sales to the deceased, it is competent to introduce evidence that the deceased had brought home a whisky flask bearing a label reciting that it had been sold by the defendant. Sullivan v. Conrad, 79 Neb. 303, 112 N. W. 660.

Evidence offered by the defendant that the deceased had bought drinks elsewhere than at the saloon of the defendant on the date of the death of the deceased is wholly immaterial and is inadmissible. Dickmann v. Thomas, 36 S. D. 283, 154 N. W. 811.

It is competent for a witness to testify directly to the fact that the deceased was intoxicated at a time shortly before his death. Palmer v. Schurz, 22 S. D. 283, 117 N. W. 150.

In an action by a widow under a civil damage statute for injury to her means of support by the death by intoxication of her husband, evidence as to the number and ages of the plaintiff's children is inadmissible. Rogers v. Bailey, 68 W. Va. 186, 69 S. E. 698, wherein the court said: "The plaintiff was permitted to prove that she had been married but nine years and was the mother of three children. Thus the dependent age of the children was shown. The admission of this evidence was prejudicial error. A clear statement from a standard authority is in point here: 'In an action by a wife to recover damages by the sale of liquor to her husband, evidence as to the number, age, and sex of her children is not admissible; for since the plaintiff can recover only for her own proper loss or damage, and the statute gives a separate right of action to each of the children, such testimony could have no relevancy and might improperly enhance the damages awarded.' Black on Intoxicating Liquors, section 327. In a more recent work it is said: 'The question as to whether evidence is admissible as to the age, sex and number of the children of the plaintiff who has brought suit under the statute for injury to her means of support has been frequently passed upon. The prevailing rule seems to be that such evidence is wholly immaterial and its admission reversible error, for the reason that the statute gives each child a right of action and the wife's right to recover is based on the loss of means for her support, and not for the support of her children.' Woollen and Thornton on Intoxicating Liquors, section 1063. The decisions generally are in accord with these texts."

v.

MID-CONTINENT DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

Kansas Supreme Court—March 6, 1915.

*94 Kan. 370; 146 Pac. 1014.Corporations — Appointment of Receiver — Grounds — Mismanagement.

The majority of the stockholders of a corporation have the right to control the corporation, and the majority of the board of directors have the right to determine its policies and manage and direct its affairs so long as they act in good faith and within the limitations of the law. The appointment of a receiver for a solvent, going concern is a last resort remedy, and should not be employed to correct improper conduct when other adequate remedy is available. Bad judgment and ill success in previous ventures, completed or not being actively prosecuted, current transactions merely unwise and not so reckless or extravagant as to amount to breach of trust, irregularities and misconduct which are not so culpable as to jeopardize the interests of the corporation and the rights of stockholders, and dissensions among directors, so long as a majority of them control, do not warrant the appointment of a receiver. In no case should a court take the property and business of a solvent, going corporation out of the hands of the board of directors and into its own hands by the appointment of a receiver at the suit of a minority stockholder unless the right of the plaintiff be free from reasonable doubt and the danger of loss or injury be clearly proved.

Discharge of Receiver — Grounds — Change in Management.

This suit was commenced by a preferred stockholder for a dividend, for the appropriation of the property of the corporation to the payment of such dividend, for the redemption of her stock, and for the appointment of a receiver to accomplish the purposes of the suit. A receiver was appointed at the commencement of the suit on the allegations of the verified petition, which contained numerous specifications of misconduct on the part of the board of directors, and charged imminence of insolvency. A referee was appointed to hear the cause, who returned findings of fact and conclusions of law which the court adopted, except a recommendation that the receiver be discharged. Before the reference was made a new and enlarged board of directors was chosen at a regular stockholders' meeting, which new board the referee found to be harmonious, and against which no objection of any kind was lodged. The charge of threatened insolvency was not sustained. Held, the retention of the receiver after the election of the new board of directors constituted an abuse of judicial discretion. Held, further, the findings of fact disclose that the original appointment of the receiver was not justified.

Preferred Shareholder — Status as Stockholder or Creditor.

The capital stock of the corporation consisted of $100,000 common stock and $50,000 preferred stock. The plaintiff purchased 500 shares of the preferred stock and received a certificate of stock which provided there should be paid on it from net earnings a fixed yearly dividend from date of issuance at the rate of seven per cent per annum, to be earned before dividends on common stock were declared; that the stock should not be entitled to further dividends and should have no voting power; that it should be preferred as to assets on winding up the affairs of the company; and that it should be redeemable at the option of the company after one year from date of issue, at par with accrued dividends. Held, the certificate was a certificate of stock and not a certificate of indebtedness, and the plaintiff was a stockholder of the corporation and not a creditor.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The board of directors adopted a resolution to redeem the preferred stock, and at the same time adopted a resolution to set aside seventy-five per cent of the gross earnings from that time on for that purpose, to be known as a preferred stock fund, to be apportioned as often as twenty-five per cent of the amount of the preferred stock was accumulated. The resolutions were adopted only eight days before the receiver was appointed, and the board of directors had no opportunity to carry them out. Held, the resolutions must be construed together, and so considered they merely pledged the transfer of seventy-five per cent of future gross earnings to the preferred stock fund, to be apportioned as stated; the entire issue of preferred stock did not immediately become an absolute liability of the company; the preferred stockholders continued to be stockholders and not creditors until an apportionment of the preferred stock fund was made; and the preferred stockholders then became creditors only with respect to such apportionment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Dividends — From What Funds Payable — Net Earnings.

The defendant engaged in the business of prospecting for and producing gas and oil. It developed a valuable gas field near Muncie, left it for other fields, and then returned to it after the proceeds of the sale of its stock had been spent. It then borrowed $11,000, which it used to build a pipe line to supply gas to consumers with whom it had contracts. By bringing in new wells and connecting them with the pipe line it brought its income up to an average of $2,800 per month, and received for the sale of gas for the thirty days next preceding the appointment of the receiver the sum of $3,000. It expended all earnings received after the pipe line was built in repaying the money borrowed to build the pipe line, in drilling new wells and connecting them with the pipe line, and for general expenses. When the suit was commenced it still owed about $2,500 of indebtedness incurred for these purposes, which was due and payable. Held, there were no net earnings out of which to pay dividends on the preferred stock.

Same.

At the time the resolutions referred to were adopted the board of directors adopted a resolution authorizing the secretary and treasurer to proceed with the payment of preferred dividends. At that time there were about $2,900 in the treasury which were forthwith applied to the satisfaction of the claims of creditors. Held, the money was not net earnings, and the duty to pay creditors was superior to the duty to pay preferred stockholders.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Wyandotte county: FISCHER, Judge.

Action by Lydia E. Inscho et al., plaintiffs, against Mid-continent Development Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

C. Angevine, J. K. Cubbison, and William G. Holt, for appellant.

T. F. Railsback for appellees.

[372] BURCH, J.—On August 15, 1911, the plaintiff, Lydia E. Inscho, the owner of five hundred shares of preferred stock issued by the defendant, sued the defendant to recover the sum of $35 as a seven per cent dividend on her stock for the preceding year. On the same [373] day the judge of the district court on presentation to him of the verified petition, appointed a receiver for the defendant. On the same day the receiver qualified and took possession of all the defendant's property. On the same day an intervening stockholder filed a pleading praying judgment for a $7 dividend. Later two other stockholders intervened, asking for dividends in sums of $35 and $70, respectively. Issues were made up, and in March, 1912, a referee was appointed to hear the case. In October, 1912, the referee reported findings of fact and conclusions of law and recommended the discharge of the receiver. Various motions relating to the referee's report were filed, including a motion by the defendant to discharge the receiver and a motion for judgment in favor of the defendant on the referee's findings of fact. On November 29, 1912, the cause was finally submitted to the district court. The cause was held under advisement until June 7, 1913, when the referee's report was adopted, except the recommendation to discharge the receiver, the referee's findings were stated as findings of the court, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the interveners, and all other holders of preferred stock, for dividends, for the redemption of their stock, and for other relief. The defendant appeals.

The defendant was organized under the laws of the state of Arizona with a capital stock of $100,000 common stock and $50,000 preferred stock. It engaged in the business of prospecting for and producing gas and oil. It first drilled for gas and oil in Chase and Morris counties, and spent a large sum of money in such work without return. It then developed a good gas field near Muncie, in Wyandotte county. It then explored a field in Marshall county, Oklahoma, and purchased a majority of the stock of an Oklahoma corporation known as the Mal-Millan Company, organized for the production of gas and oil and occupying the Marshall county field. Large sums of money were spent in these ventures [374] without success. It then returned to the Muncie field and was operating there when the action was commenced.

The petition disclosed that the plaintiff purchased her stock on July 5, 1910. It was alleged that the net earnings of the defendant, from which 7 per cent annual dividends on preferred stock were payable, were and had been for some months about $3000 per month; that such earnings were sufficient to enable the defendant to pay one annual dividend to the plaintiff in the sum of $35, but that such dividend had not been paid, and the plaintiff desired to subject the property of the defendant to payment of her claim. The petition further alleged that at a recent meeting of the board of directors a reserved privilege to redeem the preferred stock at par with accumulated dividends had been exercised, a resolution had been adopted to create a sinking fund for the redemption of the preferred stock, and the preferred stockholders had been notified of the action taken. A copy of the plaintiff's certificate of stock was attached to the petition, the material portions of which read as follows:

"This certifies that Mrs. Lydia E. Inscho is the owner of 500 Shares of the Preferred Capital Stock of the Mid-continent Development Company, full paid and nonassessable, on which there shall be paid by said Company from its net earnings a fixed yearly dividend from date of issuance, at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, which shall be earned before dividends are declared from time to time on the Common Stock. This Stock is also Preferred as to the assets of the Corporation in case of winding up its affairs, and shall not be entitled to any further dividends nor have any voting power. The stock is redeemable at the option of the Company after one year from date of issuance by paying par value thereof, with accrued dividends."

The remainder of the petition was quite prolix and redundant, but may be summarized as containing the following charges against the defendant. Nothing had [375] been paid for the common stock. Subscriptions to the entire amount of the preferred stock had been paid into the company's treasury. The common stock controlled the corporation, and the money supplied by the preferred stock had been wasted through fraudulent conduct, illegal investments, and culpable mismanagement. Fraudulent, illegal and wasteful transactions were in contemplation. Members of the board of directors were financially interested in rival enterprises, were not giving their time to the affairs of the company, and dissensions existed among the officers and directors, so that the rights of plaintiff were jeopardized. The company was in imminent danger of insolvency. Its assets consisted largely of gas wells, and unless a receiver were appointed the company would be managed in the interest of its rivals, its assets would be exhausted and squandered, and the preferred stockholders would lose not only their dividends but their investment. The prayer was for judgment for $35, for the appointment of a receiver to conduct the business of the company, and for other relief.

The intervening petitions were of the same character.

The case may be disposed of upon the findings of fact. The evidence appears to have been voluminous, and little of it is abstracted. The plaintiff and the interveners appear to have been satisfied with the findings of fact and rested upon them. This court cannot say that any others should have been made, and under the well-established rule the facts found embrace all the facts of the case open to consideration on appeal.

"Much testimony is quoted by both parties in support of their respective positions upon which neither the referee nor the court made findings. This court can consider the written instruments executed by the parties, other written documents, the pleadings, admissions and stipulations, and findings of fact. It can also consider the evidence upon any branch of the case which is all in depositions, as that procured by the plaintiff to explain his inability to produce the notes [376] and mortgages which Carolus had assumed. But it can not found its judgment upon oral testimony not reduced to findings of fact by the trial court. If the parties desired findings in respect to the matters covered by such testimony a request for further findings should have been made. (Shuler v. Lashhorn, 67 Kan. 694, 74 Pac. 264.) Therefore many matters debated in the briefs are not open to consideration." (Lynds v. Van Valkenburgh, 77 Kan. 24, 33, 93 Pac. 615.)

The findings show that the corporation was organized in 1908, and was authorized to do business in Kansas in July, 1909. Fifty thousand dollars of the common stock were issued to S. R. Walker in exchange for oil and gas leases which cost him but a small sum of money and his labor in obtaining them. A decision of the board of directors that the leases were valuable was implied by the exchange of stock for them, and the charter of the company made such a decision conclusive. The preferred stock was sold at par. Officers of the company received a commission for disposing of this stock, and the finding is that payment of these commissions was unfair treatment of the purchasers of stock. There is no finding that payment for services of this character was ultra vires, or was not regularly provided for, or was accepted with knowledge of illegality. One share of common stock was given with each share of preferred stock. This action the court found to be proper if the board of directors deemed it for the best interest of the company, and there is no finding that the board of directors did not so regard it. Holders of preferred shares purchased other shares of common stock, so that instead of the corporation being controlled by holders of common stock only, the preferred stockholders owned 82 per cent of the common stock.

There is no finding that any officer or director of the corporation was guilty of any fraud or bad faith or breach of trust in any transaction alleged in the petition to be fraudulent, and excepting the criticism for [377] paying commissions on the sale of stock, a matter not alleged in the petition, there is no finding of fraud or bad faith or breach of trust in the conduct or management of any of the company's business. It is expressly found that the expenditures made in Morris and Chase counties and in Oklahoma, which consumed the proceeds of the sale of preferred stock not invested in the Muncie field, were made in good faith and without wrongful intent.

The court found that the laws of Oklahoma did not permit the defendant to hold the stock of the Mal-Millan company, but there is no finding that this fact had any effect whatever on the finances of the defendant. There is no finding that the state of Oklahoma ever complained, or that the operations of the defendant were embarrassed or the value of the investment reduced because of the prohibition. The defendant presents a forceful argument in favor of the legality of the purchase, and if a similar question should ever be presented to the courts of Oklahoma the decision may be interesting to ponder. The subject is of no importance now. The court found that the Mal-Millan company had no property of any value and was considerably in debt, and the investment may be considered as lost through poor business judgment, although the court made the following finding concerning it:

"The investment made in the stock of the Mal-Millan Company has not proven worthless, but the Mal-Millan Company is a going concern, producing the highest grade of crude petroleum found in Oklahoma, which commands the highest market price, and the same is being sold by said Mal-Millan Company as produced, and said Mal-Millan Company is rapidly paying off its debts and getting on a sound financial basis."

Some of the directors, how many is not stated, held interests in other gas companies, their entire attention was not devoted to the defendant's interests, and from about May 1, 1911, to January 4, 1912, there were dissensions among the directors. In August, 1911, the [378] board of directors was increased from nine to eleven members. At the regular stockholders' meeting held on January 4, 1912, more than three months before the referee was appointed to hear the case and eighteen months before the court made its findings of fact, a new board of directors was elected in which no dissension existed, and of which no complaint is made. There is no finding that the business affairs of the defendant were being manipulated in the interest of rival companies by the old board, or were so neglected by the old board as to endanger the welfare of the company, or that the business policies pursued during the period when the directors were inharmonious were not for the best interest of all the stockholders. On the other hand, the findings show that the period from January 1, 1911, until the receiver was appointed in August, 1911, was the period of the company's greatest prosperity. Its earnings were brought up to about $3000 per month through the operation of its gas wells and of a pipe line which had been constructed with money borrowed for the purpose in 1910 with the approval of the entire board. The company was bringing in new gas wells, which policy the referee and the court recommended should be continued. It had rapidly liquidated the indebtedness incurred to build the pipe line and for development work, and was anticipating the payment of dividends which the petition itself alleged the defendant was able to pay. On August 7, 1911, eight days before this suit was commenced, the board of directors by unanimous vote authorized the secretary and treasurer to proceed with the payment of dividends on the preferred stock, and at the same meeting the board of directors by unanimous vote provided for the redemption of the preferred stock and dividends accrued thereon—a part of the relief the plaintiff prayed for—by the creation of a sinking fund for the purpose—a method which the court adopted.

There is no finding of culpable waste or squandering [379] of assets. The findings state that the proceeds of the sale of the preferred stock were spent with entire unanimity on the part of the board of directors. The corporation was engaged in prospecting for gas and oil. It takes no finding by a court to establish the truth of the fact that if wells bored prove to be dry there are no returns. The business judgment of the board of directors, which the plaintiff could impugn only in case of recklessness or extravagance equivalent to breach of trust, is questioned in nothing but the Mal-Millan transaction, which occurred before the plaintiff acquired her stock, and long before the action was commenced the defendant had turned its energy to the development of the Muncie field. Instead of being in imminent danger of insolvency when the receiver was appointed, the findings show the defendant owed but $2500, while it owned a pipe line, practically paid for, which cost $11,000 to build, and owned gas wells which produced a total income of $16,378.19 between February 10 and September 15 and were producing an income of $3000 per month.

At the time the resolution to pay dividends on the preferred stock and to create a sinking fund for the redemption of the preferred stock were adopted the corporation owed debts to the amount of about $5000, which were due and payable. It proceeded to pay out in the liquidation of this indebtedness the sum of $2893.85, which left $19.40 in the treasury. This sum passed into the hands of the receiver upon his appointment.

No demand was made by the plaintiff or by the interveners or by any other stockholder of the company upon the directors for payment of a dividend. Very soon after the suit was commenced the president of the defendant offered personally to pay the plaintiff her dividend but the offer was refused.

The foregoing constitutes a summary of the findings of fact so far as they bear upon the appointment and [380] retention of the receiver. They do not sustain the allegations of the petition upon which the appointment of the receiver was based, and did not warrant the court in continuing to withhold the management of the corporation from those to whom the stockholders and the law committed it.

Generally a corporation may contract with its officers and directors if the transaction be untainted by bad faith. If payment of commissions by the old board of directors on the sale of stock constituted an actionable appropriation of the funds of the company, something which the court refrained from finding, the remedy was for the stockholders to request the board to compel restoration. Doubtless a request upon the new board of January, 1912, would have received attention, but if upon request the board of directors refused to act, the stockholders, or a single stockholder suing for all, could have brought the action. Taking the findings of fact as they stand, employment of the extraordinary remedy of absolute ouster of the old board for accepting commissions for selling stock would have been improper, and application of the remedy to the new board was without any justification.

Bad judgment in the Mal-Millan venture and ill success before the company returned to active exploitation of the Muncie field were not grounds for the appointment of a receiver. The right to supplant the board of directors acting in August, 1911, with a receiver depended upon the financial condition of the company at that time and upon what the policies in process of execution by the board of directors then in authority seemed to promise. Beginning with the determination to build the pipe line, the policies of the company so far as they are disclosed by the findings of fact were sound. Its directors were acting in good faith and within their lawful powers. No single transaction constituting a breach of trust or jeopardizing the welfare of the company is stated. The business [381] was prosperous, and the directorate, instead of denying claims of preferred stockholders, was recognizing them and preparing to satisfy them.

Conceding for present purposes that the plaintiff was entitled to receive a declared dividend on her stock and consequently was a creditor, her claim could not rise superior to the claims of creditors holding current obligations of the company which were due and payable. (Branch v. Jesup, 106 U. S. 468, 475, 1 S. Ct. 495, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 279.) The discharge of those obligations could not constitute misconduct on the part of the defendant's managing officers, much less ground for peremptory removal.

Other supposed grounds for the receivership have been discussed in connection with the statement of the findings of fact. The result is the receiver was improvidently appointed and his retention in office after the court discovered the facts was unjustifiable.

"Before a receiver can properly be appointed it is necessary that the plaintiff should have a probable cause of action against the defendant, and that the benefit to be derived from such cause of action might be lost or substantially impaired if the receiver were not appointed." (Elwood v. Greenleaf First Nat. Bank, 41 Kan. 475, syl. ¶ 4, 21 Pac. 673.)

"Dissatisfaction by a minority of the stockholders of a corporation with its management by the majority, in the absence of fraud or insolvency, is not sufficient to authorize the court to appoint a receiver at the instance of the minority." (Fluker v. Emporia City R. Co. 48 Kan. 577, syl. ¶ 2, 30 Pac. 18.)

"The appointment of a receiver rests largely within the discretion of the court, and before it will take the property and business of a liquidating bank from the control of the directors into its own hands, upon the application of a stockholder, it must appear that the danger of loss or injury to the rights of the plaintiff is clearly proved, and the necessity and right for the appointment of a receiver free from reasonable doubt." (Watkins v. Lawrence Nat. Bank, 51 Kan. 254, syl. ¶ 4, 32 Pac. 914.)

The principle here stated applies with even greater [382] force when it is proposed to take the property and business of a solvent concern in promising circumstances out of the hands of its directors at the instance of a piqued stockholder holding but a slight fraction of the corporate stock.

The decision in the case of Feess v. Mechanics' State Bank, 84 Kan. 828, 115 Pac. 563, L.R.A.1915A, 606, covers all essential features of this case. In view of the full and clear statement of principles contained in that decision it is held that the appointment and retention of the receiver in this case constituted an abuse of judicial discretion.

The plaintiff undertakes to distinguish the Feess case by pointing out that it involved the appointment of a receiver for a solvent bank, one of whose valuable assets was public confidence, and that the receiver was directed to wind up the affairs of the corporation. The effort to distinguish fails. General principles governing the duties of the courts of this state in respect to the appointment of receivers were stated, as the following quotations from the syllabus and the opinion show:

"Under the law a majority of the stockholders have the control of a corporation and the majority of its directors have power to determine the policy to be pursued and to manage and direct its affairs, and the minority must submit to their judgment so long as the majority act in good faith and within the limitation of the law." (Syl. ¶ 7.)

"It was held In Re Lewis, 52 Kan. 660, 35 Pac. 287, that under the code a receiver may be appointed at the suit of a stockholder 'where the business and affairs of a corporation have been so mismanaged that it has become insolvent, and where it is made to appear that all the officers and directors of the same have conspired together to divert its business to another company, dissipate its funds, and fraudulently absorb and apply its assets to the individual benefit of such officers.' (Syl. ¶ 1.) Conduct and conditions less serious than those enumerated would justify the appointment of a receiver, but it is a power that should be sparingly and cautiously exercised. It is a last-resort [383] provision and is only to be employed where there is a pressing necessity and no other adequate remedy is afforded. . . . The policy pursued in respect to loans and discounts seems to have been satisfactory to a majority of the directors and to those owning the controlling interest and more than nine-tenths of the capital stock. Those owning the majority of the stock claimed the right to control the management and policy of the bank, and a number of the matters of which complaint is made grew out of the differences of opinion in respect to what was the better policy. The law gives the majority of the stockholders the right to control the policy and business of a corporation and the minority must submit to their decisions when the majority act in good faith and within their powers.

"It has been said that 'the very foundation principle of a corporation is that the majority of its stockholders have the right to manage its affairs, so long as they keep within their charter rights. No principle of law is more firmly fixed in our jurisprudence than the one which declares that the courts will not interfere in matters involving merely the judgment of the majority in exercising control over corporate affairs.'" (pp. 836, 839.)

Other principles recognized and applied in the Feess case, but not stated so formally, are that business transactions which are merely unwise, irregularities and misconduct which are not so culpable as to jeopardize the corporation and the rights of stockholders, and dissensions among directors, so long as a majority of them control, do not warrant the appointment of a receiver.

The plaintiff further seeks to distinguish the Feess case on the ground that the defendant here was insolvent, and to make the defendant insolvent the total issue of preferred stock in the sum of $50,000 is counted among its liabilities. Besides this, it is claimed the plaintiff was at all times merely a creditor of the corporation and not a stockholder, a view in which the district court concurred.

The plaintiff's stock certificate, copied above, evidenced [384] the rights of a stockholder of the company and not the rights of a bondholder or creditor. The plaintiff purchased shares of the original capital stock of the company, received a certificate of stock, cast her fortunes with the company, took with it the risk of its ventures, and depended upon the net earnings of the company for returns upon her investment. She was not guaranteed a seven per cent annual dividend at all events. If there were no net earnings she received nothing and could not, as creditors may do, appropriate capital or general assets to the satisfaction of her claim. The fact that preferred stock had no vote and the corporation reserved the right to retire preferred stock by redeeming it did not change this express feature of the contract. So long as she remained a stockholder her only source of returns was net earnings, and if there were debts of the company she could not share such assets with creditors, in case of dissolution, but was merely preferred over common stockholders in case there were assets to distribute.

To sustain the contention that the plaintiff was merely a bondholder or creditor and not a stockholder of the corporation and was entitled to interest and not dividends, the plaintiff cites the text found in 10 Cyc. 574 concerning the doctrine that the guaranty of stated dividends creates an absolute debt. This text was deduced from three decisions. The first is Williams v. Parker, 136 Mass. 204. It is based upon a statute. The opinion reads:

"The question which underlies all others in this case is whether the guaranty that each share of the preferred stock 'shall receive semiannual dividends of four dollars on each share' is an absolute guaranty, or is conditional upon the earning of sufficient profits by the corporation. This depends upon the construction to be given to the St. of 1855, c. 143. No condition is expressed in the statute, and the natural meaning of the words used is, that the corporation is to guarantee to each holder of preferred stock that he shall, while the corporation does business, receive semiannual dividends [385] of four dollars on each share; so that, if the net earnings of the corporation are insufficient to pay such dividends, the corporation shall make good the difference out of any property it has. If the legislature had intended that the holders of preferred stock should only be entitled to a preference over the common stockholders in dividends to the extent of four dollars semiannually on each share, and should never receive a greater dividend than this, it would have been easy to express this intention accurately; and the only guaranty required of the corporation would have been, that it should appropriate the net earnings first to the payment of a dividend of four dollars semiannually upon each share of the preferred stock. . . . The cases cited, in which either the preferred stock was issued without statutory authority, or the dividends thereon by the terms of the promise or guaranty were held to be, either expressly or impliedly, payable out of the net earnings of the corporation, afford but little aid in the construction of the St. of 1855, c. 143." (pp. 206, 207.)

The plaintiff's certificate of stock in express terms conditioned payment of dividends on net earnings of the corporation.

The next case cited is West Chester, etc. R. Co. v. Jackson, 77 Pa. St. 321. It arose under a special statute passed to aid a railroad company which required more money to complete its road than could be realized from the sale of authorized stock and bonds. The act recited, "that making a floating debt for that purpose would be onerous to the management of the road and probably unduly hazard the interest of the stockholders" (p. 322), and provided for an issue of preferred stock bearing eight per cent annual dividends payable out of net earnings and redeemable after one year when the profits of the road would justify. The court treated this act as one to enable a corporation to borrow needed money, and said:

"The payment for his shares by Mr. Gray, and the issuing of the certificates to him by the defendant, made as complete a contract as if he had been a purchaser of bonds instead of a subscriber for stock. And his contract rights were precisely defined by the Act of 1855. [386] In effect, it was an agreement for the advance of money to an embarrassed railroad company. A corporation may issue new shares and give them a preference as a mode of borrowing money, where it has power to borrow on bond and mortgage, as preferred stock is only a form of mortgage." (p. 327.)

In the case of Sternbergh v. Brock, 225 Pa. St. 279, 74 Atl. 166, 133 Am. St. Rep. 877, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1078, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said of this decision:

"In West Chester, etc. R. Co. v. Jackson, 77 Pa. St. 321, a loose expression was used, when it was said that 'preferred stock is only a form of mortgage.' Whatever the extent of the preference in that case may have been, speaking generally, stock, whether it be common or preferred, does not represent indebtedness; its possession means ownership of the company." (p. 284.)

The last case cited in support of the Cyc. text is that of Burt v. Rattle, 31 Ohio St. 116. It involved the interpretation of a statute which the court regarded as one to enable corporations of a certain class to borrow money by means of preferred stock. The statute contained a provision relieving holders of preferred stock from liability for debts of the corporation. The constitution of the state imposed individual liability for debts upon stockholders, and if holders of preferred stock issued under the statute were stockholders the statute was unconstitutional. If they were creditors the statute was valid. The preferred stock which was issued was secured by mortgage. The court held that the statute was valid and the preferred stockholders were creditors. Very clearly this decision evidences no general rule, and the position of the supreme court of Ohio on the subject under consideration must be sought for elsewhere. It may be found in the case of Miller v. Ratterman, 47 Ohio St. 141, 24 N. E. 496. A portion of the opinion reads:

"The question in the case is, whether the certificates are certificates of stock or certificates of indebtedness? . . . The relation of a holder of preferred stock is, in some of its aspects, similar to that of a creditor, [387] but he is not a creditor save as to dividends after the same are declared. Nor does he sustain a dual relation to the corporation. He is either a stockholder or a creditor; he cannot, by virtue of the same certificate, be both. If the former, he takes a risk in the concerns of the company, not only as to dividends and a proportion of assets on the dissolution of the company, but as to the statutory liability for debts in case the corporation becomes insolvent; if the latter, he takes no interest in the company's affairs, is not concerned in its property, or profits as such, but his whole right is to receive agreed compensation for the use of the money he furnishes, and the return of the principal when due. Whether he is the one or the other depends upon a proper construction of the contract he holds with the company. . . . As supporting the claim that it was not stock that was issued but certificates of indebtedness, special attention is called in argument to those portions of the certificates which provide that holders shall not vote upon them at any meeting of the holders of the capital stock of the company; that the rights of the holders to the dividends are guaranteed, and are to be secured by mortgage on the property, rights and income; that no further or other mortgage shall thereafter be made to the prejudice of the holders of the preferred stock; that the dividends are guaranteed by The Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton company, which company had executed a mortgage to Stanley Matthews, trustee, to secure the payment of dividends." (pp. 154, 155.)

The decision was that the certificates were certificates of stock and not certificates of indebtedness. In discussing the features of the certificates which are similar to those contained in the plaintiff's certificate, the court said:

"It further stipulates that the holders of the certificates of stock shall not have or exercise the right to vote the same at the meeting of the stockholders of the company, thus indicating that it was stock they intended to authorize the issue of and not certificates of indebtedness, for the inhibition against voting would be wholly useless had it been intended that the holders should become creditors. The provision is not unusual. It is sometimes found in the statute itself.

. . . Nor [388] is it, in this instance unreasonable. The promise to the preferred stockholders was to award them the first net earnings, the holders of the common stock to share in such of the net earnings as they might, by good management, be able to make over and above the eight per cent. As the burden was upon the common stockholders, the power to manage might fairly be left with them. In any view, it is fair to treat the proviso as but an arrangement between two classes of stockholders which did not concern the public. It is true that one characteristic of stock generally is that it can be voted upon. But this is not essential.

. . . Nor did the stipulation guaranteeing to the holders of the preferred stock payment of dividends thereon negative the idea that they were stockholders. It was not a stipulation to pay dividends in any event, but a stipulation to pay only out of surplus profits, for the company must be presumed to have proceeded in view of the terms of the second section of the act referred to, and the general rule of law on the subject. That rule is that payment of dividends to preferred stockholders differs from such payment to the holders of common stock only in that they are entitled to dividends in priority to any dividends upon the common stock. Dividends to either are to come from one common source, to wit: from funds properly applicable to the payment of dividends, that is to say, net earnings. In the nature of things this must be so. As well might one member of a partnership be permitted to appropriate to his own use assets of the firm to the prejudice of creditors, as for a stockholder of a corporation to do it. A contract to permit this to be done would be contrary to public policy and void." (pp. 157, 158.)

[389] The plaintiff's stock falls within the general description of preferred stock given in 10 Cyc. 568:

"Preferred stock is not an indebtedness of the corporation, or an absolute agreement to pay certain dividends upon its shares, but is merely a pledge of its profits in favor of certain shares in preference to the others, in other words an agreement to give a preference to particular shares over the other shares in the division of profits, but only in case there shall be profits to divide. Hence if it appears in any case that no profits have been earned the holders of preferred stock cannot maintain actions against the company to enforce payment of the guaranteed dividends."

The result is the plaintiff was not a creditor of the corporation by virtue of her purchase of preferred stock.

The district court misconceived the law on this subject, regarded the preferred stock as a debt, and held dividends on the preferred stock to be "interest," as appears by the following conclusion of law:

"That at the commencement of this suit the defendant was indebted to plaintiff and said interveners for accrued interest on their said shares of preferred stock as follows, to wit: To plaintiff in the sum of $35; to D. P. Smyers in the sum of $70; to J. M. Smythe in the sum of $7; to Harry Lee Inscho in the sum of $35; and to other holders of its preferred stock of the defendant in the various sums of money which had accrued as interest on said preferred stock up to the commencement of this suit, all aggregating the sum of $1,373.75."

On August 7, 1911, the board of directors of the defendant adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, that the Mid-continent Development Company hereby exercises its option and obligates itself to redeem the preferred stock of this company by paying par value thereof with accrued dividends at the rate of 7% from date of issuance."

"Resolved, that the Mid-continent Development Company shall redeem the preferred stock of this company with accrued dividends; and 75% of the gross [390] earnings, which is from now on, be formed into a sinking fund for that purpose to be known as a preferred stock fund and to be kept and maintained for that purpose, which shall be apportioned to the preferred stockholders as often as 25% of the entire amount due is accumulated and this process of distribution shall continue until the entire amount of the preferred stock and accrued dividends shall have been paid in full."

The court held that these resolutions constituted a contract on the part of the defendant to redeem the preferred stock and to create a sinking fund for that purpose in accordance with the second resolution. Possibly this was true as to those preferred stockholders only who assented to the arrangement. However this may be, the two resolutions must be read together, and when so construed they do nothing more than pledge seventy-five per cent of the gross earnings accruing "from now on" to the redemption of preferred stock. The portion of the gross earnings so set apart was to be apportioned as often as twenty-five per cent of the preferred stock with accrued dividends was accumulated, until all preferred stockholders were paid in full. Holders of preferred stock remained stockholders having no right to demand redemption until an apportionment of accrued earnings was made, and then became creditors only with respect to the apportionment. Any other interpretation of the resolutions perverts their manifest purpose. The only enforceable obligation created by the resolution was to create the sinking fund and make apportionments, and it is idle to say that by virtue of the resolutions the entire issue of $50,000 of preferred stock became a liability of the company to be taken into consideration in determining solvency. It is not claimed that any apportionment of gross earnings was possible within the eight days which elapsed between the adoption of the resolutions and the appointment of the receiver. The bookkeeping liability of a corporation on its capital stock is not a feature in determining solvency, which refers to ability to satisfy [391] creditors. It is not claimed that dividends due on the preferred stock would so deplete assets as to render the corporation insolvent. The express claim is there existed net earnings to pay them. The corporation was solvent, and the claim just stated will now be considered.

The plaintiff in her brief properly describes the action as an equitable one to subject the property of the defendant to payment of her claims as a preferred stockholder.

The dividend assured being payable "yearly . . . from time of issuance" at a stated rate per cent upon the amount of stock, the plaintiff was entitled to a return upon her stock for each year. That is, the dividends were cumulative. The decisions are quite uniform to this effect. The case of Fidelity Trust Co. v. Lehigh Val. R. Co. 215 Pa. St. 610, 7 Ann. Cas. 613, 64 Atl. 829, states the principles and refers to a number of authorities.

The dividend claimed by the plaintiff was payable out of net earnings only.

The findings of fact read as follows:

"5. Finding its operations in Oklahoma wholly remunerative, the defendant resumed work in Wyandotte County, Kansas, in the Muncie field. The defendant found it necessary to build a pipe line for the purpose of connecting the company's wells with certain manufacturing plants, to whom the defendant expected to sell its gas. Up to that time the entire $50,000 of preferred stock had been sold and the money spent. The defendant, therefore, had to borrow and did borrow about $11,000, and used it for the purpose of building said pipe line.

"7. . . . The borrowing of the $11,000, as above stated, was a necessity. This borrowed money was used, as aforesaid, in building said pipe line in the fall and winter of 1910. This line was built with the expectation of furnishing gas to four prospective customers, namely: United Zinc & Chemical Company, the Santa Fe's Icing Company's Plant, the Santa Fe Elevator and the town of Turner, with whom the defendant had contracts for such purpose.

[392] "8. The defendant continued to drill new wells, and the Chemical Company to use more gas until on or about the 10th of August, 1911, the Chemical Company paid to the Development Company about $3,000 in payment of gas consumed during the preceding thirty days. Between February 10th and September 15th, 1911, the defendant received from the Chemical Company for gas the total sum of $16,378.19, and the defendant company applied this money on the repayment of the money borrowed to build the pipe line, in drilling wells and connecting them with the pipe line and in paying the general expenses of the Development Company. This $16,378.19 is the only income ever received by the defendant. The building of the pipe line, the drilling of other wells and connecting them with the pipe line was development work. The money made by the defendant from the sale of its gas in the year 1911 was used, in a great measure, for development work and could properly have been used for the payment, in part at least, of the accrued dividends on the preferred stock.

"11. The gross receipts of sales of gas up to the 15th day of August, 1911, were about $2800 per month; the net receipts were about $2000 per month. As the gas yield in the Muncie field is decreasing in quantity, the Muncie gas field being a shallow one, your Referee considers it good business management and in the interests of the stockholders to drill as much as a well per month. This would cost about $750 or more. The operating expenses would be $500. So a fair estimate of the amount of money which could be devoted to the payment of preferred stock and dividends would be about $1500 per month, or one-half of the gross receipts."

The findings further state that when the resolutions of August 7, 1911, were adopted the company owed $5000, which was then due and payable, which indebtedness had been contracted for building the pipe line, drilling wells, and current expenses. A part of this indebtedness consisted of three promissory notes aggregating $1500, current accounts amounting to $400, and a disputed account of about $600.

The latter part of finding number 8, that the money made by the defendant from the sale of gas in the year 1911 was used in a great measure for development work, and that such money could have been used, in [393] part at least, to pay dividends on preferred stock, states conclusions drawn from the specific facts found. Unless consistent with the specific facts found the conclusions are valueless.

Analyzing the findings of fact, it appears that the total earnings up to September 15, a month after the receiver was appointed, were $16,378.19. What the earnings were up to August 15, when the action was commenced, or up to August 7, when the resolutions were adopted, is not stated. If it be assumed that the earnings for the month preceding September 15 were equal to the average, about $2800, earnings up to the time the action was commenced were about $13,578.19. When the action was commenced the indebtedness of the company was $2500. One thousand dollars of this sum was upon current accounts and so was not a part of the debt incurred for building the pipe line. Not more than $1500 of the money borrowed to build the pipe line remained unpaid. Therefore something like $9500 of the money borrowed to build the pipe line had been paid. Gross receipts from the sale of gas averaged $2800 per month, and net receipts averaged $2000 per month. Average expenses per month were therefore $800. The total expenses for six months were $4800, and for seven months were $5600. Using the smaller sum, the money paid on the pipe-line debt and the money necessary for current expenses would amount to $14,300, or more than the receipts for the period, to say nothing of expenditures for drilling new wells and net earnings available for the payment of dividends.

The findings state the sum of $16,378.19 received from the chemical company was the only income ever received. What became of the contracts with the Santa Fe Iceing Company, the Santa Fe Elevator Company and the town of Turner is not disclosed, and there is no finding that gas sold had not all been paid for. If, however, the average income were $2800 per month, as stated in finding number 11, and the statement is repeated in finding number 15, not copied above, the income [394] from February 10 to August 15 should have been $16,800, and the income to September 15 should have been $19,600.

The result is the findings convict themselves of utter unreliability.

The definition of the term "development work," inserted quite unnecessarily in the findings, may be accepted. The building of the pipe line was development work, but $11,000 of borrowed money were used to build the pipe line. This borrowed money constituted a debt of the corporation incurred antecedent to earnings and in order that there might be earnings. Earnings used to pay that debt were not spent in development work and cannot be counted as a part of the income spent "in a great measure for development work." Suppose the plaintiff were the holder of a certificate of indebtedness, as she claims to be, and that her money had been used to build the pipe line, earnings used to repay her would not be used in development work but in discharging her debt. In finding number 11 it is said that operating expenses for the future consistent with good business management would be about $500 per month. As already shown, the finding is that operating expenses were about $800 per month. Payments for gas sold appear to have been made about the 10th of the month for the preceding thirty days. There must have been operating expenses preceding such payments. Counting from January 1 to August 15 at the rate of $500 per month, operating expenses would amount to $3750. But using the dates specified in the findings, operating expenses from February 10 to August 15 would amount to $3000. This sum added to the sum deduced from the findings as paid on the pipe-line debt makes $12,500 paid out for other than development work. If, therefore, the operating expenses be figured at what they should have been instead of at what they actually were, still finding number 8 that the money made from [395] the sale of gas was used in great measure for development work is untrue.

There is no finding whatever of the number of new wells brought in by the defendant in 1911, or of their cost, or of the cost of connecting them with the pipe line—one of the important subjects of the litigation. It does appear from the financial result of bringing in new wells that the income rose to its highest point, $3000 per month, on August 10. For bringing in new wells the defendant was sued, a receiver was appointed, and judgment was rendered against it. Yet the referee and the court find that the policy of drilling new wells ought to be continued and that earnings ought to be withheld from preferred stockholders for their own benefit sufficient to bring in one new well a month at a cost of $750 or more. If from January to August one new well a month were brought in at a cost of $750 per well, the sum of $6000 was expended in doing that which was inequitable and vicious for the board of directors to do, but which was entirely equitable and just for the receiver to do.

It is manifest that a judgment based upon findings of fact of this character cannot stand.

Whatever the income of the defendant may have been, the findings do show that it was all spent to repay the money borrowed to build the pipe line, to drill wells and to connect them with the pipe line, and to pay general expenses. The existence or nonexistence of net earnings may be determined from these facts.

The case of Burk v. Ottawa Gas, etc. Co. 87 Kan. 6, Ann. Cas. 1913D 772, 123 Pac. 857, involved the equitable right of a stockholder to enforce payment of noncumulative dividends on preferred stock payable out of net profits. The opinion delivered in that case reads as follows:

"The directors of the corporation owed a positive duty to pay a dividend to the preferred stockholders whenever in any year there were net profits available. The funds that might be used for that purpose could not rightfully be expended for extensions merely for [396] the benefit of the business, nor could they be withheld to meet the expenses of the next year. Inasmuch as the only possible source of profit to the preferred stockholder from his investment is the distribution of earnings in the year in which they accrue, he has a right to insist that an accounting shall be taken annually, and that the surplus of one year, available for a dividend, shall not be carried over to meet a possible deficiency of the next.

"The holder of the preferred stock, however, is not generally a creditor until a dividend is declared, but as equity regards as done that which ought to be done, if under the facts of this case a dividend or dividends ought to have been declared in a certain year or years to such stockholders, they should be regarded as creditors to such extent from such time or times, in this equitable action. The company's contract with the preferred stockholder is not to pay him at all events the amount of the net profits of each year up to six per cent, but to declare a dividend on that basis. The obligation to declare a dividend arises only when there is (or as to the stockholder ought to be) money available with which to pay it. Although the business of the year may show the earning of net profits, counting as gain what has gone into betterments, yet if the money taken in has been expended in performance of a duty superior to that owed to the stockholder, no obligation to declare a dividend can arise." (p. 16.)

For obvious reasons the fact that dividends are cumulative and so are not lost for failure to declare them each year may be taken into account in determining whether or not there ought to be money available with which to pay them and in estimating the duties of the corporation to stockholders, and to others, such as creditors.

In the Burk case the only debts of the corporation were fixed charges, so that the rule stated in the syllabus for computing the net profits of the Ottawa Gas Company did not refer to the payment of other debts out of earnings. In the opinion, however, principles general in their application were stated. Although the terms "net profits" and "surplus" were employed, [397] and those terms are technically distinguishable from "net earnings," they were not used in the technical sense, and referred to the same fund which in this case is denominated "net earnings." In the Burk case a superior duty was owed to patrons entitled to extensions. In this case a superior duty was owed to creditors.

The effort of the plaintiff to establish her position as a creditor holding simply a certificate of indebtedness is a tacit acknowledgment that the right of a stockholder to earnings is inferior to the rights of creditors. The plaintiff's preference was merely the preference of one class of stockholders over another class, and no stockholder, preferred or common, could claim as a dividend any portion of earnings necessary to satisfy the matured demands of ordinary general creditors.

It is not necessary to go beyond the plaintiff's brief for authorities on this subject. Speaking generally, net earnings are what remain of gross receipts after deducting the expenses of producing them. Speaking generally, net earnings cannot be withheld to liquidate bonded indebtedness maturing in the future, nor other indebtedness in its nature permanent, nor to liquidate floating indebtedness properly convertible into bonded indebtedness, and a situation might arise in which a corporation ought to borrow money to pay preferred dividends. But as was said in the case of Hazeltine v. Belfast, etc. R. Co. 79 Me. 411, 10 Atl. 328, 1 Am. St. Rep. 330, cited by the plaintiff, the question whether money on hand shall be regarded as net earnings "depends usually on several considerations—is a relative question—not always susceptible of clear demonstration—and is a matter to a considerable extent of good judgment in conducting the company's business and of good faith in upholding its contracts on the part of directors." (p. 416.)

In the case of Belfast, etc. R. Co. v. Belfast, 77 Me. 445, [398] 1 Atl. 362, a case cited by the plaintiff involving the right to a noncumulative dividend, the same court said:

"The difficulty is in deciding what should be considered as net earnings; that is, net earnings such as are applicable to dividends. In a general sense, net earnings are the gross receipts less the expenses of operating the road to earn such receipts. But several kinds of charges must first come out of net earnings before dividends are declared. The creditor comes in for consideration before the stockholder. The property of a corporation is a trust fund pledged for the payment of its debts. Therefore, if there is a bonded, funded, permanent or standing debt, the interest on it must be reckoned out of net earnings. If there is a floating debt, which it is not wise and prudent to place in the form of a funded debt, or to postpone for later payment, that should also be paid. If the financial situation of the company is such as to render it expedient to commence or continue the scheme of a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the company's indebtedness some day or other, an annual contribution out of the net earnings for that purpose would be reasonable." (p. 452.)

Numerous citations of decisions by federal courts appear in the plaintiff's brief, and the rule for estimating net earnings applied by those courts is clear.

"A certificate for shares of stock in a railroad corporation declared that such stock should be entitled to preferred dividends, out of the net earnings, not to exceed a specified rate, after payment of mortgage interest in full. After the certificate was issued, the corporation borrowed money and issued bonds therefor bearing interest, and also took leases, on rent, of connecting railroads: Held, that the holder of the certificate was not entitled to be paid a dividend, before payment of the interest on such bonds, or of such rent." (St. John v. Erie R. Co. 10 Blatch. 271, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,226, syl.)

This decision was affirmed in the case of St. John v. Erie R. Co. 22 Wall. 136, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 743.

In the case of Union Pacific R. Co. v. U. S. 99 U. S. 402, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 274, the rule was extended to allow payment for permanent improvements, consisting of [399] station buildings, shops, etc., out of earnings. The syllabus reads:

"The 'earnings' of the road include all the receipts arising from the company's operations as a railroad company, but not those from the public lands granted, nor fictitious receipts for the transportation of its own property. 'Net earnings,' within the meaning of the law, are ascertained by deducting from the gross earnings all the ordinary expenses of organization and of operating the road, and expenditures made bona fide in improvements, and paid out of earnings, and not by the issue of bonds or stock." (Syl. ¶ 2.)

In the case of Warren v. King, 108 U. S. 389, 2 S. Ct. 789, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 769, it was said:

"Thus he can have no income on his stock unless there are net earnings. Those net earnings are what is left after paying current expenses and interest on debt and everything else which the stockholders, preferred and common, as a body corporate, are liable to pay." (p. 398.)

The brief for the plaintiff directs attention to the rules announced by the highest courts of Connecticut and Massachusetts. The following quotations indicate the views of those courts.

"The general rule, even in the absence of any statute on the subject, is that dividends, in a going concern, can be properly declared and paid only out of profits, and not out of capital, or assets required for the security and payment of creditors. Morawetz on Private Corporations (1st ed.) § 344; Redfield on Railways, § 240; 2 Thompson on Corporations, § 2152. This rule applies whether the stock upon which the dividend is declared is common stock or, as in this case, preferred stock. Warren v. King, 108 U. S. 389 [2 S. Ct. 789, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 769]; Cotting v. New York, etc. R. Co. 54 Conn. 156-169." (Davenport v. Lines, 72 Conn. 118, 128, 44 Atl. 17.)

"A corporation, under statutory authority, issued preferred stock, the certificates of which provided that the holders thereof were entitled to dividends thereon annually out of net profits, in preference to the holders of any other stock of the corporation, to the amount of a certain rate per cent; . . . The capital of the [400] corporation became seriously impaired, and its indebtedness amounted to a large sum, and was payable on demand or on short time. The assets, though appearing to be largely in excess of the indebtedness, would have suffered a very great shrinkage from the valuation put upon them if disposed of to pay debts or to close up the business. During a portion of the time only were there net profits sufficient to warrant the payment of dividends on the preferred stock at the rate named in the certificates. The directors of the corporation refused to declare dividends, in part because they believed that it would endanger the ability of the corporation to pay its debts, and in part because they did not deem it proper so to do on account of the impairment of the capital. Held, that the directors did not appear so plainly to have acted in disregard of the rights of the preferred stockholders as to justify the interference of a court of equity." (Field v. Lamson, etc. Mfg. Co. 162 Mass. 388, syl. ¶ 4, 38 N. E. 1126, 27 L.R.A. 136.)

Citations might be extended indefinitely, but it is not necessary. In the case of Ryan v. Leavenworth, etc. R. Co. 21 Kan. 365, this court said:

"The claims of stockholders in a corporation are subordinate to the claims of creditors, and the stockholders are not entitled to any division of the profits and moneys of a corporation until all its debts are paid." (Syl. ¶ 7.)

The origin of the pipe-line debt was such that it was justly entitled to absorb earnings before stockholders received dividends. It appears to have been payable as the company had funds and what there was left of it in August, 1911, was due. Without elaborating further, in board of directors did not disregard the rights of the preferred stockholders by paying off the pipe-line debt.

The court knows what everybody knows, that the flow of gas from natural gas wells tends to diminish. The bringing in of new wells is not only a necessity to enable a producer to utilize his plant and fulfill his contracts with consumers, but failure to adopt such a policy means ultimate extinction of his business. In such a situation the drilling of new wells is a part of the cost of producing the mineral sold and is properly [401] chargeable to expense. Finding number 11 shows that to have been the situation in the Muncie field. If wells had been brought in and then not used, but simply capped and laid by for future use, the analogy of investing earnings in permanent improvements to the disadvantage of stockholders entitled to annual dividends would hold. But the defendant was simply getting the product of its gas field to market at the cost of drilling new wells. With the pipe-line debt paid dividends were certain, and the plaintiff could lose nothing because her dividends were cumulative. Indeed, the plaintiff would have had fair ground for charging the directors of the defendant with slack management if they had not developed the field and kept up production by drilling new wells. There is no place in the figures disclosed by the findings for excessive expenditures in drilling new wells.

Finding No. 8 being that the total sum earned by the company was expended to repay the money to build the pipe line, to drill wells and connect them with the pipe line, and to pay general expenses, there were no net earnings to distribute.

At the directors' meeting of August 7, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the directors hereby authorize the secretary and treasurer to proceed with the payment of the fixed yearly dividend from date of issuance at 7% and prepare a list of the preferred stockholders with the amount due to each."

At that time there was a little more than $2900 in the treasury, which was at once paid out on the debts of the company. The money was not net earnings, and the duty to pay the debts of the company was superior to the duty to pay dividends on the preferred stock.

The judgment of the district court is reversed and the cause is remanded with direction to sustain the motion to discharge the receiver, sustain the motion for judgment in favor of the defendant on the findings of fact, and render judgment in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff and the interveners for costs.

NOTE.

Preferred Shareholder as Creditor or Stockholder of Corporation.

The holder of preferred or guaranteed shares of stock in a corporation is in general subject to all the liabilities of a holder of common stock, the peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of preferred stock being that it entitles the holder to a preference over other stock in the distribution of corporate profits. See 7 R. C. L. tit. Corporations, p. 200. The holder of preferred stock is entitled to no preference over creditors of the corporation. See the note to Lloyd v. Pennsylvania Vehicle Co. 20 Ann. Cas. 1197. His preferential right is confined to the dividends and these do not become enforceable debts against the corporation until they are declared. See the note to Northwestern Marble, etc. Co. v. Carlson, Ann. Cas. 1913B 552. In other words, a holder of preferred shares is a stockholder and not a creditor of the corporation.

In Hamlin v. Toledo, etc. R. Co. 78 Fed. 664, 47 U. S. App. 422, 24 C. C. A. 271, 36 L.R.A. 826, the court stated the rule thus: "One cannot well be a creditor as respects creditors proper, and a stockholder by virtue of a certificate evidencing his contribution to the capital of the corporation. Stock is capital, and a stock certificate but evidences that the holder has ventured his means as a part of the capital. It is a fixed characteristic of capital stock that no part of it can be withdrawn for the purpose of reimbursing the principal of the capital stock until the debts of the corporation are paid. These principles are elementary. . . . The chance of gain throws on the stockholder, as respects creditors, the entire risk of the loss of his contribution to capital. 'He cannot be both a creditor and debtor by virtue of his ownership of stock.'" So in Hamblock v. Clipper Lawn Mower Co. 148 Ill. App. 618, the court said: "Dividends upon preferred stock are not a debt that is guaranteed. The right to a dividend is not a debt. There is no debt until the dividend is declared, and the right to declare it does not exist until there is a fund from which it can properly be made. Therefore preferred shareholders are not creditors of the company, by virtue of their stock certificates." In St. John v. Erie R. Co. 22 Wall. 136, 2 U. S. (L. ed.) 743, it was said: "The original takers of the preferred stock were creditors. They abandoned that position and became stockholders. They thereupon ceased to be the former, and can only be regarded as the latter. They surrendered their debts and received in return stock of the same amount, which gave them a chance for annual dividends of seven per cent, and a voice by voting in the choice of those by whom the affairs of the company were to be administered. What they were to receive was not interest, but dividends; and they were to receive them in priority to the holders of the common stock." And in Spear v. Rockland-Rockport Lime Co. 113 Me. 285, 93 Atl. 754, the court, holding that a preferred stockholder was not a creditor, said: "He is a stockholder, although his peculiar rights arise from contract. He is a stockholder as to creditors in general, and his rights are subordinate to theirs. He cannot claim dividends out of funds that are needed for, or that properly should be applied to, the payment of debts. . . . He is entitled to a dividend out of net earnings only." In Boston Safe Deposit, etc. Co. v. Adams, 219 Mass. 175, 106 N. E. 590, the court said that preferred stockholders though having the rights of creditors as against the common stockholders were not creditors of the corporation.

On the other hand in Smith v. Southern Foundry Co. 166 Ky. 208, 179 S. W. 205, wherein it appeared that the petition showed that some of the dividend payments of a corporation were past due, it was held that a preferred stockholder might be treated as a corporate creditor to that extent if it appeared that the directors had declared a dividend or that profits had been earned and the directors had refused wrongfully to declare a dividend.

SUTTON

v.

FINDLAY CEMETERY ASSOCIATION.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 27, 1915.

270 Ill. 11; 110 N. E. 315.

Cemeteries — Injunction against Maintenance.

While a cemetery is not a nuisance per se, yet underdrainage of a cemetery, which would pollute a stream used by an adjoining landowner to water his stock, will be enjoined without requiring a prior judgment at law establishing the nature of the nuisance.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A cemetery is not a nuisance per se, and its use cannot be enjoined because offensive commissions by the old board of directors on the sale of stock constituted an actionable appropriation of the funds of the company, something which the court refrained from finding, the remedy was for the stockholders to request the board to compel restoration. Doubtless a request upon the new board of January, 1912, would have received attention, but if upon request the board of directors refused to act, the stockholders, or a single stockholder suing for all, could have brought the action. Taking the findings of fact as they stand, employment of the extraordinary remedy of absolute ouster of the old board for accepting commissions for selling stock would have been improper, and application of the remedy to the new board was without any justification.

Bad judgment in the Mal-Millan venture and ill success before the company returned to active exploitation of the Muncie field were not grounds for the appointment of a receiver. The right to supplant the board of directors acting in August, 1911, with a receiver depended upon the financial condition of the company at that time and upon what the policies in process of execution by the board of directors then in authority seemed to promise. Beginning with the determination to build the pipe line, the policies of the company so far as they are disclosed by the findings of fact were sound. Its directors were acting in good faith and within their lawful powers. No single transaction constituting a breach of trust or jeopardizing the welfare of the company is stated. The business [381] was prosperous, and the directorate, instead of denying claims of preferred stockholders, was recognizing them and preparing to satisfy them.

Conceding for present purposes that the plaintiff was entitled to receive a declared dividend on her stock and consequently was a creditor, her claim could not rise superior to the claims of creditors holding current obligations of the company which were due and payable. (Branch v. Jeaup, 106 U. S. 468, 475, 1 S. Ct. 495, 47 U. S. (L. ed.) 279.) The discharge of those obligations could not constitute misconduct on the part of the defendant's managing officers, much less ground for peremptory removal.

Other supposed grounds for the receivership have been discussed in connection with the statement of the findings of fact. The result is the receiver was improvidently appointed and his retention in office after the court discovered the facts was unjustifiable.

"Before a receiver can properly be appointed it is necessary that the plaintiff should have a probable cause of action against the defendant, and that the benefit to be derived from such cause of action might be lost or substantially impaired if the receiver were

"Dissatisfaction by a minority of the stockholders of a corporation with its management by the majority, in the absence of fraud or insolvency, is not sufficient to authorize the court to appoint a receiver at the instance of the minority." (Fluker v. Emporia City R. Co. 48 Kan. 577, syl. ¶ 2, 30 Pac. 18.)

"The appointment of a receiver rests largely within the discretion of the court, and before it will take the property and business of a liquidating bank from the control of the directors into its own hands, upon the application of a stockholder, it must appear that the danger of loss or injury to the rights of the plaintiff is clearly proved, and the necessity and right for the appointment of a receiver free from reasonable doubt." (Watkins v. Lawrence Nat. Bank, 51 Kan. 254, syl. ¶ 4, 32 Pac. 914.)

The principle here stated applies with even greater [382] force when it is proposed to take the property and business of a solvent concern in promising circumstances out of the hands of its directors at the instance of a piqued stockholder holding but a slight fraction of the corporate stock.

The decision in the case of Feess v. Mechanics' State Bank, 84 Kan. 828, 115 Pac. 563, L.R.A.1915A, 606, covers all essential features of this case. In view of the full and clear statement of principles contained in that decision it is held that the appointment and retention of the receiver in this case constituted an abuse of judicial discretion.

The plaintiff undertakes to distinguish the Feess case by pointing out that it involved the appointment of a receiver for a solvent bank, one of whose valuable assets was public confidence, and that the receiver was directed to wind up the affairs of the corporation. The effort to distinguish fails. General principles governing the duties of the courts of this state in respect to the appointment of receivers were stated, as the following quotations from the syllabus and the opinion show:

"Under the law a majority of the stockholders have the control of a corporation and the majority of its directors have power to determine the policy to be pursued and to manage and direct its affairs, and the minority must submit to their judgment so long as the majority act in good faith and within the limitation of the law." (Syl. ¶ 7.)

"It was held in Re Lewis, 52 Kan. 660, 35 Pac. 287, that under the code a receiver may be appointed at the suit of a stockholder 'where the business and affairs of a corporation have been so mismanaged that it has become insolvent, and where it is made to appear that all the officers and directors of the same have conspired together to divert its business to another company, dissipate its funds, and fraudulently absorb and apply its assets to the individual benefit of such officers.' (Syl. ¶ 1.) Conduct and conditions less serious than those enumerated would justify the appointment of a receiver, but it is a power that should be sparingly and cautiously exercised. It is a last-resort [383] provision and is only to be employed where there is a pressing necessity and no other adequate remedy is afforded.

. . . The policy pursued in respect to loans and discounts seems to have been satisfactory to a majority of the directors and to those owning the controlling interest and more than nine-tenths of the capital stock. Those owning the majority of the stock claimed the right to control the management and policy of the bank, and a number of the matters of which complaint is made grew out of the differences of opinion in respect to what was the better policy. The law gives the majority of the stockholders the right to control the policy and business of a corporation and the minority must submit to their decisions when the majority act in good faith and within their powers.

"It has been said that 'the very foundation principle of a corporation is that the majority of its stockholders have the right to manage its affairs, so long as they keep within their charter rights. No principle of law is more firmly fixed in our jurisprudence than the one which declares that the courts will not interfere in matters involving merely the judgment of the majority in exercising control over corporate affairs.'" (pp. 836, 839.)

Other principles recognized and applied in the Feess case, but not stated so formally, are that business transactions which are merely unwise, irregularities and misconduct which are not so culpable as to jeopardize the corporation and the rights of stockholders, and dissensions among directors, so long as a majority of them control, do not warrant the appointment of a receiver.

The plaintiff further seeks to distinguish the Feess case on the ground that the defendant here was insolvent, and to make the defendant insolvent the total issue of preferred stock in the sum of $50,000 is counted among its liabilities. Besides this, it is claimed the plaintiff was at all times merely a creditor of the corporation and not a stockholder, a view in which the district court concurred.

The plaintiff's stock certificate, copied above, evidenced [384] the rights of a stockholder of the company and not the rights of a bondholder or creditor. The plaintiff purchased shares of the original capital stock of the company, received a certificate of stock, cast her fortunes with the company, took with it the risk of its ventures, and depended upon the net earnings of the company for returns upon her investment. She was not guaranteed a seven per cent annual dividend at all events. If there were no net earnings she received nothing and could not, as creditors may do, appropriate capital or general assets to the satisfaction of her claim. The fact that preferred stock had no vote and the corporation reserved the right to retire preferred stock by redeeming it did not change this express feature of the contract. So long as she remained a stockholder her only source of returns was net earnings, and if there were debts of the company she could not share such assets with creditors, in case of dissolution, but was merely preferred over common stockholders in case there were assets to distribute.

To sustain the contention that the plaintiff was merely a bondholder or creditor and not a stockholder of the corporation and was entitled to interest and not dividends, the plaintiff cites the text found in 10 Cyc. 574 concerning the doctrine that the guaranty of stated dividends creates an absolute debt. This text was deduced from three decisions. The first is Williams v. Parker, 136 Mass. 204. It is based upon a statute. The opinion reads:

"The question which underlies all others in this case is whether the guaranty that each share of the preferred stock 'shall receive semiannual dividends of four dollars on each share' is an absolute guaranty, or is conditional upon the earning of sufficient profits by the corporation. This depends upon the construction to be given to the St. of 1855, c. 143. No condition is expressed in the statute, and the natural meaning of the words used is, that the corporation is to guarantee to each holder of preferred stock that he shall, while the corporation does business, receive semiannual dividends [385] of four dollars on each share; so that, if the net earnings of the corporation are insufficient to pay such dividends, the corporation shall make good the difference out of any property it has. If the legislature had intended that the holders of preferred stock should only be entitled to a preference over the common stockholders in dividends to the extent of four dollars semiannually on each share, and should never receive a greater dividend than this, it would have been easy to express this intention accurately; and the only guaranty required of the corporation would have been, that it should appropriate the net earnings first to the payment of a dividend of four dollars semiannually upon each share of the preferred stock. . . . The cases cited, in which either the preferred stock was issued without statutory authority, times not been strictly adhered to. In cases where, although the thing sought to be restrained is not a nuisance per se, the right to that relief is so clear as to be free from substantial doubt the relief will be granted without first resorting to an action at law to declare the thing a nuisance. This question was fully discussed in Pana v. Central Washed Coal Co. 260 Ill. 111, 102 N. E. 992, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, where the authorities on the subject are cited and reviewed and the rule approved that if there is a substantial dispute as to the fact or law and the question is in doubt, a trial at law will be required before equity will interfere. It is only in cases where the unreasonable or unlawful use of property to the injury of others is clearly proved that it is unnecessary the question should first be determined in an action at law.

Barrett v. Mt. Greenwood Cemetery Assoc. supra, was a proceeding in equity to enjoin the drainage of a cemetery into a running stream of water, and the injunction was sustained without requiring a resort first to an action at law. Some portions of the cemetery grounds were so wet and swampy that water would rise in openings dug for graves to such an extent as to cause their abandonment. It was proposed to under-drain this land and empty the drainage into a running stream of water which flowed through the land of complainants. The stream was fed from springs, and the water from it was used by complainants for stock, for cows kept for dairy purposes, for making ice, and to some extent for domestic purposes. One of the complaining parties harvested ice to the extent in value of from $5000 to $6000 a year and sold it for refrigerating and domestic purposes or use. The court said that the conclusion that the water percolating through the [18] soil into the tile and thence running into the brook would contaminate the water therein and render it unfit for some of the purposes for which it was used was established by a clear preponderance of the evidence and was in accord with common understanding.

We are of opinion the evidence in this case left it free from substantial doubt that the proposed under-drainage of defendant's cemetery would contaminate and injuriously affect the water on complainant's premises for the uses to which it was put, and complainant was therefore entitled to the writ of injunction restraining the under-drainage of the cemetery into the branch. The chancellor erred in not so decreeing, but did not err in denying the injunction as prayed in the amended prayer, restraining the use of the land for burial purposes.

The complainant contends that even without the under-drainage the burial of human bodies in the cemetery will contaminate the air on complainant's land and pollute the water of the branch. The court sustained defendant's objection to the plaintiff's offer of proof upon this question. In view of the character and lay of this land and the nature of the proof proposed to be made, we are satisfied it could not, under the rules of law above referred to, have justified awarding the writ of injunction. The great weight of the proof showed the land was not low, swampy land. It slopes from south to north, and in a distance of about thirty rods, which is its width, has a fall of from five to eight feet. Water does not accumulate and stand on it, nor is it water-logged, as charged in the amendment to the bill. Water on its surface finds its way with reasonable speed into the branch, and even if complainant's witnesses had been permitted to testify, and had testified, that in their opinion the use of the land for burial purposes, without any under-drainage, would injuriously affect complainant's premises and pollute the water of the branch, the very nature of the case is such it would not have established [19] the fact so clearly and free from substantial doubt as to have justified enjoining, in this proceeding, the use of the land as a burial ground. It is not enough that it threatened to or might become a nuisance, but the proof would be required to go to the extent of satisfactorily showing that a nuisance is inevitable from the proposed use of the premises. In McCutchen v. Blanton, 59 Miss. 116, it was said: "Every doubt should be solved against the restraint of a proprietor in the use of his own property for a purpose seemingly lawful and conducive both to individual gain and the general welfare. Relief by injunction is so severe in its consequences that it is not to be granted in such a case except when the right to it is clearly and conclusively made out. To interfere with one's right to use his own land for the production of what he pleases, in a case of doubt, would be a flagrant abuse of power. It is not enough to show a probable and contingent injury, but it must be shown to be inevitable and undoubted." This is the rule in this State and generally throughout the United States. A cemetery may be objectionable or offensive to the taste of an adjoining owner but it is not a nuisance per se, and its use cannot be enjoined merely because it is offensive to the esthetic sense of an adjoining proprietor. Before it can be abated or its use enjoined it must be clearly and satisfactorily proven to be a nuisance, and this cannot be done by evidence tending to show that it might become such.

Under the proof we think the Appellate Court erroneously remanded the case with directions to the trial court to grant the decree as prayed in the bill as amended, and its judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded to the trial court, with directions to grant an injunction restraining the defendant from under-draining its cemetery grounds into the west fork of the Eversman branch and denying the other relief prayed.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Rehearing denied December 9, 1915.

NOTE.

Equitable Relief against Cemetery as Nuisance.

In the earlier cases involving the granting of equitable relief against the establishment or maintenance of a cemetery on the ground of its being a nuisance, it was held generally that cemeteries are not nuisances per se, but that the question whether a particular cemetery is a nuisance is to be decided according to the circumstances of the case, and that unless a cemetery is shown to be a nuisance in fact its establishment or maintenance will not be enjoined. Braasch v. Cemetery Assoc. etc. 69 Neb. 300, 5 Ann. Cas. 132; Nelson v. Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Cemetery Assoc. 111 Minn. 149, 20 Ann. Cas. 790. The foregoing doctrine is recognized by the reported case as well as by other recent cases. Harper v. Nashville, 136 Ga. 141, 70 S. E. 1102; New Orleans v. St. Louis Church, 11 La. Ann. 244; Morton v. St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church Soc. 56 Misc. 71, 105 N. Y. S. 1100; Wahl v. Methodist Episcopal Cemetery Assoc. 197 Pa. St. 197, 46 Atl. 913. Thus, in Harper v. Nashville, supra, the court said: "Cemeteries are a necessity. A place where the dead may be given decent Christian burial must be established, and the location of such must necessarily be upon some tract of land more or less suitable and commodious; and it is impossible to find a tract of land that is not contiguous to the lands of some one else. And inasmuch as cemeteries must be established and should be located where they are reasonably accessible, it is rarely possible to so fix their location, when they are designed for the use of a populous town or city, where they will not be in more or less close proximity to some residence; and unless the soil of the land used as a cemetery and that of the contiguous owners is such as to cause a drainage which will produce a contamination of the waters, thereby putting in jeopardy the health or lives of the owners of the contiguous lands and the health of their families, or unless the air would be contaminated, courts of equity will not interfere by the grant of injunctive relief to prevent the establishment and location of the cemetery.

Cemeteries are not per se nuisances, and it is only in exceptional cases that their establishment and location would be enjoined by a court of equity. Where it is shown that the location of a cemetery in some place would contaminate the water used for drinking purposes or for watering cattle or other domestic animals, and that thereby the health of the residents upon the adjacent lands would be endangered, and that some other place sufficiently convenient and accessible could be procured, and that the location of the cemetery at the latter place is not objectionable upon any valid ground, equity might interfere to prevent its location in the place where it is shown there are sound reasons for apprehending danger to the life or health of those residing nearby."

Before a cemetery can be abated or its use enjoined, it must be clearly and satisfactorily proven to be a nuisance, and this cannot be done by evidence merely tending to show that it might become such. See the reported case. See also Morton v. St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church Soc. 56 Misc. 71, 105 N. Y. S. 1100; Wahl v. Methodist Episcopal Cemetery Assoc. 197 Pa. St. 197, 46 Atl. 913. And since a cemetery is not a nuisance per se, its use cannot be enjoined merely because it is offensive to the esthetic sense of an adjoining proprietor, however objectionable or offensive it may be to his taste. See the reported case.

While cemeteries may become nuisances in fact, and as such are subject to injunctive action by the health authorities, an order of a local board of health that the use of the defendant's lands or any part thereof for cemetery purposes will be detrimental to the public health and therefore is prohibited, will not be upheld where it appears that the only consequences of an evil nature that can be anticipated from the use of the defendant's land for cemetery purposes are the remote possibility of the contamination of wells in its vicinity (which are already endangered by the close proximity of privies), and the distribution of disease germs by the air, as these dangers are too slight and uncertain to be the basis of injunctive relief. Morton v. St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church Soc. 56 Misc. 71, 105 N. Y. S. 1100.

In the reported case it is held that in cases where, although the cemetery sought to be restrained is not a nuisance per se, the right to equitable relief by injunction is so clear as to be free from substantial doubt, relief will be granted without resorting to an action at law to declare the thing a nuisance. So, in a case wherein it appeared that the proposed underdrainage of a cemetery would discharge into a watercourse and would contaminate and injuriously affect the water on the complainant's premises for the uses to which it was put, the watering of his stock, etc., it was held that the complainant was entitled to a writ of injunction restraining the underdrainage of the cemetery into the watercourse. Barrett v. Mt. Greenwood Cemetery Assoc. 159 Ill. 385, 42 N. E. 891, 50 Am. St. Rep. 168, 31 L.R.A. 109. And see the reported case.

Where a cemetery constitutes a nuisance, under the circumstances of the case, its continuance may be enjoined. Furstenburg v. Brissey, 28 Okla. 591, 115 Pac. 465. See also Palmer v. Hickory Grove Cemetery, 84 App. Div. 600, 82 N. Y. S. 973, affirmed 106 App. Div. 613, 95 N. Y. S. 1150. Thus, where a statute (Comp. Laws Okla. 1909, § 966) declared it to be unlawful for any person, corporation or association to establish or maintain a cemetery less than three-fourths of a mile from any tract of land platted as an addition to any city or town, or platted into blocks to be sold for residence purposes, wherein lots had been sold, and declared (§ 967) the maintenance of a cemetery in violation of the act to be a nuisance, and provided for its abatement by an action by the owner of any lot within the lands platted, it was held that a person bringing himself within the statute was entitled to an injunction against the establishment of a cemetery within the prohibited area. Furstenburg v. Brissey, 28 Okla. 591, 115 Pac. 465. And likewise, under a statute (Stat. Wis. 1898, § 1454) prohibiting the establishment of a cemetery within fifteen rods of any habitable dwelling, it has been held that an injunction would lie against a violation thereof, and that the fact that the first grave in a plot of land proposed to be used as a cemetery was a little more than fifteen rods from a house made no difference, as the statute was aimed at the grounds as a whole, and it was unquestionable that a considerable part of the grounds laid out and actually used for burial purposes were within the limit. Maede v. Broehm, 151 Wis. 563, 139 N. W. 408.

In Austin v. Austin City Cemetery Assoc. 87 Tex. 330, 28 S. W. 528, 47 Am. St. Rep. 114, it was held that a cemetery was entitled to an injunction against the enforcement of a void ordinance declaring a person to be guilty of a misdemeanor who buried the body of any human being within the corporate limits of the city. And in an opinion following that decision (28 S. W. 1023), it was held that the fact that a cemetery was used and controlled by the city within its limits was not a standard for use in determining whether other cemeteries of like condition would or would not be nuisances. In Stanley v. Hill, 135 Ga. 711, 70 S. E. 577, an action to enjoin the establishment of a cemetery, it was held that under a town charter, the mayor and the council had the power to prohibit the establishment of a cemetery within the town limits, and where the uncontradicted evidence showed that they had taken affirmative action to that end, it was held that it was not error to direct a verdict which had the effect of enjoining the establishment of the cemetery. In Union Cemetery Assoc. v. Kansas City, 252 Mo. 466, 161 S. W. 261, it was held that an ordinance prohibiting all future burials in a cemetery was unreasonable and void, and its enforcement would be enjoined, where it appeared that the ordinance was not passed for the protection of the public health, but was passed at the instigation of real estate agents and speculators who thought the cemetery stood in the way of the city's development in that direction.

The validity of state or municipal regulations or restrictions as to the burial of the dead is discussed in the note to Laurel Hill Cemetery v. Francisco, 14 Ann. Cas. 1080.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK

v.

G. GESKE AND COMPANY.

Washington Supreme Court—May 14, 1915.

85 Wash. 477; 148 Pac. 593.

Frauds, Statute of — Necessity of Pleading as Defense.

The defense of statute of frauds is waived, not being pleaded or otherwise raised in the trial court, though the complaint fully disclosed the basis of plaintiff's claim.

[See 78 Am. St. Rep. 650, and see generally Ann. Cas. 1912D 46.]

Delivery Avoiding Statute — Constructive Delivery.

Where G. orders lumber of F., and F. then orders of T., and T. on the order of and primarily billing it to F. delivers it to G., this amounts to a delivery to F., and by F. to G.; the latter, under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5290, taking F.'s contract for sale to G. out of the statute of frauds.

[See note at end of this case.]

Sales — Parties to Transaction.

There is not a sale by T. to G., where G. ordered lumber of F., and F. ordered it of T., and T. delivered it to G., and primarily billed it to F., and wrote G. to protect it, though after F. ordered it of T. G. promised T. to see that it got its money.

Liability for Purchase Money — Defenses — Payment to Third Person.

Regarding right of recovery from G. by the assignee of F.'s claim for the price of lumber which F. sold G., it is immaterial that G., knowing of the assignment, under its oral promise, void under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5289, to see that T., who had sold the lumber to F., got its money, paid T.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county:
SMITH, Judge.

Action by First National Bank, plaintiff, against G. Geske and Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

William Wray for appellant.
James Kiefer for respondent.

[478] ELLIS, J.—This is an action by the assignee of a bill for a sale of lumber against the purchaser for the purchase price. Prior to July 26, 1914, the Farrell Lumber Company, a copartnership, had a contract with the defendant, G. Geske & Company, a corporation, to furnish lumber for the construction of a bridge. On that day a car load of lumber was needed which the Farrell Lumber Company could not furnish at once. It therefore ordered the lumber from the Taylor Mill Company, a corporation, at the purchase price of $231.30, directing that it be delivered to the defendant. To hasten the matter, one Snyder, president of the defendant, on the same day called upon the Taylor Mill Company and urged the necessity of getting the lumber out promptly. The representatives of the Taylor Mill Company demurred, asking assurance of payment. Snyder replied, in effect, "I will see that you get your money," or "I will stand good for it." It is undisputed that at this time Snyder asked that the lumber be billed to the Farrell Lumber Company because he was buying it from them and wanted the account kept entire, saying, "When I am buying lumber from them (Farrell Lumber Company) I want it all kept together. You send one bill to them and one to me and I will see that you get your money." The salesman and billing clerk of the Taylor Mill Company so testified, and Snyder testified to the same effect and in almost the same terms. The evidence is also undisputed that the Farrell Lumber Company knew nothing of this conversation.

It seems clear that the Taylor Mill Company, at the time it took the order from the Farrell Lumber Company, took it without demurrer and intended to fill it for the Farrell Lumber Company, and actually did so at once, and a little later [479] actually billed it to the Farrell Lumber Company, without demurrer and without notice that it claimed to be selling the lumber to Geske &

Company direct. The bill or invoice was dated August 4, 1913, and reads: "Sold to Farrell Mill Company for Geske & Co., Renton." Then follows the car number and an itemized description of the lumber with the aggregate selling price, $231.30. It is unquestioned that the Farrell Lumber Company immediately assigned this account to the plaintiff and received thereon ninety per cent of its face at the time of the assignment. There is no evidence whatever that the plaintiff ever had any knowledge or notice that the Taylor Mill Company claimed that the sale was made to Geske & Company.

There is evidence that, at the time of this sale, the Taylor Mill Company was indebted to the Farrell Lumber Company in a sum equal to or a little more than the amount of this order, and the Farrell Lumber Company credited the Taylor Mill Company with the amount of this order on that account. There is evidence also of subsequent transactions which would have changed this balance, but we regard this as immaterial on the real issue as to whether the transaction here in question is to be regarded as a sale to the Farrell Lumber Company or to Geske & Company.

The court found that the Farrell Lumber Company sold and delivered the lumber to the defendant, Geske & Company, at an agreed price of $231.30; that immediately thereafter the Farrell Lumber Company, by an assignment in writing, transferred to the plaintiff its account and claim against the defendant for the purchase price of the lumber, in consideration of an advance then made by the plaintiff to the Farrell Lumber Company, and that no part of the money due thereon has been paid. The court concluded, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the amount mentioned, with interest and costs. Judgment went accordingly, and the defendant has appealed.

[480] The appellant contends that there can be no recovery in this action because the contract price for the lumber was more than fifty dollars and there was no memorandum of the sale in writing signed by the party to be charged, as required by the statute of frauds, Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5290 (P. C. 203, § 5). There is no merit in this contention. The statute of frauds was not pleaded as a defense nor raised in any other manner in the court below, though the complaint fully disclosed the basis of the respondent's claim. Moreover, the lumber was actually delivered, thus bringing the case within the exception made by the statute itself. To avoid this fact, it is argued that there was no competent evidence of the delivery. We shall not discuss the evidence, since the answer admits the delivery of the lumber to the appellant, and the evidence, as we have seen, clearly shows that it was delivered on the order of, and primarily billed to, the Farrell Lumber Company. This was equivalent to a delivery to that company and by it to the appellant.

Nor do we find any merit in the claim that this lumber was sold directly to the appellant by the Taylor Mill Company. The fact that appellant's president, after the order had been made by the Farrell Lumber Company, promised to see that the Taylor Mill Company would get its money did not make the sale a sale direct to the appellant. On the contrary, his statement at the time to the effect that, since he was buying from the Farrell Lumber Company, he wanted it all kept together and directed that a bill be sent to the Farrell Lumber Company, clearly indicates that he then regarded the sale as being made to that company. The fact that the Taylor Mill Company complied with his request and sent the bill according to his direction also shows that the Taylor Mill Company regarded the Farrell Lumber Company as the purchaser and primarily liable for the debt. At the time the duplicate bill was mailed, the Taylor Mill Company wrote Geske & Company:

[481] "Confirming conversation with your Mr. Snyder recently we ask you to protect us to the amount of $231.30 on account lumber delivered to Renton for the Farrell Mill Co."

This letter on its face clearly shows that at that time the transaction was not regarded by the Taylor Mill Company as a sale directly to Geske & Company. A remittance was not requested, but merely "We ask you to protect us," thus clearly indicating that the Farrell Lumber Company was the one to whom credit was primarily given.

The fact that the appellant has paid this bill to the Taylor Mill Company is immaterial. Whatever its moral duty in the premises, it was under no legal obligation to do so. Under the evidence here presented, its promise was a mere verbal undertaking to answer for the debt of another. It was not in writing, and hence could not have been enforced. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 5289 (P. C. 203, § 3); Pressentin v. Hawkeye Timber Co. 77 Wash. 388, 137 Pac. 999; Goldie-Klenert Distributing Co. v. Bothwell, 67 Wash. 264, 121 Pac. 60, Ann. Cas. 1913D 849.

This payment raises no equity in appellant's favor, since its president admitted that he knew the bill had been assigned to the respondent when he made the payment to the Taylor Mill Company and took from that company a bond for protection in making the payment. This evidence was clearly competent as tending to show that the appellant never regarded itself as primarily liable for the debt.

The findings of the trial court were clearly supported by the evidence. The judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

Symbolical or Constructive Delivery of Goods within Statute of Frauds.

Introductory, 566.

General Rule:

Symbolical Delivery, 566.

Constructive Delivery in Absence of Symbol, 567.

Requisites of Delivery:

Intent of Parties, 568.

Right to Possession, 569.

Introductory.

This note discusses the question that arises under the statute of frauds where there has been no actual delivery of the goods sold but it is claimed that there has been a constructive delivery, by the passing of a symbol or otherwise, sufficient to dispense with the statutory requirement of written evidence of the sale. The scope of the note does not extend to the question of the delivery of goods as effective to pass title where the statute of frauds is not involved, nor does it include a consideration of what acts amount to a receipt or acceptance within the statute, except as those acts are judicially treated with reference to constructive delivery.

For cases on the subject of a delivery to a carrier as taking a sale of goods out of the statute of frauds, see the notes to Gatiss v. Cyr, 2 Ann. Cas. 544, and Kemensky v. Chapin, 9 Ann. Cas. 1168. The continuance of an existing possession by a vendee as a sufficient delivery to take a verbal sale of goods out of the statute is discussed in the notes to J. H. Silkman Lumber Co. v. Hunholz, 13 Ann. Cas. 713, and Wilson v. Hotchkiss, reported post, this volume, at page 570. The act of a buyer in selling or offering to sell goods as a sufficient acceptance to satisfy the statute is considered in the note to Beedy v. Brayman Woodenware Co. Ann. Cas. 1913B 273.

General Rule.

SYMBOLICAL DELIVERY.

The general rule is that the delivery of goods required by the statute of frauds in the absence of payment or a written memorandum of the sale is not necessarily an actual delivery. Where the goods are of ponderous bulk, a delivery of such evidence of title as confers the right to immediate possession, when made with the intent to pass and receive the title and possession, is a symbolical delivery of the goods and has been generally held to be a constructive delivery sufficient to satisfy the statute. Searle v. Keeves, 2 Esp. (Eng.) 598 (order for delivery of barrels of rice); Currie v. Anderson, 2 El. & El. 592, 105 E. C. L. 592 (bill of lading); Puckett v. Reed, 31 Ark. 131 (ginner's receipt for cotton, entitling holder to possession); King v. Jarman, 35 Ark. 190, 37 Am. Rep. 11 (order for delivery of cotton in warehouse); Lewis-Simas-Jones Co. v. Kee, 27 Cal. App. 135, 148 Pac. 973 (order for potatoes stored in warehouse); Reed v. Copeland, 50 Conn. 472, 47 Am. Rep. 663 (certificate of stock); Bass v. Walsh, 39 Mo. 192 (sale ticket of bales of hay on wharf); Mueller v. Guye, 12 Mo. App. 589 (order entitling bearer to goods); Wilkes v. Ferris, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 335, 4 Am. (Eng.) 119 (holding that a wharfinger's warrant is no more than an offer to hold the goods as warehouseman, and that the wharfinger holds as agent of the vendor or consignor until he agrees to hold for the assignee); Gooch v. Holmes, 41 Me. 523 (delivery of order for bank bills on deposit held to be no delivery of the bills).

"The statute has never been, in this state, nor in England, whence we derived it, construed to abolish the doctrine of symbolical delivery. Whoever receives in such mode as the nature of the property or its situation makes necessary, receives as actually as by manual caption, or asportation, or some direct interference with the corpus of the property. With regard to bulky articles, or those not immediately accessible, symbolical delivery, by something which may be proved in pais, of a satisfactory nature, satisfies the reason and policy of the statute. . . . The order for delivery, although not evidence of a contract, nor even a memorandum of one, was nevertheless a thing absolutely potent to confer the right of immediate possession, except as against warehouse liens (of which none are shown), and even stronger evidence of that right, than would have been a gin receipt. The jury, under the evidence and law of the case, as presented by the court, did not err in finding that the defendants received the cotton. This satisfies the statute." King v. Jarman, 35 Ark. 190, 37 Am. Rep. 11.

CONSTRUCTIVE DELIVERY IN ABSENCE OF SYMBOL.

A constructive delivery other than by the delivery of a symbol has been held to be a sufficient compliance with the statute of frauds. Salter v. Woollams, 2 M. & G. 650, 40 E. C. L. 559; Chaplin v. Rogers, 1 East. (Eng.) 192; Nicholls v. White, 103 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 800; Brown v. Wade, 42 Ia. 647; Smith v. Bloom, 159 Ia. 592, 141 N. W. 32. See also Dixon v. Buck, 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 70; Reinhart v. Gregg, 8 Wash. 191, 35 Pac. 1075; Pike v. Vaughn, 39 Wis. 499. Thus, in Brown v. Wade, supra, the question was whether there had been a delivery of cattle. It appeared that the seller pointed out certain of his cattle which were running with others in the pasture and designated their price, and the purchaser agreed to take the cattle at the stipulated price. The court held that there was a delivery of the cattle, saying: "What constitutes a delivery depends largely upon the character and situation of the property. . . . See 3 Parsons on Contracts, 5 ed. p. 34, and cases cited. On page 44 of the same work it is said: 'We think that if the seller does in any case what is usual, or what the nature of the case makes convenient and proper, to pass the effectual control of the goods from himself to the buyer, this is always a delivery.' This rule seems to us eminently just and practical. Nothing more should be required than what is usual, convenient and proper. See also Story on Sales, fourth edition, p. 282 and cases cited. The evidence shows that the cattle were running out on the range. All that was necessary to complete the sale was that the right of dominion over them should be transferred from Brown to Davis. To this end it could not be necessary that Davis should take them into his manual custody, and drive them off the range, or remove them to another part of it. The interest and the convenience of the purchaser required that the cattle should remain where they were, and he had a right to leave them there. It was only necessary that the cattle should be pointed out, that Brown should agree that Davis might have them in part pay for the land, and that Davis should agree to take them as such payment where they were and as they were, and then the delivery was complete." So in Nicholls v. White, 103 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 800, the court said: "There are certain cases to which this principle of constructive delivery and receipt do not apply, but there are others to which it is not unreasonable that it should apply, and the sale of a haystack standing upon his own land by a farmer is, according to one's knowledge of what happens, the sort of case to which one would not be unwilling to apply the principle of constructive delivery and constructive receipt. What happens every day is that a farmer sells a stack of hay, and the sale carries with it a license to the buyer to come and cut it at reasonable hours without asking permission. The buyer or the seller or a third person may cart the hay away. Meanwhile the hay remains on the vendor's land as much, and no more in his physical possession, as it was before it was sold. But he has, it may be said, parted with the possession because he has given constructive permission to the purchaser to come and handle the hay as and when he likes. And the purchaser has constructively accepted the hay, because it was the intention of the parties that he should get no further delivery of it. It seems to me that there is no case to which the doctrine of constructive delivery and receipt could be better applied. But there must be evidence of such constructive delivery and receipt. Putting aside the oral evidence as found by the learned judge in this case there are two documents before us. What is the meaning of the first document, the telegram which the defendant sent: 'Don't send press; am writing' It means, 'If I (the defendant) did not send a telegram, I know that you would send the press.' Is not that very good evidence that the defendant had delivered possession of this hayrick to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was not only entitled to send but would send his men whenever he chose to cut and tie this hay? It seems to me that that by itself might be very good evidence that the vendor had done all he could to deliver possession to the purchaser. Then comes the defendant's letter in which he says: 'Would you be kind enough to give up possession?' How is that document got over by saying that the man did not know what he was saying? Why should he not know? He knew the trade, and he knew what he had done in regard to the sale. In these circumstances I think that there was evidence of constructive delivery and receipt of this hay."

In Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 399, 3 Am. Dec. 509, it was said: "We do not wish to shake any of the cases in which the actual delivery required by the statute has been dispensed with, but those cases have gone far enough; our leaning should be towards the plain meaning of the statute. The circumstances which are to be tantamount to an actual delivery, should be very strong and unequivocal, so as to take away all doubt as to the intent and understanding of the parties." In Shindler v. Houston, 1 N. Y. 261, 40 Am. Dec. 316, it appeared that the parties met on the dock where some lumber belonging to the plaintiff was piled, they agreed on a sale at a certain price, and the plaintiff said: "The lumber is yours." The court held that there was no delivery, saying: "The declarations relied upon as evidence of a delivery and acceptance constitute a part of the contract, and of course are obnoxious to all the evils and every objection against which it was the policy of the law to provide. The acts of part payment, of delivery and acceptance mentioned in the statute are something over and beyond the agreement of which they are a part performance, and which they assume as already existing. . . . I am aware that there are cases in which it has been adjudged, that where the articles sold are ponderous a symbolical or constructive delivery will be equivalent in its legal effect to an actual delivery. The delivery of a key of a warehouse in which goods sold are deposited furnishes an example of this kind. But to aid the plaintiff, an authority must be shown that a stipulation in the contract of the sale, for the delivery of the key or other indicia of possession, will constitute a delivery and acceptance within the statute. No such case can be found. The entire contract being void by the statute the stipulation in reference to a constructive delivery would fall with the other provisions."

Whether there has been constructive delivery is a mixed question of law and fact. Atwell v. Miller, 6 Md. 10, 61 Am. Dec. 294; Bass v. Walsh, 39 Mo. 192.

Requisites of Delivery.

INTENT OF PARTIES.

The intent of the parties is a necessary part of a constructive delivery. Brand v. Focht, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 409, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 185, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 225, affirming 26 Super. Ct. 426, 30 How. Pr. 313; Smith v. Mason, Anth. N. P. 146, 7 N. Y. Com. L. Rep. 100; Pike v. Vaughn, 39 Wis. 499. Where delivery of a part is relied on as constructive delivery of the whole, it must appear that the part was delivered as representative of the whole. Ladnier v. Ladnier, 90 Miss. 475, 43 So. 946. The delivery of a sample as such is not a symbolical delivery of the goods. Richardson v. Smith, 101 Md. 15, 4 Ann. Cas. 184, 60 Atl. 612, 109 Am. St. Rep. 552, 70 L.R.A. 321; Johnson v. Smith, Anth. N. P. 60, 7 N. Y. Com. L. Rep. 63; Gold v. Gross, 146 N. Y. S. 164. "It is not the mere taking the sample that would amount to a delivery. If a symbolical delivery is relied on, it must appear to be a delivery by the vendor, and an acceptance by the vendee, with a view to change the possession. A mere taking a sample in his hand, without any express understanding that such taking of the sample was to be a delivery, would amount to nothing." Carver v. Lane, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 168.

In Brand v. Focht, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 409, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 185, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 225, the court said: "A delivery of the property to satisfy the requirements of the statute, must be a delivery by the vendor, with the intention of vesting the right of possession in the vendee, and there must be an actual acceptance by the latter, with the intent of taking possession as owner, and this rule can only be satisfied by something done subsequently to the sale, unequivocally indicating the mutual intentions of the parties.

. . . Now it is quite clear that these vendees never did, and never intended, to make any delivery of this coal, in whole or in part, to the plaintiff upon the contract of sale which he sets up, and it is equally clear that they never delivered the bill of lading with any intent to complete and perfect that sale. Nay, it is very manifest that they never intended to part with the bill of lading, except upon the condition and understanding that the plaintiff would purchase the cargo of coal therein mentioned, at the rate of six dollars and fifty cents a ton. This he peremptorily declined to do, and retained the bill of lading, against the remonstrance of the defendant's agent. He clearly had no right so to retain it, and now setting it up as evidence of the delivery of the coal under the contract of sale made in March, is a fraud upon the defendants. They never delivered it to the plaintiff with any such intent or for any such purpose, and it cannot now be permitted to the plaintiff that he should avail himself of this bill of lading, thus improperly retained by him, to make a title in himself to this coal. The contract of sale not being in writing, as no part of the purchase money was paid, and no delivery in whole or in part of the property purchased, and no symbolical delivery, it follows that the plaintiff was never vested with the title to this coal; he never had possession of it, actual or constructive; he was not the owner, and cannot, therefore, maintain this action." And in Ladnier v. Ladnier, 90 Miss. 475, 43 So. 946, it was said: "If the delivery be of part for all, this constructive or symbolical delivery must plainly appear. In the case before us it is difficult to repose quietly on the belief that there was an agreement of the two minds that the sale was concluded. No money was paid; no writing made; no clear and distinct understanding had as to the terms and times of payment. The whole reliance of the seller here is on a constructive delivery of three sheep for a flock in the range, whose number is not known, and the three were not of the flock in the range, but pets near the house. . . . We cannot subscribe to the assumption that the evidence shows any acceptance and delivery of the three sheep as representative of the herd wandering in the range."

RIGHT TO POSSESSION.

The delivery of a thing which is not potent to confer the right to possession is not a compliance with the statute. Johnson v. Smith, Anth. N. P. 60, 7 N. Y. Com. L. Rep. 63 (delivery of export entry in alleged sale of sugars, held not to be sufficient); Jachrisson v. Poppe, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 171 (wherein the court said: "A delivery by the plaintiff of an order, which did not give the defendants any legal control over the property mentioned in the order, is not, in contemplation of law, a delivery of such property").

Accordingly, where the goods are in the custody of a third person and may not be delivered on the demand of the purchaser, there is no delivery. Bentall v. Burn, 5 Dowl. & R. 284, 3 B. & C. 423, 103 E. C. L. 138, R. & M. 107, 21 E. C. L. 392, 3 L. J. K. B. 42, 27 Rev. Rep. 391, 107 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 791; Farina v. Home, 16 M. & W. (Eng.) 119; Gooch v. Holmes, 41 Me. 523.

And it has been held that a symbolical delivery in order to be effectual within the statute must confer the right to the possession of goods which are susceptible of immediate actual delivery. Stevens v. Stewart, 3 Cal. 140. In that case the court said: "The defendant relies on the statute of frauds. To avoid this defense the plaintiffs show that after the parol agreement for the sale of the goods, they delivered to defendant an order upon the master of the vessel for the goods. It appears that upon presenting the order, the defendant was answered that the goods were not ready to be discharged, and would not be for several days, whereupon he abandoned the contract. It is now insisted by the plaintiffs that the delivery of an order for the goods was such a delivery as takes the case out of the statute of frauds. Several cases have been cited to show that a delivery of an order is a delivery of the goods. But it seems very certain that it is only so considered where the goods are susceptible of immediate delivery. There are other cases, where no question is raised as to the validity of the contract, or the effect of the statute of frauds, where the point to be decided was, as to the kind of delivery which effected a change of property, or completed the execution of the contract. In many such cases, although the goods cannot be immediately delivered, the delay is implied as one of the stipulations. But where delivery is necessary to make the contract, a symbolic delivery can only be effectual where it can be immediately followed by an actual delivery. It is urged that the proof in this case shows that the defendant purchased with the knowledge that the goods were on shipboard, and therefore made the bargain with the implied understanding that they could only be delivered within such reasonable time as it required the vessel to discharge. This would be a good argument, if the contract had been in writing, to prevent the defendant from avoiding it for want of delivery. But the argument itself proves a nondelivery, and there cannot be at the same time a delivery which takes the case out of the statute and a good legal excuse for nondelivery."

But the parties may agree, as a part of a constructive delivery, that the goods shall be actually delivered at a later date. Salter v. Woollams, 2 M. & G. 660, 40 E. C. L. 559 (delivery of rick of hay).

WILSON

v.

HOTCHKISS.

California Supreme Court—December 24, 1915.

171 Cal. 617; 154 Pac. 1.

Frauds, Statute of — Delivery of Goods — Retention of Vendee in Possession.

Under the statute of frauds providing that sales of personal property for a price of $200 or more shall be invalid unless there be some written memorandum, except where the buyer accepts part of the goods, the mere words of the buyer, who was already the pledgee in possession, or proof of his acts of dominion over the property inconsistent with his former rights as pledgee, may establish a transfer of possession from that of a pledgee to that of complete ownership.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where sale of personal property is made to a buyer in possession, the statute of frauds does not require him to quit it and to retake possession as the new owner.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action for the price agreed on a parol sale of stock for a price more than $200, to a buyer already in possession as pledgee, the evidence is held to make the buyer's acceptance of possession as complete owner a question for the jury.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco: HUNT, Judge.

Action by Virginia E. Wilson, plaintiff, against W. J. Hotchkiss, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Titus, Creed & Dall for appellant.

Franklin P. Bull for respondent.

[618] HENSHAW, J.—The first trial of this cause resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant's appeal was considered by the district court of appeal of the third district, where every legal consideration pressed upon the attention of that court is clearly, fully, and satisfactorily disposed of. (Wilson v. Hotchkiss, 21 Cal. App. 392, 132 Pac. 88.) That court very properly ordered a reversal of the judgment and a new trial for the failure of the trial court to give any instructions touching the statute of frauds and its applicability to the contract under consideration. Upon the new trial such instructions were given. Again the verdict of the jury was for plaintiff, and once more defendant appeals. It may not be questioned but that the court quite fully and quite accurately instructed the jury as to the nature of the acts by a vendee under a parol contract within the statute of frauds which would be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of that statute. But complaint is made over the court's refusal to give the following: "Mere words are not sufficient to prove a receipt or acceptance of the personal property to take an oral contract of sale of personal property, for a price exceeding two hundred dollars, out of the statute of frauds." It is said that this refused instruction embodies an unquestioned principle of law, first declared in New York in Shindler v. Houston, 1 N. Y. 261, 49 Am. Dec. 316, and approved in this state in the very early cases of Gardet v. Belknap, 1 Cal. 399, and [619] Malone v. Plato, 22 Cal. 103. These cases and the principle of law for which appellant contends therefore demand examination. Shindler v. Houston was a sale by oral contract of lumber in the possession of the vendor, and piled on a dock. Standing in front of the lumber, the vendor and the vendee agreed upon the price, and the plaintiff then said, "The lumber is yours." There was absolutely no other delivery, no change of possession, and the true meaning of the decision is that where delivery and change of possession are necessary to comply with the statute of frauds, an oral declaration does not alone constitute such delivery. To precisely the same effect is Gardet v. Belknap, where there was not the slightest pretense that the brandy which the defendant orally purchased had ever been removed from the plaintiff's store, or that the defendant had exercised, or attempted to exercise, any dominion over it, the plaintiff resting his case solely upon the oral declaration of the vendee at the time of the purchase and as a part of the contract of purchase. In Malone v. Plato, defendant was charged with having purchased horses of the plaintiff. The transaction rested wholly in parol, defendant saying, "I will take them. I will be back in half an hour and pay for them." The horses remained in plaintiff's stable. Defendant refused to complete this oral contract, and pleaded the statute of frauds. This court again said that it appears to be entirely settled that to comply with the requirements of the statute of frauds, "the transfer of possession must be evidenced by acts and cannot be effected by mere words." With the soundness of these declarations as bearing upon the facts to which they were applied, no criticism can be made. But what were the essential facts? They were that for their validity each contract required a delivery of the article sold, and the holding is merely that the language of the vendor that "the property is yours," or the language of the vendee, "I will take the property," does not measure up to the requirement of the statute. This principle and these decisions have no bearing on or relationship to cases such as the one at bar—cases where the actual possession is in the vendee and the real question is whether that possession has been transformed from that of bailment or pledge to that of complete ownership. Where a sale is made to a vendee in possession, whatever may have been the nature of his prior possession, the [620] law does not require a quitting of it and a retaking of possession as the new owner. (Snider v. Thrall, 56 Wis. 674, 14 N. W. 814. All that is required is evidence showing that the possession is retained by the vendee in his new capacity of owner. And what evidence will establish this? Manifestly it may be established by proof of acts of dominion over the property inconsistent with his former holding as bailee or pledgee, but equally may it be established by his declarations that he so holds the property as owner. On principle this must be so, for it would indeed be strange if a pledgee, formally reciting the oral contract by which he had purchased the property and declaring that he held possession of it no longer as pledgee but as absolute owner, could have the evidence of these declarations excluded from the consideration of the jury upon the ground that they were mere declarations and not a part of his acts or conduct in dealing with the property. They are essentially a part of his acts and conduct, and so we find it declared as "well settled that any acts of the parties indicative of ownership by the vendee may be given in evidence to show the receipt and acceptance of the goods to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Conduct, acts and declarations of the purchaser may be given in evidence for that purpose." (Garfield v. Paris, 96 U. S. 557, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 821.) And without multiplying citations, reference may be made to Browne on Statute of Frauds, section 321e, where he states: "The conduct of the buyer showing an acceptance . . . may be drawn . . . from what he says." And again quoting from the same author, page 433, footnote, "An examination of the cases will show that evidence has uniformly been received even in New York of the conduct of the parties, i. e., what they did and said, without in any way discriminating between acts of doing and acts of saying." (See also Mechem on Sales, sec. 382; Williston on Sales, sec. 87.) It follows that the court ruled correctly in refusing to give the proffered instruction.

Plaintiff's evidence went to establish that her assignor in selling his stock ceased to have any connection with the corporation and so forfeited his position as manager; that he was temporarily retained by the defendant purchaser in his managerial position at an increased compensation, the increase being paid by the defendant himself; that defendant was the pledgee of the stock at the time of the sale; that the [621] vendor was jointly liable with the vendee upon certain promissory notes; that as a part of the consideration the vendor was to be released from liability on those notes; that in fact the vendee did pay those notes and never made demand upon the vendor for recoupment; that the vendee publicly declared that he had bought the vendor's stock and that the vendor no longer had any interest in the company. Here certainly is enough, and more than enough, evidence to justify the submission of the cause to the jury, whose verdict will not here be disturbed. (Shumway v. Rutter, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 443, 19 Am. Dec. 340.)

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Lorigan and Melvin, JJ., concurred.
Hearing in Bank denied.

NOTE.Continuance of Existing Possession by Vendee as Sufficient Delivery to Take Verbal Sale of Goods Out of Statute of Frauds.

The reported case supports the rule recognized in J. H. Silkman Lumber Co. v. Hunholz, 13 Ann. Cas. 713, to the effect that when goods are in the possession of the vendee, it is not necessary to a valid delivery within the statute of frauds that the vendor shall repossess himself of the property and then redeliver it to the vendee, since it is sufficient if the vendee retains possession, claiming the goods as his own expressly or by reasonable implication and under such circumstances as indicate a mutual intention to change the nature of the possession from a bailment to ownership. The court in the reported case further holds that the delivery may be established as against the vendee by mere words, when those words are his own declaration that he holds as owner.

Several recent cases have considered the question of the continuance of an existing possession by a vendee as sufficient delivery to take a verbal sale of goods out of the statute of frauds, and have supported the rule that while it is not necessary for the seller to retake the property and redeliver it to the buyer, it is necessary to a delivery that the conduct of the buyer shall be inconsistent with the supposition that the former possession remains unchanged. Wilson v. Hotchkiss, 21 Cal. App. 392, 132 Pac. 88; Charlotte Harbor, etc. R. Co. v. Burwell, 56 Fla. 217, 48 So. 213; Young v. Ingalsbe, 208 N. Y. 504, 102 N. E. 590, affirming 151 App. Div. 375, 135 N. Y. S. 939 (same case on former appeal, 138 App. Div. 587, 122 N. Y. S. 707). In Young v. Ingalsbe, 151 App. Div. 375, 135 N. Y. S. 939, the appellate division pointed out that the acts done must bind the party against whom the validity of the sale is asserted. Adverting to the former appeal the court said: "Upon that there was evidence of a verbal sale of the testator's interest in certain law books to the plaintiff in 1906, and an agreement that the price thereof should be applied upon the said indebtedness of the plaintiff. It was sought by plaintiff to avail himself of this sale to prevent the running of the statute of limitations. The books were already in the possession of the plaintiff. There was no evidence of any affirmative act of delivery by the said testator or of acceptance by the plaintiff of said books. We accordingly held that the sale was void by the statute of frauds, and being void it did not operate as a payment which would take the claim out of the statute of limitations. Upon this trial further evidence was offered to the effect that after this verbal contract of sale the plaintiff assumed possession of such law books, removed the tags that were thereupon and put his own name upon them. Such acts were, in my judgment, sufficient to constitute an acceptance by him of such law books providing defendant were here claiming the benefit of that sale. The validity of the sale, however, is not here asserted by the defendant but by the plaintiff as against the defendant's testator, and as against him there was no act of delivery shown which takes the case out of the statute of frauds. . . . While enough has been shown to constitute an acceptance on the part of the plaintiff if the defendant were here seeking to enforce the contract, nothing whatever has been shown to constitute a delivery on the part of the defendant's testator when the sale is sought to be enforced by the plaintiff. The mere agreement that the moneys were to be applied upon the indebtedness is not a positive act in any way constituting a delivery or constituting an assent to the acceptance by the plaintiff. It is merely part of the verbal contract of sale, which the law has held is not sufficient to pass title." Affirming that judgment, the court of appeals (208 N. Y. 503) said: "Each act of the plaintiff was individual and independent. His possession of the books, if had at the time of the agreement, was not on the strength of or pursuant to it, but under another and prior arrangement; and, if acquired subsequent to the contract, was without a delivery and through his sole and exclusive act. Under either hypothesis the title of the deceased to the books did not pass to the plaintiff by virtue of a receipt and acceptance because he did no act by which he relinquished his dominion or recognized and confirmed that of the plaintiff over them."

v.

COCA-COLA BOTTLING COMPANY.

Tennessee Supreme Court—October 1, 1915.

132 Tenn. 545; 179 S. W. 155.

Food — Liability of Manufacturer to Consumer.

The duty of one who prepares and puts on the market, in bottles or sealed packages, foods, drugs, beverages, medicines, or articles inherently dangerous of exercising care to see that nothing unwholesome or injurious is contained in the bottle or package is not in the nature of an implied warranty, and is based upon negligence.

[See 4 Ann. Cas. 1123; 15 Ann. Cas. 1076; 16 Ann. Cas. 492; Ann. Cas. 1913B 1110; Ann. Cas. 1915C 140; 111 Am. St. Rep. 713.]

Same.

One who prepares and puts on the market, in bottles or sealed packages, foods, drugs, beverages, or articles inherently dangerous is liable for breach of a duty to the public in the preparation thereof, regardless of the privity of contract to any one injured for a failure to properly safeguard and perform such duty.

Foreign Substance in Beverage.

In an action for damages for an illness caused by swallowing a decomposed mouse in a bottle of Coca-Cola purchased from a local dealer to whom it had been sold by a bottling company, the evidence is held to sustain a finding that the bottling company was not at fault.

[See note at end of this case.]

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Action by H. C. Crigger, plaintiff, against Coca-Cola Bottling Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant in trial court. Judgment affirmed by Court of Civil Appeals. Plaintiff petitions for certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

King & Lanier for plaintiff.

Bell, Terry & Bell and Caruthers Eving for defendant.

[546] FANCHER, J.—The plaintiff drank a bottle of Coca-Cola, a beverage sold generally on the market as wholesome and harmless. In doing so he took into his mouth, and partially swallowed, a decomposed mouse, which caused him to become very sick, and he sues for damages. The defendant does not make the beverage, but buys it in barrels from the manufacturer and bottles it.

The bottle in question was sold by defendant to a local dealer and by him sold to plaintiff.

The question presented is, whether a bottling company engaged in bottling Coca-Cola, a beverage made [547] by another, warrants to the ultimate consumer that its bottle contains no injurious, harmful, or deleterious substance, or is the bottling company liable only for negligence, or the omission to use proper care in the work?

The proof shows that the method used at the bottling plant is fully equal to the best. The empty bottle is passed through vats of strong caustic soda solution and then rinsed under pressure with water as hot as the bottle will stand, then inspected by the use of a strong electric light, then brushed out with a rapidly revolving brush and again rinsed; the bottle is again inspected over a brilliant electric light, and then filled with Coca-Cola, using a fine strainer, when it is capped, and finally inspected.

The trial judge charged the jury on the theory that if the defendant was free from negligence in the bottling of the beverage there was no liability. The jury found in favor of the defendant, and judgment was accordingly entered. The court of civil appeals affirmed on the ground that the declaration averred negligence and the jury had found against plaintiff on that question.

The case is briefed here in support of the petition for certiorari, and by the defendant, as to whether there is an implied warranty on the part of the Coca-Cola Bottling Company, which results in favor of the ultimate consumer, regardless of any question of negligence. The declaration, liberally treated, will admit [548] the question, and the case must be determined upon that standard.

In the case recently determined by this court of Boyd v. Coca Cola Bottling Works, 132 Tenn. 23, 177 S. W. 80, opinion by Mr. Justice Green, the defendant was held liable to the ultimate consumer for injuries from drinking a bottle of Coca-Cola in which was contained a cigar stub. The bottle in that case was bought from an intermediate dealer, to whom the defendant manufacturer had sold it, and it was held that want of contract or privity between defendant and the person injured constituted no defense. It was determined in that case that beverages fall within the class of articles such as foods and medicines, where a liability may exist upon the ground that one placing upon the market such products in sealed bottles assumes a duty to the general public of exercising care to see that nothing unwholesome or injurious is contained in the bottle. For a negligent breach of this duty the defendant was liable.

In the present case, we are to inquire a step further. Does this duty exist regardless of negligence, and is it in the nature of an implied warranty? Some of the cases seem to so hold. The case of Jackson Coca Cola Bottling Co. v. Chapman 106 Miss. 864, 64 So. 791, 7 Neg. & Com. Cas. Ann. 112, note, seems to go this extent, citing Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. 124 Ga. 121, 52 S. E. 152, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1180, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157.

[549] In the Augusta Brewing Co. Case, the supreme court of Georgia stated the rule to be:

"When a manufacturer makes, bottles, and sells . . . a beverage represented to be refreshing and harmless, he is under a legal duty to see to it that in the process of bottling no foreign substance shall be mixed with the beverage which, if taken into the human stomach, will be injurious."

It does not appear that the direct question was at issue in that case as to a warranty, regardless of negligence. Most of the cases on the question show some negligence or omission of duty or care, and are based upon that idea.

There are many authorities holding an implied warranty to exist, as between seller and buyer of articles to be used for a specific purpose, that such articles are proper and suitable for the use to which they are to be applied. But we see no reason or principle upon which a warranty might run with an article for consumption like a warranty of title running with land. We think the real ground of liability of the seller to an ultimate consumer is, more properly speaking, a duty one owes to the public not to put out articles to be sold upon the markets for use injurious in their nature, of which the general public have not means of inspection to protect themselves. This duty has been applied to manufacturers of drugs, foods, beverages, poisons, and other things inherently dangerous.

One of the leading cases on the subject is Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. [550] That case is referred to in many more recent opinions. A manufacturing druggist was held liable for negligently putting up, labeling, and selling as and for the extract of dandelion, a simple and harmless medicine, a jar of the extract of belladonna, which is a deadly poison, whereby the plaintiff was injured, on the ground of a breach of a public duty, and that this was the result whether the injured person is an immediate customer of defendant or not. Negligence was the basis of liability in that case, as it was in most cases of this nature. See notes 57 Am. Dec. (Extra Ann.) 568; Salmon v. Libby, 219 Ill. 421, 76 N. E. 573; Tomlinson v. Armour, 75 N. J. L. 748, 70 Atl. 314, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 923 (negligence in preparation of canned meat); note to McQuad v. Roas [85 Wis. 492, 55 N. W. 705, 39 Am. St. Rep. 864] 22 L.R.A. 195; Bishop v. Weber, 139 Mass. 411, 1 N. E. 154, 52 Am. Rep. 715 (negligence in furnishing unwholesome meat); Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 120 Fed. 865, 57 C. (N. Y.) 468, 7 Am. Dec. 339 (negligence in sale of unwholesome provisions, but holding that vendor is bound to know that they are sound and wholesome); Craft v. Parker [96 Mich. 245, 55 N. W. 812] 21 L.R.A. 139, note; Brown v. Marshall, 47 Mich. 576, 11 N. W. 392, 41

Am. Rep. 728 (opinion by Cooley, J., holding that a high degree of care is required of a druggist, but that actual negligence cannot be dispensed with as a necessary element [551] in liability when mistake has occurred); Fleet v. Hollenkemp, 13 B. Mon (Ky.) 219, 56 Am. Dec. 563 (holding caveat venditor should apply to a druggist in seeing that his drugs are what they are pretended to be, and that he cannot escape liability on a pretext that it was an accidental or innocent mistake); Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 457, 10 S. E. 118, 5 L.R.A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324 (liability to ultimate consumer for wrong of proprietor of medicine in the prescription and direction as to dose); Weiser v. Holzman, 33 Wash. 87, 73 Pac. 797, 99 Am. St. Rep. 932 (liability without regard to privity of contract for knowingly selling and delivering to another, who is injured thereby (an article intrinsically dangerous, without notice to purchaser of intrinsic danger); Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. 190, 57 L.R.A. 428, 88 Am. St. Rep. 909 (druggist liable from incompetency or negligence in selling to one person wrong poisonous medicine, whereby third person is injured); Farrell v. Manhattan Market Co. 198 Mass. 271, 84 N. E. 481, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 884, 126 Am. St. Rep. 436, 15 Ann. Cas. 1076 (reviewing established English cases that hold there is no implied condition or warranty that a food is fit to be eaten, unless sold by a dealer and the food is selected by him, and concluding that this is the true rule); Crocker v. Baltimore Dairy Lunch Co. 214 Mass. 177, 100 N. E. 1078, Ann. Cas. 1914B 884 (that finding for plaintiff for injuries from what might be ptomaine poisoning is not warranted without any [552] evidence that the defendant was negligent in purchasing its food supplies).

From a careful consideration of the subject, and after mature thought, we are of opinion as follows:

1. That one who prepares and puts on the market, in bottles or sealed packages, foods, drugs, beverages, medicines, or articles inherently dangerous owes a high duty to the public, in the care and preparation of such commodities, and that a liability will exist regardless of privity of contract to any one injured for a failure to properly safe-guard and perform that duty.

2. This liability is based on an omission of duty or an act of negligence, and the way should be left open for the innocent to escape. However exacting the duty or high the degree of care to furnish pure foods, beverages and medicines we believe with Judge Cooley, as expressed in Brown v. Marshall, supra, that negligence is a necessary element in the right of action, and the better authorities have not gone so far as to dispense with actual negligence as a prerequisite to the liability. In fact, there is no logical basis of liability for personal injury without some negligent act or omission.

In the present case, the mouse may have gotten into the bottle by some unavoidable accident, but proper inspection should have disclosed the fact, and if in the light of the finding by the jury it were fairly inferable that the mouse was bottled up at the Bottling Company plant, we would consider it our duty to reverse the case, because of the high duty resting on the defendant. [553] But the jury was told to inquire whether the mouse was in the bottle when it left the hands of this company, and, if so, whether its presence there was due to the negligence of the company. The court suggested to the jury the theory of the defendant that there was opportunity for malevolent persons to open this bottle and put the mouse into it before or after it left the factory, and they should use their common sense as men in deciding the issue. In view of the extraordinary care shown to exist at the bottling plant and the verdict of the jury, it may be that this thing occurred without the fault of the defendant. There are sufficient inferences that may be drawn from the facts to sustain the finding.

NOTE.

Liability for Injury Resulting from Foreign Substance in Beverage.

Generally.

In an early case it was said: "If a taverner sells wine (knowing it to be corrupt) to another as sound, good, and not corrupt, without any express warranty, still an action of deceit lies against him, for there was a warranty in law. So if I come into a tavern to eat, and he gives and sells to me beer and flesh which are corrupt, by which I am put into a great sickness, I shall have against him my action in the case clearly, even although he made no guaranty to me." 9 H. 6, 53, as stated in 1 Roll. Abr. tit. Action sur Case, (P) pl. 1 & 2.

Beverages may be regarded as food and indeed pure food laws generally define food as including "all articles used as food or drink by man." 11 R. C. L. tit. Food, p. 1108. And see the note to Com. v. Pflaum, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1287. A great majority of the recent cases hold that the ultimate consumer of products sold in cans or sealed packages may bring his action direct against the packer or manufacturer. 11 R. C. L. tit. Food, p. 1123.

Accordingly it is held that a manufacturer is liable to an ultimate consumer for an injury resulting from a foreign substance in a beverage which he has manufactured. Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. 124 Ga. 121, 52 S. E. 152, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1178; Martin v. Waycross Coca-Cola Bottling Co. (Ga.) 89 S. E. 495; Roberts v. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assoc. 211 Mass. 449, 98 N. E. 95; Jackson Coca Cola Bottling Co. v. Chapman, 106 Miss. 864, 64 So. 791. In Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. supra, the rule was stated as follows: "When a manufacturer makes, bottles, and sells to the retail trade, to be again sold to the general public, a beverage represented to be refreshing and harmless, he is under a legal duty to see to it that in the process of bottling no foreign substance shall be mixed with the beverage which, if taken into the human stomach, will be injurious. The duty not negligently to injure is due by the manufacturer, in a case of the particular character of the one under consideration, not merely to the dealer to whom he sells his product, but to the general public for whom his wares are intended."

In the reported case the rule is stated to be that while the liability of a manufacturer of a beverage for an injury caused by a foreign substance therein is not dependent on a privity of contract between him and the person injured, his liability must depend on some negligent act or omission. The facts and the holding in Boyd v. Coca-Cola Bottling Works, 132 Tenn. 23, 177 S. W. 80, are partially stated in the reported case. In that case it was also held that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to examine the beverage for a foreign substance, the court saying: "It is next said that the plaintiffs below were guilty of contributory negligence in not examining more closely the bottle and its contents. We think there is nothing in this. The proof shows that the bottle and the fluid were both of a dark color, and the cigar stub could not be readily discerned. Furthermore, it is to be presumed that the contents of sealed packages put on the market to be used as a food or beverage are fit to be so used. A consumer is not negligent in failing to examine the same for poisonous substances."

The English Sale of Goods Act 1893 (s. 14, sub. 1) provides that "where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply . . . there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose." Subdivision 2 provides that "where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description . . . there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality; provided that if the buyer has examined the goods, there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed." In Frost v. Aylesbury Dairy Co. [1905] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 608, it appeared that the plaintiff brought an action to recover expenses to which he was put by the death of his wife caused by typhoid fever of which the infection was caught from milk supplied by the defendants. The defendants were held to be liable, the court holding that subsection 1 was applicable. And in Wren v. Holt [1903] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 610, it appeared that the plaintiff was poisoned by arsenic contained in beer bought at the defendant's beerhouse. The plaintiff testified that he went to the defendant's beerhouse because beer of a certain brand was there supplied. A judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed, the appellate court holding that there was a sale of goods by description within subsection 2, and that the defect was not one that could be discovered by inspection.

For a discussion of the question of implied warranty on a sale of food see the notes to National Cotton Oil Co. v. Young, 4 Ann. Cas. 1123, and Farrell v. Manhattan Market Co. 15 Ann. Cas. 1076. As to the recovery of consequential damages for the breach of an implied warranty of sale, see the notes to Jackson v. Watson, 16 Ann. Cas. 492; Doyle v. Fuerst, Ann. Cas. 1913B 1110; Mazetti v. Armour, Ann. Cas. 1915C 140. The liability of a water company to a consumer for furnishing impure water is treated in the note to Gosser v. Ohio Valley Water Co. Ann. Cas. 1915C 685.

Illustrations.

In Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. 124 Ga. 121, 52 S. E. 152, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1178, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured by swallowing several pieces of glass while drinking some soda water which he had purchased from a merchant, and it was held that he could recover damages from the manufacturer of the beverage for the injury sustained.

In Jackson Coca Cola Bottling Co. v. Chapman, 106 Miss. 864, 64 So. 791, the court affirmed a verdict for the plaintiff for damages resulting from the drinking of Coca-Cola from a bottle containing a dead mouse. To the same effect is Martin v. Waycross Coca-Cola Bottling Co. (Ga.) 89 S. E. 495, wherein the appellate court said in holding that a nonsuit should not have been granted in the trial court: "There is evidence from which the jury could have inferred that in this instance the liquid, which was a brand of Coca-Cola and putrid mouse juice, of itself caused the sickness from which the plaintiff testified she suffered, and that she would have been made sick by it, even if she had not seen that there was a decaying mouse in the bottle. She testified that she took a large swallow before she saw the mouse; and it is not, as a matter of law, to be concluded that the nausea from which she suffered was due to the mental shock caused by seeing a dead mouse in the liquid she was imbibing, rather than that the nausea, sickness, and pain were primarily due to the poisonous nature of the hideous brew, which her physical nature revolted against and attempted to expel without her mind consciously becoming a collaborator in the effort, and before the mind became a participant in the suffering. . . . In our opinion, while the evidence in the present case perhaps does not require a jury to find that the nature of the liquid sold by the defendant and swallowed by the plaintiff was the proximate cause of physical suffering and injury to her person; it is sufficient to authorize such a finding. It is uncontradicted that she was made sick; and of course one may recover for sickness caused by the negligence of another. . . . The fact that a particular plaintiff was sick only a short time, or that a critical illness did not result as a consequence of the negligence of the defendant, might minimize the damages recoverable, but it would hardly so bring the case under the maxim 'de minimis non curat lex' as to deprive the plaintiff of a right to recover. That the plaintiff in the present case was cured of the effect caused by the rodent whose ghastly condition is portrayed in the testimony does not necessarily make this a case in which the Latin 'curat' is synonymous with cure rat, or rat cure. We apprehend that the learned trial judge regarded the case as one in which the only suffering endured by the plaintiff was mental pain consequent upon the discovery of a rotten mouse in the bottle of Coca-Cola from which she was drinking. If the evidence was subject to no other construction, his judgment would undoubtedly be correct, under the decision in Chapman v. Western Union Tel. Co. [88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L.R.A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183]; but it is clear to our minds that there was sufficient evidence, in due accord with the petition, to have authorized a jury to find that the physical sickness and physical pain of the plaintiff was caused by the physical effort to repel a poisonous fluid; and for this reason we hold that the court erred in awarding a nonsuit. If the plaintiff, after having swallowed an unnatural and deleterious compound, which necessarily was injurious to her body, and which caused physical pain and sickness, to her damage, suffered additional mental pain, which was consequent and directly dependent upon her physical suffering, this would merely aggravate the injury."

In Roberts v. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assoc. 211 Mass. 449, 98 N. E. 95, it appeared that the plaintiff, relying on advertisements wherein the defendant had represented that a mixture called Malt Nutrine which it manufactured was healthful and beneficial to women and children and to those needing strength and nourishment and free from all injurious substances, purchased a bottle of the mixture from a merchant, the taking of which caused the illness of his wife and child because of the presence of ptomaine poisons in the mixture. It was held that the defendant was liable.

In Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co. 124 Ga. 121, 52 S. E. 152, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1178, the court in discussing the question whether the plaintiff could recover damages for mental suffering growing out of an injury resulting from swallowing pieces of glass contained in soda water which he had drunk said: "The only remaining point to be considered is whether or not the plaintiff in this case can recover for mental suffering growing out of his injury; and if so, to what extent. It is a familiar principle that where a physical injury has been sustained the person injured may recover for mental suffering caused by or growing out of his bodily hurt. One may not recover, however, for mental suffering which is not reasonable, or which is merely fanciful. It can hardly be disputed that a reasonable fear of death constitutes mental suffering of a very keen sort. It is not unreasonable, we think, for one who has swallowed several pieces of glass to entertain a very vivid and poignant apprehension of an untimely end; and the mental anguish caused by this dread may constitute an element of damage in a suit for damages on account of the physical injury. But after the glass has been removed from his stomach and he is apparently restored to his former condition of health and vigor, his fears, so far as a damage suit are concerned, should cease. He may not continue for an indefinite period to vex his soul with dread on account of having been 'cut on the inside' and hold the defendant liable for his apprehensions. It follows, therefore, that so much of the petition as seeks to recover on account of mental suffering endured since the glass was removed from the plaintiff's stomach should be stricken."

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY

v.

DAGUE.

Arkansas Supreme Court—April 26, 1915.

118 Ark. 277; 176 S. W. 138.

Damages — Measure — Loss of Article Having No Market Value.

The measure of damages for loss by a carrier of an article which has no market value is the value of the article to the shipper; and, in ascertaining the value, inquiry may be made into the constituent elements of the article and the cost to the shipper of producing it.

[See note at end of this case.]

New Trial — Newly Discovered Evidence — Diligence Insufficient.

A carrier against which a judgment had been rendered for the loss of freight sought a new trial for newly discovered evidence, and showed that the loss was reported in December, 1913, and that an investigation was at once started to find the article described in the bill of lading, as a "model plow;" that the agents of the carrier looked for something like a plow and could not find it; that the traveling claim adjuster after the trial found in unclaimed freight packages, in a warehouse between the initial and terminal stations, a small box which contained the model plow. When delivered for shipment the box was plainly marked, "Model Plow or Soil Pulverizer." It is held that denial of new trial was within the court's discretion.

Damages — Value of Article Having No Market Value — Evidence Sufficient.

A shipper suing a carrier for the loss of an article having no market value, and showing that he was a mechanic, and giving a detailed estimate of the materials going into the article and the reasonable cost of constructing the same, may recover the value of materials furnished and the work done by others, as shown by his uncontradicted testimony.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Miller county:
ARNOLD, Judge.

Action by M. H. Dague, plaintiff, against St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[278] M. H. Dague sued the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the loss of certain property which he delivered to the railroad company at Newport, Arkansas, for shipment to Texarkana, Arkansas.

It appears from the record that on the 19th day of December, 1913, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant for transportation a certain model machine of a soil pulverizer for which he had letters patent; and that at the time he made the delivery he explained to the defendant the character and nature of the machine. It was packed in a box, was labelled "Model of Pulverizer Machine," and was addressed to M. H. Dague, Texarkana, Arkansas. The machine was lost in transportation, and, after waiting some months for the company to trace it, the plaintiff instituted this action.

The suit was commenced on the 29th day of April, 1914, and the trial had on the 15th day of June, 1914. At the trial the plaintiff testified as to what it would cost him to have the machine constructed and placed the total amount at $583.40, $200 of which he claimed for services performed by himself in working on the model. The remaining $383.40 was for material furnished and for work done by other parties. He gave a detailed statement of these items, and testified that he was a mechanic and that the prices were reasonable. The jury returned a verdict [279] in his favor for $383.40, and from the judgment rendered the defendant has appealed.

E. B. Kinsworthy, R. E. Wiley, Troy Pace and T. D. Crawford for appellant.
Webber & Webber for appellee.

[280] HART, J. (after stating the facts).—

(1) In the case of Southern Exp. Co. v. Owens, 146 Ala. 412, 9 Ann. Cas. 1143, 41 So. 752, 119 Am. St. Rep. 41, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 369, the court held that in an action to recover for the loss of an article which had no market value the measure of damages should be the value of the article to the plaintiff, and, in ascertaining this value, inquiry may be made into the constituent elements and the [281] cost to the plaintiff of producing the article. In that case the court said:

"Ordinarily, where property has a market value that can be shown, such value is the criterion by which actual damages for its destruction or loss may be fixed. But it may be that property destroyed or lost has no market value. In such state of the case, while it may be true that no rule which will be absolutely certain to do justice between the parties can be laid down, it does not follow from this, nor is it the law, that the plaintiff must be turned out of court with nominal damages merely. Where the article or thing is so unusual in its character that market value cannot be predicated of it, its value, or plaintiff's damages, must be ascertained in some other rational way, and from such elements as are attainable."

Several cases are cited supporting that opinion, and other cases announcing the same principle are cited in the case note. In the instant case the plaintiff had procured letters patent upon his plow and had constructed a model to be used in selling the plow. He shipped the model from Newport to Texarkana over the defendant's line of railway and it was lost in transit. The court followed the principles of law above announced in the admission of testimony and in its instructions to the jury.

It is insisted by counsel for the defendant that the court erred in failing to grant it a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence. In support of its motion, it introduced the affidavits of its agents to the effect that the loss of the machine was reported in December, 1913, and that an investigation was at once started to find the plow; that the property was described in the bill of lading as a model plow; that they were looking for something like a plow and were not able to find it; that some time in August, 1914, the traveling freight claim adjuster for the defendant and one of its agents while looking over some unclaimed freight packages in the company's warehouse in Little Rock, a station between Newport and Texarkana, located a box about thirty inches square and [282] about twelve inches high, and upon looking into it found that it contained the model plow which plaintiff had lost; and that before this time an examination of the unclaimed freight packages in stations between Newport and Texarkana had been made and they had been unable to find the plow.

After the railroad company found the plow it asked the court to set aside the judgment and require the plaintiff to accept the model and resubmit to the jury for its decision the question of damages sustained by the plaintiff for the detention of the plow.

(2) The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing this request of the defendant. It is true, according to the testimony introduced by the defendant, that the box containing the plow did not look like a plow and was not marked "model plow" on the box. According to the testimony of the plaintiff, however, when the property was delivered for shipment the box was plainly marked "model plow or soil pulverizer." It was shipped from a point in the northern part of the State to a station in the southern part of the State and the whole route was over the defendant's main line of road. Though the defendant made some effort to trace the plow after its loss was reported to it, still, under the circumstances, it cannot be said that it used due diligence in doing so. The property was lost in the latter part of December and was not found until some time in the following August.

Again, it is insisted by counsel for defendant that the verdict is excessive; but we do not agree with them in that contention. The plaintiff testified that he was a mechanic himself and gave a detailed estimate of the materials that went into the model and the reasonable cost of constructing same. These items amounted to $383.40. His testimony was in no manner contradicted and the jury properly found for him in that amount.

The judgment will be affirmed.

NOTE.

Measure of Damages for Loss or Destruction of Property Having No Market Value.

Introductory, 579.

Writings, Books, Portraits, Works of Art and the Like, 579.

Other Property, 581.

Introductory.

In the present note the recent cases discussing the measure of damages for the loss or destruction of property having no market value are reviewed. The earlier decisions on this question are collected in the notes to Southern Exp. Co. v. Owens, 9 Ann. Cas. 1143, and Watt v. Nevada Central R. Co. 62 Am. St. Rep. 772.

As to the measure of damages for the conversion of or the failure to deliver household goods and wearing apparel, see the notes to Barker v. Lewis Storage, etc. Co. 3 Ann. Cas. 889, and Rogers v. O. K. Bus, etc. Co. reported post, this volume, at page 581.

For a discussion of the question whether an action of trover will lie for the conversion of property having no commercial value, see the note to Vaughn v. Wright, Ann. Cas. 1914B 821.

Writings, Books, Portraits, Works of Art and the Like.

The measure of damages which may be recovered for the loss or destruction of a writing, book, portrait or other article of a similar nature, which has no market value, seems to be the amount of its actual value to the owner, which value must be ascertained from a consideration of all the facts which affect its value to the owner. The foregoing rule has been applied in the following recent cases: Wood v. Cunard Steamship Co. 192 Fed. 293, 112 C. C. A. 551, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 371 (loss of manuscript of manual on Greek grammar); Kates Transfer, etc. Co. v. Klassen, 6 Ala. 301, 59 So. 355 (loss of photographs); Barker v. S. A. Lewis Storage, etc. Co. 79 Conn. 342, 65 Atl. 143, 118 Am. St. Rep. 141 (conversion of books); Walton v. Western Union Tel. Co. 189 Ill. App. 606 (loss of typewritten manuscript of testimony); Drake v. Auerbach, 37

Minn. 505, 35 N. W. 367 (conversion of vouchers accompanied by affidavit of correctness); Austin v. Millspaugh, 90 Miss. 354, 43 So. 305, 122 Am. St. Rep. 315 (destruction of architect's plans); Shewalter v. Wood (Mo.) 183 S. W. 1127 (conversion and destruction of manuscripts and heirlooms); Frankenstein v. Thomas, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 256 (conversion of painting); Heald v. Macgowen, 15 Daly 233, 5 N. Y. S. 450 (conversion of electrotype plates); Jelalian v. New York, etc. R. Co. 134 App. Div. 381, 119 N. Y. S. 136 (failure of carrier to deliver Persian rug); Taft v. Smith, 76 Misc. 283, 134 N. Y. S. 1011 (conversion of unpublished manuscript containing names of customers); Lovell v. Shea, 60 Super. Ct. 412, 18 N. Y. S. 193 (conversion of stereotyped book plates); Leoncini v. Post, 13 N. Y. S. 825 (loss of sheet music with annotations and transcriptions inscribed thereon); Spice v. Waters, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 227 (conversion of paintings, manuscripts, etc. dictum); St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Green, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 13, 97 S. W. 531 (loss of hand-painted china); Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Dement (Tex.) 115 S. W. 635 (loss of portraits and family Bible); Pennington v. Redman Van, etc. Co. 34 Utah 223, 97 Pac. 115 (conversion of heirlooms and keepsakes); Nicolais v. Dominion Exp. Co. 20 British Columbia 8, 28 West. L. Rep. 754, 6 West. W. Rep. 1202, 18 Dominion L. Rep. 464 (destruction of architect's drawings). Thus, in Austin v. Millspaugh, 90 Miss. 354, 43 So. 305, 122 Am. St. Rep. 315, it appeared that the plaintiff while a guest at the defendant's hotel placed in the custody of the defendant a package containing architectural drawings, plans and specifications, which were lost by the defendant's negligence. In an action to recover the value of the property the court held that it was error to refuse the following instruction: "The court charges the jury that, in case they shall find a verdict for the plaintiff, then they should assess such damages in his favor as will, in their judgment, under all the testimony in the case, fully, fairly, and reasonably compensate him for the loss sustained; that they should not value plaintiff's property, so lost as testified about, at any fanciful or unreasonable price, nor, on the other hand, should they consider it of little or no value, because of its want of market price; but they should, as nearly as they can, from the testimony in the case, determine the reasonable, just, and fair value of the property to the plaintiff, at the time it was delivered to the defendant's porter, at the depot."

In Kates Transfer, etc. Co. v. Klassen, 6 Ala. App. 301, 59 So. 355, the court said, in stating the measure of damages recoverable from a carrier for the loss of photographs: "The photographs were articles of property that were lost that cannot be said to have a marketable value that could be shown, but, as said in Southern Exp. Co. v. Owens, 146 Ala. 413, 426, 41 So. 752, 755, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 369, 119 Am. St. Rep. 41, 9 Ann. Cas. 1143: 'It does not follow from this, nor is it the law, that the plaintiff must be turned out of court with nominal damages merely. Where the article or thing is so unusual in its character that market value cannot be predicated of it, its value, or plaintiff's damages, must be ascertained in some other rational way, and from such elements as are attainable. . . . As compensation for the actual loss is the fundamental principle upon which this measure of damages rests, it would seem that the value of such goods to their owner would furnish the proper rule upon which he should recover.' Cooney v. Pullman Palace-Car Co. 121 Ala. 372, 373, 25 So. 715, 53 L.R.A. 690." In Nicolaï v. Dominion Exp. Co. 20 British Columbia 8, 28 West. L. Rep. 754, 6 West. W. Rep. 1202, 18 Dominion L. Rep. 464, an action against a carrier to recover damages for the destruction by fire of architect's drawings, it appeared that the drawings had not been accepted in a competition and they were not such as could be used for another building than the one for which they were designed, owing to the peculiar shape of the land on which the building was to be erected. It was held that the measure of damages was not the cost of the production of the drawings, but their value to the plaintiff for the purposes of exhibition to prospective clients as evidence of his skill. Similarly, in Shewalter v. Wood (Mo.) 183 S. W. 1127, the plaintiff brought an action against his divorced wife to recover damages for the wilful and malicious conversion and destruction of manuscripts and family heirlooms. The court said: "As to such things as family pictures and heirlooms, which cannot be replaced and are valuable only to the owner, the most fundamental rule of damages that every wrongful injury to person or property should be adequately and reasonably compensated would seem to require the allowance of damages in compensation of the reasonable special value of such articles to their owner. . . . His measure of damages is the reasonable value of the heirlooms to him, which, of course, includes the lesser market value. The evidence of plaintiff tends to show that defendant did convert the ladle, spoons, waiter, urn, and Bible and that all these articles belonged to the class we have defined for the conversion of which special damages should be allowed and further tends to show that defendant wilfully destroyed manuscripts, etc., of plaintiff of value to him, but to no one else." It was also held that the plaintiff could not recover both the actual value of the articles destroyed and their special value as that would be a recovery of double compensation.

In Walton v. Western Union Tel. Co. 189 Ill. App. 606, the action was brought against a telegraph company to recover damages for the loss of a typewritten transcript of testimony. It was held that the usual cost of such a manuscript might properly be taken as its value and as the damages recoverable.

But the measure of damages which may be recovered for the loss or destruction of articles of the kind heretofore referred to is not a fanciful price which the owner may place on them for special reasons, such as their value based on sentiment alone. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Green, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 13, 97 S. W. 531; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Dement (Tex.) 115 S. W. 635.

It is provided by statute in California (Civil Code, § 3333) that "for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this code, is the amount which will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated or not." In Willard v. Valley Gas, etc. Co. 171 Cal. 9, 151 Pac. 286, the court in holding that the statute was applicable in an action against a gas company to recover the value of a rare book and some scrap books destroyed in a fire caused by the company's negligence said: "The testimony of Mr. Willard related to certain scrap books and other data which he had used and was accustomed to use in his occupation as a writer. Some of these contained the results of collecting clippings during many years. The fire also destroyed a rare book, written by one of Mr. Willard's ancestors, and entitled 'The Body of Divinity.' It is contended that the measure of damages to be applied to property having no market value is that laid down by section 3355 of the Civil Code, and that, defendant having possessed no notice of the value of this sort of property to the owner before the fire, it may not be held liable for the value thereof as established by the evidence. But respondents contend that the rule to be applied to property having no market value is fixed by section 3333 of the Civil Code as the amount which would compensate the owner for all detriment proximately caused by its destruction, 'whether it could have been anticipated or not.' This contention is correct. Section 3354 of the Civil Code fixes the market price as the amount recoverable by the owner of property who has been deprived of its possession; but that section excepts from its provisions those of the two following sections. It therefore appears that section 3355 deals with property which has a market value and also a peculiar value to the owner, and not with property having no market value. It is clear that the scrap books could have no market value, but that they might be of great value to a literary man. It was therefore proper for Mr. Willard to testify regarding their value to him. The same rule is applicable to the old book."

Other Property.

The rule applicable in estimating the amount of damages recoverable for the loss or destruction of property other than writings, books, portraits and works of art and which has no market value seems to be the same as in the case of a loss or destruction of those articles, that is, the actual value to the owner taking into consideration the use to which the property is to be put. State v. Stoddard (Ala.) 69 So. 980 (action on bond of officer for loss of military equipment); Pascal v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (Ia.) 139 N. W. 279; Murray v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 210 Mass. 188, Ann. Cas. 1912C 1183, 96 N. E. 316; Wilson v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 347, 108 S. W. 612 (failure of carrier to deliver stock hogs); Wichita Falls, etc. R. Co. v. Gant (Okla.) 156 Pac. 672 (destruction and injury to pasture and fence posts); Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Hurley (Okla.) 160 Pac. 910 (destruction of natural drainage of lot); Swank v. Elwert, 55 Ore. 487, 105 Pac. 901; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Crippen (Tex.) 147 S. W. 361 (injuries to race horse); Clayton v. Phillip (Tex.) 159 S. W. 117 (conversion of house); International, etc. R. Co. v. Parke (Tex.) 169 S. W. 397 (loss of stock cattle); Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Patterson (Tex.) 173 S. W. 273 (loss of Hereford bull). And see the reported case. See also Southern Kansas, etc. R. Co. v. Hughey (Tex.) 182 S. W. 361. Thus in Swank v. Elwert, supra, it was said: "The measure of damages for the destruction or conversion of personality . . . if the property has no market value at the time and place of conversion, either because of its limited production, or because it is of such a nature that there can be no general demand for it, and it is more particularly valuable to the owner than anyone else, then it may be estimated with reference to its value to him." And in Pascal v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (Ia.) 139 N. W. 279, the court, in determining the measure of damages for the destruction of manure by a fire caused by one of the defendant's locomotives, said: "Plaintiff was permitted to show the actual value of the manure at the place where it was burned, and the ruling is objected to. As we understand the record, the manure had been hauled from the plaintiff's stables on the farm, and that it had no market value there, nor had it a market value at Pochahontas, which was the nearest town thereto. Under such circumstances, it was competent to show the fair, actual value of the manure." So, in Murray v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 210 Mass. 188, Ann. Cas. 1912C

1183, 96 N. E. 316, in discussing the admissibility of evidence as to the cost of the labor and material of a gown made to order, for the loss of which the action was brought, the court said: "The exceptions to the admission of evidence really involve the measure of the plaintiff's damages. The gowns, having been made to order for a particular customer, may have had no market value, and evidence of the cost of the labor and material was competent as bearing upon the question."

But the amount of damages recoverable cannot be based on a fanciful or imaginary value alone. Lloyd v. Haugh, etc. Storage, etc. Co. 223 Pa. 148, 72 Atl. 516; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Giles (Tex.) 126 S. W. 282.

ROGERS ET AL.

v.

O. K. BUS AND BAGGAGE COMPANY ET AL.

Oklahoma Supreme Court—May 4, 1915.

46 Okla. 289; 148 Pac. 837.

Trial — Taking Case from Jury — Undisputed Evidence.

Under the procedure and practice in this state in trials by jury, it is the well-established and settled law that, even though the testimony is undisputed, it should be so convincing that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from the facts proven, before the court is authorized to sustain a demurrer to the evidence, or direct a verdict.

Evidence — Value of Chattels.

It is the well-known and generally accepted rule that, when a witness testifies as to the value of chattels in common use, it will be inferred that he means their market value, unless a different basis of value is fixed by the witness, or it is apparent that the witness bases his value on a different foundation.

Opinion Evidence — Value of Wearing Apparel — Right of Owner to Testify.

The owner of wearing apparel may testify as to its value in an action to recover damages for the loss thereof. Rules of evidence are not so technical as to require expert witnesses to prove the reasonable or market value of chattels in common use, where it is apparent from the facts proven that the value of the articles is within the knowledge of persons of ordinary intelligence and experience.

[See note at end of this case.]

Evidence — Admissibility — Disregard of Technicalities.

Rules of evidence are established for the purpose of enabling the court and jury to ascertain the true facts concerning the matters in controversy, and not for the purpose of hindering and delaying justice, by the enforcement of technical abstract phrases defining the rules for the admissibility of evidence.

Error to County Court, Coal county: WELLS, Judge.

Action by Joplin Rogers et al., plaintiffs, against O. K. Bus and Baggage Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

G. T. Ralls for plaintiffs in error.

O. M. Threadgill for defendants in error.

[290] ROBERTS, C.—This case was originally brought in the county court of Coal county by the plaintiffs in error, also plaintiffs below, against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, the O. K. Bus & Baggage Company, and D. M. Phillips, defendants. The petition alleges and the proof shows that the O. K. Bus & Baggage Company was simply a fictitious name, and that D. M. Phillips was the sole owner and proprietor of said company. During the progress of the case the cause of action was dismissed as to the railway company, and also as to the O. K. Bus Company, leaving D. M. Phillips the sole defendant.

For cause of action the plaintiffs, among other facts, allege that:

"On or about the 4th day of October, 1907, plaintiff Sallie Rogers was on a passenger train en route from Chickasha to Lehigh, Okla.; that Lehigh is a station on a line of railway of the defendant the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and in order to reach Lehigh it became necessary for plaintiff to pass through Oklahoma City; that on her journey from Chickasha to Lehigh plaintiff had with her certain baggage, consisting of one large trunk, containing wearing apparel and jewelry; that as an incident to said journey it became necessary to have said trunk transferred from the depot of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company in Oklahoma City to the depot of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company; that plaintiff contracted with and employed defendant D. M. Phillips, as owner and proprietor of the O. K. Bus, Baggage & Carriage Company, to transfer said trunk from the depot of St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company to the depot of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, and deliver the same to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company in a good condition, and for a valuable consideration the said D. M. Phillips, as owner and proprietor of the O. K. Bus, Baggage & Carriage Company, undertook and became bound and liable to safely transfer and deliver said trunk to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company at its depot in Oklahoma City.

[291] "That these plaintiffs intended to leave Oklahoma City on their journey to Lehigh, and that plaintiff Joplin Rogers purchased for himself and plaintiff Sallie Rogers tickets over the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company from Oklahoma City to Lehigh, and paid therefor the usual fare; that plaintiffs requested the defendants to produce the baggage aforesaid, but said defendants failed to produce said baggage, and, though often requested to do so, still fails and refuses to deliver said baggage to plaintiffs, which said baggage was wholly lost by the negligence of the defendants. And plaintiffs further allege that they were the owners of the above-described baggage, and that they have received no payment for the same from the defendants.

"That at the time the said baggage was delivered to the defendant D. M. Phillips, he issued to plaintiffs a check or receipt for the same, which has become lost and cannot be found.

"That at the special instance and request of the defendant, plaintiffs made great effort and went to great expense to produce the delivery of said baggage, and in so doing expended certain sums of money and lost much time.

"Various items of damage suffered by plaintiffs by reason of the loss of such trunk and its contents, in addition to the value of said trunk and contents thereof, which are more particularly shown in an itemized account hereto attached, marked Exhibit A, and made a part hereof, are as follows: Phone messages, 75 cents; fare to Oklahoma City and return on two trips, $16.60; loss of time, $10; and special damages by reason of the fact that said trunk contained a large part of the wardrobe of plaintiff Sallie Rogers and her son, and that they were unable to immediately or for a long time to replace the same, and were at great expense and inconvenience in procuring clothing necessary and incident to their station in society, paying dressmakers' bills, being deprived of the pleasure of society, the sum of $125. The value of said trunk, together with its contents, was the sum of $408, and the same has been wholly lost to the plaintiffs through the negligence of the defendant, whereby plaintiffs have sustained great damages in the sum of $663.60."

For answer the defendants file a general denial, unverified.

The case was tried to the court and jury. In support of their cause of action by plaintiffs, Mrs. Rogers testified, among [292] other things, as follows:

"Q. What is your name? A. Mrs. Joplin Rogers. Q. Where do you reside? A. Lehigh, Okla. Q. How long have you lived at Lehigh? A. 23 years. Q. Do you know D. M. Phillips? A. I have met him. Q. Along about October, 1907, where were you living? A. At Lehigh. Q. Did you take a trip to Chickasha about that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long did you remain at Chickasha? A. Several weeks. Q. Do you remember when you left Chickasha for Oklahoma City? A. Some time in the month of October, 1907. Q. When you reached Oklahoma City did you employ the O. K. Bus & Baggage Company to transfer your trunk to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Station? A. Before we arrived at Oklahoma City a gentleman came on the train, gave me a check for my trunk, and I paid him to transfer it. Q. Have you called for your trunk? A. Yes. Q. Have you made any effort to locate it? A. Yes. Q. Do you know what was in your trunk? A. I made a list of the articles. Q. You made a list of the articles contained in it? A. Yes. Q. Now, to refresh your memory, that list was introduced as evidence and marked Exhibit A, the list that you made—you made soon after the trunk was lost? A. Several days after I discovered the trunk was lost. Q. Can you remember the different articles you had in the trunk at the time it was lost? A. Yes. Q. I believe you state that you made a list of the articles you had in the trunk, and that that list was filed in the trial of this suit two years ago. A. Yes, sir. Q. The list that you made and filed in the court at the trial before, also the exhibit in the petition, were copies of that list? A. Yes. Q. Mrs. Rogers, I will ask you to examine this and see if you know what it is. A. A list of articles contained in the trunk. Q. Have you the original list? A. No, sir; I left it in the court. Q. What was the value of the trunk at that time? A. $12. Q. I will ask you to refresh your memory from this memorandum and name another article contained in the trunk at the time it was lost. A. One lady's hat. Q. Do you remember the market value of that article at that time? A. Yes. Q. What was the market value of the hat at that time in Oklahoma City? A. $15. Q. Mrs. Rogers, did you own the trunk that you delivered to the defendant herein for transportation some time in the month of October, 1907? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you that trunk now? A. No, sir. Q. Mrs. Rogers, were you familiar [293] with the articles contained in the trunk that was lost? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know who placed them in the trunk? A. Yes, sir; I placed them in the trunk. Q. Who bought the goods? A. I bought them. Q. Mrs. Rogers, you state that you were the owner of the trunk that was lost containing articles belonging to yourself and family, and that afterwards you made a list of the articles contained in the trunk? A. Yes, sir. Q. When did you make out that list? A. I made out the list as I could remember the articles after I discovered that the trunk was lost. Every time I would think of an article that was in the trunk, I would place it on the list. Q. Did you give your attorneys a list of the articles contained in the trunk the day of the trial? A. Yes, sir. Q. Name the first article that you remember. A. A trunk. Q. Did you buy that trunk? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you remember what you paid for it? A. I paid $12 for it. Q. At the time the trunk was lost do you remember what articles were in it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Refresh your memory, and then, independent of any memorandum, state if you know another article that was lost at the time you delivered the trunk to the defendant herein besides the trunk. A. Yes. Q. State what other article was lost at the time mentioned herein. A. A hat. Q. Who bought that hat? A. I did. Q. What did you pay for the hat? A. It was a handmade hat, and I paid $15 for it. Q. What condition was the hat in when you delivered the trunk to the defendant herein? A. The hat was in good condition; I had never worn it. Q. Was the hat worth as much at the time it was lost as it was when you bought it? A. Yes. Q. State, if you know, what the reasonable market value of the hat was, or a hat of similar kind, at the time you delivered the trunk to the defendant herein to be transported to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway depot in Oklahoma City? (Defendant objects for the reason that it is not the proper way to prove the value of the hat. Objection sustained. Plaintiff excepts.) Q. Did you lose any other articles at that time? A. Yes. Q. What was it? A. A pair of lady's slippers. Q. Who was the owner of the slippers? A. I was. Q. What did you pay for them? A. $5. Q. At the time they were lost do you remember what the condition of the slippers were? A. Yes. Q. State to the jury the reasonable market value of the goods at the time you delivered them to the defendant in that community at that time. (Defendant objects for the reason that the witness has not shown herself properly qualified to testify as to the value of the articles contained [294] in said trunk. Objection sustained. Plaintiff excepts.) Q. Do you remember another article contained in the trunk? A. Yes, sir. Q. Name one. A. A black dress. Q. How long had you had the dress? A. Only a short time; it had never been worn. Q. Do you know what the dress cost? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who bought it? A. I did. Q. At the time it was lost do you know the condition as compared with its condition when you bought it? A. Yes, sir; it was in good condition. Q. Do you know what the reasonable market value of the dress was in Oklahoma City at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you seen similar articles bought and sold on the market? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know the exact value of the dress just prior to and subsequent to the time the dress was lost? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was it? (Defendant objects, for the reason that the witness has not shown herself properly qualified to testify as to the value of the dress. Objections sustained. Plaintiff excepts. It is hereby agreed by the plaintiff and defendant in this case as to the questions and answers to the remaining articles said to have been in said trunk in question shall virtually be the same, the objections the same, and the rulings of the court the same.) Q. Do you know any other article that was lost in the trunk? A. Yes. Q. Name one. A. One linen dress. Q. Who bought the linen dress? A. I did. Q. How much did you pay for it? A. $12. Q. Was the dress in the trunk at the time you delivered it to the defendant herein? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know what the reasonable market value of the dress was, or one of similar kind at that time in that community? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the reasonable market value of this article at that time and in that community? (Defendants object, for the reason that the witness has not shown herself properly qualified to testify as to the value of the articles contained in the trunk mentioned herein. Objection sustained. Plaintiff excepts.)"

The foregoing is a sample of the testimony offered and the ruling of the court thereon. It is apparent that the plaintiffs were unable to introduce their testimony as to the value of the goods lost, and upon the question of the loss of the goods there is no controversy.

At the close of the plaintiffs' testimony, the defendant D. M. Philips lodged the following demurrer:

[295] "Comes now the defendant and demurs to the testimony introduced by the plaintiffs in this case and says that it is not sufficient to make out a case against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiffs." "Demurrer sustained, and case dismissed, to which the plaintiffs except."

This ruling of the court seems to be upon the theory that it required expert testimony to establish the value of the trunk and the contents thereof, and that the witnesses have not shown themselves qualified by reason of special knowledge or information as to the value of goods of that class and character to place a value thereon. In this the court committed error. It is well established in this state that expert witnesses are not needed to prove the market value of chattels in common use, where such value is within the knowledge of persons of ordinary intelligence and experience, and that, where a witness testifies generally as to the value of articles in common use, it will be assumed that the market value is meant, unless it appears from the testimony of the witness that he bases the value given upon some other consideration. Such has been the holding of this court practically since its organization.

The plaintiff Mrs. Rogers testified not only that she bought the goods, and the price she paid for them, many of which had never been worn or used, but also that she had personal knowledge of the market value of the goods in Oklahoma City, the place where the trunk was lost, and not only that, but she testified that she knew the actual value of the goods, and notwithstanding her qualifications in that particular, and her testimony in that behalf, the court for some unaccountable reason was of the opinion that she was not qualified to state either the value of the goods or the market value thereof. On a trial for the conversion of goods, defendant may be asked as to the value of the goods at the time they were taken. Robinson v. Peru Plow, etc. Co. 1 Okla. 140, 31 Pac. 988.

"Expert witnesses are not needed to prove the . . . market value of chattels in common use, where such value is [296] within the knowledge of persons of ordinary intelligence and experience." Filson v. Territory, 11 Okla. 351, 67 Pac. 473.

In speaking upon this subject, and the tendency of courts, Justice Burford uses this language:

"There is too much of a tendency to require experts to testify as to matters of everyday occurrence and common knowledge. The average farmer at this day and age is possessed of sufficient intelligence and experience to enable him to tell the market price of farm products, live stock, and those articles they make common use of in their business, and generally are better qualified to fix the values than persons who are engaged in some specialty, and buy only when they can get a good bargain, and then sell the article at less than its value in order to encourage trade." Supra.

In this case the witness seemed to be a lady of more than ordinary intelligence, and who had had experience in purchasing goods of the character contained in the trunk, she knew the goods and knew their condition better than any other person. She knew and testified as to the extent of which they had been worn or used. She testified as to their original cost, which was proper, under the circumstances, and as to their reasonable value at the time they were delivered to the defendant. Her testimony was competent, and should have been submitted to the jury.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that this case should be reversed and remanded for new trial, and we so recommend.

By THE COURT.—It is so ordered.

NOTE.

Measure of Damages for Conversion of, or Failure to Deliver, Household Goods.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent decisions involving the measure of damages for the conversion of, or the failure to deliver, household goods. The earlier cases are collected in the notes to Barker v. Lewis Storage, etc. Co. 3 Ann. Cas. 889, and Watt v. Nevada Cent. R. Co. 62 Am. St. Rep. 772.

For a discussion of the measure of damages for the loss or destruction of property having no market value, see the notes to Southern Express Co. v. Owens, 9 Ann. Cas. 1143, and St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Dague, reported ante, this volume, at page 577.

It is generally held that the amount of recovery for the conversion of, or the failure to deliver, household goods is not limited to the price which could be realized by a sale in the market, the owner being allowed to recover the value of the goods to him based on his actual money loss resulting from his being deprived of the property. And in arriving at that value all the circumstances and conditions are to be considered, not including, however, any sentimental or fanciful value which he may attach to the goods. The reason for the rule seems to be that articles of this character cannot be said to have a marketable value which is fairly indicative of their real value to their owner and of his loss by being deprived of them. Birmingham R. etc. Co. v. Hinton, 157 Ala. 630, 47 So. 576; Kates Transfer, etc. Co. v. Klassen, 6 Ala. App. 301, 59 So. 355; Buerger v. Mabry (Ala.) 73 So. 135; Mathews v. Livingston, 86 Conn. 263, Ann. Cas. 1914A 195, 85 Atl. 529; Aufderheide v. Fulk (Ind.) 112 N. E. 399; Barbrick v. White Sewing Mach. Co. 180 Mich. 535, 147 N. W. 493; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Dunham, 36 Okla. 724, 129 Pac. 862; O. K. Transfer, etc. Co. v. Neill (Okla.) 159 Pac. 272; Lloyd v. Haugh, etc. Storage, etc. Co. 223 Pa. St. 148, 72 Atl. 516, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 188; Atchison, etc. R. Co. v. Smythe, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 557, 119 S. W. 892; Benedict v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (Tex.) 91 S. W. 811; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Dement (Tex.) 115 S. W. 635; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Giles (Tex.) 128 S. W.

282; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Wallraven (Tex.) 160 S. W. 116; Pecos, etc. R. Co. v. Grundy (Tex.) 171 S. W. 318; Smith v. Mine, etc. Supply Co. 32 Utah 21, 88 Pac. 683. See also Western Maryland R. Co. v. Martin, 110 Md. 554, 73 Atl. 267; Souther v. Hunt (Tex.) 141 S. W. 359; McCarthy v. Blackwell (Tex.) 162 S. W. 1163. Thus in Aufderheide v. Fulk, supra, it was said: "Articles in actual use in furnishing and equipping a home, and wearing apparel in use, even though they may have some second-hand market value, are not governed by the general rule of market value, for the law recognizes that they have a value when so used in the home that is not fairly estimated by their value as secondhand goods on the market. Where subordinate rules for the measure of damages run counter to the paramount rule of fair and just compensation, the former must yield to the principle underlying all such rules. For the loss of such property so situated and used, the measure of damages in case of conversion is the value to the owner under all the circumstances, based on actual damages sustained by being deprived of his property, not including any mere sentimental or fanciful value he may for any reason place upon it." In Ross v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 119 Mo. App. 290, 95 S. W. 977, an action against a carrier to recover damages for the loss of a davenport, the court, in holding that evidence of the value of the davenport at the place of consignment was admissible, said: "It is . . . contended that the court committed error in the admission of evidence of the value of the goods at Kansas City, whereas the measure of damages for loss in shipment is the value at their destination. As a rule, this is true. . . . But there are exceptions to the rule. We have a case illustrating an exception to the rule in this state, where the property lost in transit had no market value. It was held that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, evidence at the point of shipment was admissible, as it 'was the only kind of which the nature of the case was susceptible.' [Lachner v. Adams Express Co. 72 Mo. App. 13.] The 'davenport' in question was second-hand furniture which class of furniture has no regular market value."

The rule governing the measure of damages recoverable for the loss or conversion of household goods applies also where damages are sought to be recovered for the loss or conversion of clothing and wearing apparel. Aufderheide v. Fulk (Ind.) 112 N. E. 399; Jelalian v. New York, etc. R. Co. 134 App. Div. 381, 119 N. Y. S. 136; Erie R. Co. v. Steinberg (Ohio) 113 N. E. 814; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Dunham, 36 Okla. 724, 129 Pac. 862; O. K. Transfer, etc. Co. v. Neill (Okla.) 159 Pac. 272; Lloyd v. Haugh, etc.

Storage, etc. Co. 223 Pa. St. 148, 72 Atl. 516, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 188; Hofford v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 303, quoting 73 N. Y. 167; Houston Transfer, etc. Co. v. Whitcomb (Tex.) 147 S. W. 358; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Wallraven (Tex.) 160 S. W. 116; Pecos, etc. R. Co. v. Grundy (Tex.) 171 S. W. 318. See also Souther v. Hunt (Tex.) 141 S. W. 359.

The owner of household goods or wearing apparel may testify as to their value to him in an action to recover damages for their conversion, the objection to the testimony going to its weight rather than to its admissibility. Birmingham R. etc. Co. v. Hinton, 157 Ala. 630, 47 So. 576; Willard v. Valley Gas, etc. Co. 171 Cal. 9, 151 Pac. 286; McCarthy v. Blackwell (Tex.) 162 S. W. 1163; Pecos, etc. R. Co. v. Grundy (Tex.) 171 S. W. 318. And see the reported case. Compare Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Giles (Tex.) 126 S. W. 282.

Evidence of the cost price of household goods or wearing apparel is, it seems, admissible in an action for their loss or conversion. Kates v. Transfer, etc. Co. v. Klassen, 6 Ala. App. 301, 59 So. 355; Barbrick v. White Sewing Mach. Co. 180 Mich. 535, 147 N. W. 493; Jelalian v. New York, etc. R. Co. 134 App. Div. 381, 119 N. Y. S. 136; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Giles (Tex.) 126 S. W. 282; Smith v. Mine, etc. Supply Co. 32 Utah 21, 88 Pac. 683. In one case it was said in stating the reason for the admissibility of this kind of testimony: "The cost of an article may, or may not, be some evidence of its actual value. If the article in question has a market value when fresh or new, and the time of inquiry is within a short or reasonable time after its purchase in the market, then the cost price, taken in connection with the use or wear of the article, usually affords some evidence, at least, of actual value. Ordinarily the cost price is a fluctuating one, and depends upon so many extraneous conditions that the cost cannot be taken as the basis or measure of damage or loss, and for that reason the law has wisely provided that, whenever an article or thing in use has a known market value, this value and no other must control as the measure of recovery. In permitting evidence of the cost of the article in fixing its value, regard must therefore be had to all the conditions and circumstances; and where the time at which the cost is fixed, in view of all the circumstances, is too remote from the time of injury, the cost may not afford any guide whatever, and should not be permitted. In such cases the present market value of the article when new, if it has no other market value, would afford a better guide as a starting-point, and the actual value of the article should be determined by deducting from the cost price such an amount as its past use and wear would reduce its value in comparison to a new article of like kind. But in any case resort to the cost should be had only for the purpose of a starting-point, and as a means to ascertain the true or actual value of the article. It is in this sense that the courts lay down the rule, as we understand it, that cost is some evidence of value, and hence, in a proper case, may be admitted. The object of the law in all cases is to compensate the injured person for his loss—no more, no less. To attain this object, the rule of market value has been adopted as the one more nearly approximating the end in view. There are, however, exceptional cases where the rule cannot be applied to its full extent. When such is the case, the rule is to be followed as nearly as the circumstances of the case permit; but a party is not to be deprived of his property simply because his case may not fall within the regular rule governing the measure of damages." Smith v. Mine, etc. Supply Co. 32 Utah 21, 88 Pac. 683. But a verdict based solely on evidence of the cost price of the articles cannot be supported, especially where they have been in use for some time. Birmingham R. etc. Co. v. Hinton, 157 Ala. 630, 47 So. 576; Independent Linen Supply, etc. Laundry Co. v. Zakrowsky, 158 N. Y. S. 721; International, etc. R. Co. v. Bartek (Tex.) 175 S. W. 1106. See also Morris v. Harder's Fireproof Storage, etc. Co. 187 Ill. App. 72.

In an action for the conversion of a piano, evidence that the defendant had allowed a certain sum for the piano on the purchase price of a player piano was held to be admissible, the court saying: "It is also insisted that the court erred in allowing defendant's witness Udell to testify on cross-examination that defendant allowed $200 for the piano on the purchase price of a player piano at $650, over defendant's objection that if something was allowed to a credit, it would not be a valuation of the piano that was fair. No authority is cited to sustain this position. It may be true that appellant allowed more than it would have paid in cash, yet it was a valuation of some kind placed upon the piano by appellant at the time that it was converted, would at least tend to show its market value, and was eminently proper to go to the jury. The fact that the price of $200 allowed was on the purchase price of an instrument of greater value would be proper to consider in determining the weight to be given this evidence, but did not affect the admissibility." Wulschner-Stewart Music Co. v. Faulkner, 55 Ind. App. 208, 103 N. E. 665.

NORTH AVENUE BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION ET AL.

v.

HUBER.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 27, 1915.

270 Ill. 75; 110 N. E. 312.

Building and Loan Associations — Loan to Nonmember.

Where a building and loan association is authorized to lend only to its stockholders to the amount of stock held, and, after a loan to a stranger by a third party, attempts to purchase the note and mortgage therefor, its act is ultra vires, since it cannot do indirectly that which it could not do directly.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

When a building and loan association purchases a note and mortgage of one not a stockholder when it is authorized only to lend to its stockholders, it cannot foreclose a mortgage, its act in purchasing it being ultra vires; nor can its assignor be held a trustee and the mortgage be foreclosed by him for the association.

Error to Branch C. Appellate Court, First District.

Action by North Avenue Building and Loan Association et al., plaintiffs, against Christina Huber et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs in Circuit Court, Cook county: WALKER, Judge. Judgment modified by Appellate Court. Defendant named brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Frederick Mains for plaintiff in error.

Christian Meier for defendants in error.

[75] FARMER, C. J.—This case comes to this court upon a writ of certiorari to the Appellate Court for the First District to review the judgment of that court modifying, and affirming as modified, a decree of the circuit court of Cook county in a foreclosure suit begun and prosecuted by defendants in error against plaintiff in error and others.

The plaintiff in error, Christina Huber, and John Huber, are husband and wife. Prior to October 24, 1895, they became and were indebted to E. S. Dreyer & Co. in the [76] sum of $14,000 and to Kemper Bros. in the sum of $4,000. On said date, October 24, 1895, they executed a note, payable to the order of themselves, for $18,000, due in five years, with interest at six per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, and evidenced by coupon notes. The note was secured by a trust deed on real estate given to William Kemper as trustee. The Hubers indorsed the note and delivered it, with the trust deed, to Kemper, a member of the firm of Kemper Bros. The indebtedness of the Hubers to E. S. Dreyer & Co. was paid by a check drawn on the bank account of Kemper Bros., and the indebtedness to Kemper Bros. was satisfied by giving the Hubers credit on its indebtedness to that firm of $4,000. William Kemper was the treasurer of the defendant in error building association and banked the money coming into his hands as such treasurer to the account of Kemper Bros. Said firm of Kemper Bros. also deposited the firm's money in the same bank and to the same account. At the time William Kemper drew the check for the payment of the indebtedness of the Hubers to E. S. Dreyer & Co., Kemper Bros. had a balance in bank to their credit of $17,047.25. Of that amount $8,185.88 was funds of the defendant in error association. On November 12, 1895, the directors of the association at a regular meeting adopted a resolution that the association buy a $10,000 interest in the $18,000 note and trust deed of the Hubers and caused an order to be drawn for the payment of the money to William Kemper. Upon receipt of it he delivered, without indorsement, the note and trust deed to the association. A memorandum attached to the voucher to William Kemper stated the association was to hold the papers and receive the interest on $10,000 and Kemper was to receive it on $8,000. On November 18, 1895, the association bought an additional $4,000 interest in the Huber note and trust deed, and on September 8, 1896, the association bought the remaining $4,000 interest in the Huber note and trust deed. The Hubers paid the [77] interest on the note up to April 24, 1910, since which time they have paid nothing.

In the original bill to foreclose the trust deed the North Avenue Building and Loan Association and William Kemper were the complainants. The bill alleged the note was given for a loan made to the Hubers by the building association and that the trust deed was executed to secure the same. The bill was demurred to, and among the special grounds of demurrer assigned were that the bill did not allege the Hubers, or either of them, were stockholders or members of the association at the time the loan was made, and that the making of the loan was ultra vires and malum prohibitum. Without the court having ruled upon the demurrer, complainants asked and were granted leave to file an amended bill. There was a demurrer and plea to the amended bill, which were overruled, and plaintiff in error, Christina Huber, answered the bill. Subsequently an engrossed amended bill was filed by leave of court, in which the association and William Kemper, as trustee, were complainants. This bill alleges that the statement made in the original bill that the loan was made by the association to the Hubers was erroneous; that it arose from a misunderstanding of the facts by the solicitors for the complainants and was made without the knowledge of the complainants. The bill then alleges the loan of $18,000 was made to the Hubers by William Kemper; that the association had funds on hand, for which there was no demand from its members, and that it purchased the note and trust deed for the benefit of the members of the association and was then the legal holder and owner of the note. The bill alleges Christina Huber asserts that the purchase of the note and trust deed was an ultra vires act and that the association acquired no title to the securities thereby; that if such transaction should be held to be ultra vires, in that event the legal title to the note would be in William Kemper for the use of the association as the equitable owner of the [78] note and trust deed, and the trust deed should be foreclosed and the money realized therefrom held by Kemper as trustee for such person as may be equitably entitled thereto.

Christina Huber answered, denying the statement made in the original bill that the loan was made by the association to the Hubers was a mistake, and alleging that the complainant association was informed of and knew the contents of the bill at the time it was filed and persisted in said statement until the filing of the engrossed amended bill, which occurred long after the filing of the original bill and after evidence was heard. The answer sets up as matter of estoppel the admissions in the original bill, and also sets up that the investment of the association's money in the purchase of the note and trust deed was ultra vires and prohibited by statute.

The cause was referred to a master in chancery to take the testimony and report his conclusions. The master reported that the Hubers were not members of or stockholders in the North Avenue Building and Loan Association; that the loan was not made to them by said association but was made by Kemper, who, in making it, used $8,185.88 of the association's funds; that such use was without the authority of the association, and did not make it, in whole or in part, a loan by the association; that after the loan was made by Kemper the association purchased, or attempted to purchase, the securities as an investment; that the transactions were beyond the powers of the association, and the title to the trust deed and note did not pass to it but remained in Kemper, charged in equity with a trust in favor of the association. The master further reported that Kemper had a right to foreclose the trust deed but would be required to account to the association for the proceeds received from the foreclosure.

The master found and reported the amount due, principal, interest and $200 attorney fees, to the $20,165; that Kemper, as trustee for the association, had a lien on the premises described in the trust [79] deed for the said sum, and recommended a decree of foreclosure. Objections and exceptions to the master's report were overruled and a decree entered in accordance with the master's recommendations. The Appellate Court modified the decree as to the amount allowed for master's fees and in some other small matters, and as modified affirmed the decree of the circuit court.

The act under which the defendant in error building association was organized authorized it to loan its funds only to members of the association, and no loan was authorized to be made by the association in any sum in excess of the amount of stock held by the borrowing member. It is contended, however, by the association, that the loan was not made by it but was made by William Kemper and that the association bought the securities as an investment. This was the conclusion of the master, and the decree of the circuit court and the judgment of the Appellate Court affirming the decree of foreclosure were based upon that theory. It is conceded the association was unauthorized to make loans to anyone except members of and stockholders in the association, but it is contended that the loan was made by Kemper, and that by the purchase of it from him the equitable title to it passed to the association; that the legal title remained in Kemper in trust for the use and benefit of the association, and said association had a right to have the trust deed foreclosed by Kemper as such trustee and for its use. Considering the loan as having been made by Kemper to the Hubers, the association had no more authority to purchase it than it would have had to make it in the first instance. The power of the association in loaning its money was expressly limited by the statute to making loans to its members, only, and this excluded the power to purchase notes of persons not members of the association. The attempted purchase of the note and trust deed was therefore unauthorized and ultra vires.

[80] In National Home Building, etc. Assoc. v. Bank, 181 Ill. 35, 54 N. E. 619, 72 Am. St. Rep. 245, 64 L.R.A. 399, a building association exchanged real estate it had lawfully acquired with a party for other real estate and assumed the payment of a mortgage on the real estate it acquired in the trade. Afterward the board of directors of the association passed a resolution that the assumption clause in the deed was made without authority and directed the execution and a tender back to the grantor of a quit-claim deed for the property. This was done but the deed was not accepted. The holder of the note filed a bill to foreclose and asked for a decree against the building and loan association for any deficiency that might exist. This was resisted by the association on the ground that the clause assuming the mortgage was inserted in the deed without its knowledge and authority and was ultra vires, and that it had tendered back a quit-claim deed to the party from whom the conveyance was made. The circuit court entered a decree of foreclosure and for any deficiency that might exist against the association. This court reversed the decree for a deficiency on the ground that building associations have no power to acquire or hold real estate except such as has been mortgaged to them, and held the purchase of the property and assumption of the mortgage thereon were acts beyond the powers of the corporation. The contention of the holder of the incumbrance that the corporation had received the benefit of its contract and was estopped to raise the question of ultra vires was fully discussed, and it was held the case did not fall within the class of cases to which that doctrine is applicable. In part the court said: "It would be contradictory to say that a contract is void for an absolute want of power to make it and yet it may become legal and valid as a contract, by way of estoppel, through some other act of the party under such incapacity or some act of the other part chargeable by law with notice of the want of power." The court quoted with approval from Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace [81] Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 11 S. Ct. 478, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 55, that all contracts made by a corporation beyond the scope of its powers are unlawful and void and no action can be maintained on them. The court further quoted from the same case: "The view which this court has taken of the question presented by this branch of the case, and the only view which appears to us consistent with legal principles, is as follows: A contract of a corporation which is ultra vires in the proper sense,—that is to say, outside the object of its creation as defined in the law of its organization, and therefore beyond the powers conferred upon it by the legislature,—is not voidable, only, but wholly void and of no legal effect. The objection to the contract is, not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it, but that it could not make it. The contract cannot be ratified by either party, because it could not have been authorized by either. No performance on either side can give the unlawful contract any validity or be the foundation of any right of action upon it. When a corporation is acting within the general scope of the powers conferred upon it by the legislature, the corporation, as well as persons contracting with it, may be estopped to deny that it has complied with the legal formalities which are prerequisite to its existence or to its action because such prerequisites might, in fact, have been complied with. But when the contract is beyond the powers conferred upon it by existing laws, neither the corporation nor the other party to the contract can be estopped, by assenting to it or by acting upon it, to show that it was prohibited by those laws." This court pointed out the distinction between cases where the act of the corporation was beyond the powers conferred upon it by law, and cases where the act was within the scope of its powers but where there was a failure to comply with some regulation or where the power was improperly exercised. In Steele v. Fraternal Tribunes, 215 Ill. 190, 74 N. E. 121, 106 Am. St. Rep. 160, it was held if a contract with a corporation is beyond the powers conferred upon it by law, neither the corporation [82] nor the party dealing with it can be estopped to raise the question of ultra vires.

It seems clear under the decisions in this State, that if the trust deed had been made to secure a loan to the Hubers by the association no right to foreclose it would have been created. Is the association in any better position because the trust deed was made to secure a loan by Kemper and the securities purchased of him by the association? The association is in a court of equity asking equitable relief. Its alleged right to claim such relief grows out of its attempt to do an act which it had no authority to do. If it should be held, as insisted upon, that by the transaction the association became the equitable owner of the securities while the legal title still remained in Kemper, as trustee, for its use, and that by the transaction it became entitled to a foreclosure of the trust deed, it would establish a rule that the association could do indirectly what it is prohibited by law from doing directly. It is true, the Hubers have never paid the note and their moral obligation to pay it may be unaffected by the defense here interposed, but that would not justify holding the association is entitled to enforce payment by the remedy here sought to be pursued. Whatever the remedy of the association may be, we do not think it is by way of foreclosure in a court of equity. As said in National Home Building Assoc. v. Bank, supra: "No action can be maintained upon the unlawful contract, and in such cases, if the courts can afford any remedy, it cannot be done by affirming or enforcing the contract, but in some other manner." See also Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. supra.

In our opinion the decree of the circuit court and the judgment of the Appellate Court were erroneous, and they are reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

Rehearing denied December 9, 1915.

NOTE.To Whom Building and Loan Association May Loan Money.

The reported case holds that where the power of a building and loan association with respect to loaning its money is expressly limited by statute to loans to its members, it cannot indirectly make a loan to a nonmember. Hence, the attempted purchase of a note and trust deed of a nonmember is an unauthorized and ultra vires act on the part of the association.

The purpose of a building and loan association is to loan money to its own members. Cutbill v. Kingdom, 1 Exch. (Eng.) 494, 505, 17 L. J. Exch. 177; Morrison v. Glover, 4 Exch. 430, 19 L. J. Exch. 20, 14 J. P. 84; Kelly v. Mobile Bldg. etc. Assoc. 64 Ala. 501; Massey v. Citizens' Bldg. etc. Assoc. 22 Kan. 624. And it has been said that "in the absence of express statutory authority a building and loan association cannot loan its money outside of its own members." Vermont Loan, etc. Co. v. Whithed, 2 N. D. 82, 49 N. W. 318. Statutes in the various jurisdictions have generally expressly prohibited building and loan associations from lending their funds to nonmembers. Freehold Loan, etc. Soc. v. Farrell, 31 U. C. C. P. 453; Standard Sav. etc. Assoc. v. Aldrich, 163 Fed. 216, 89 C. C. A. 646, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 393; Home Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. McKay, 217 Ill. 551, 75 N. E. 569, 108 Am. St. Rep. 263; St. Joseph, etc. Loan, etc. Assoc. v. Thompson, 19 Kan. 321; National Inv. Co. v. National Sav. etc. Assoc. 49 Minn. 517, 52 N. W. 138; State v. Greenville Bldg. etc. Assoc. 29 Ohio St. 92; State v. Oberlin Bldg. etc. Assoc. 35 Ohio St. 258; Anderson v. Cleburne Bldg. etc. Assoc. 4 Willson Civ. Cas. Ct. App. (Tex.) § 174, 16 S. W. 298. See also Howard Mut. Loan, etc. Assoc. v. McIntyre, 3 Allen (Mass.) 571; In re Kennett Square Bldg. Assoc. 12 Pa. Dist. 630, 28 Pa. Co. Ct. 110; Green v. Hamilton Provident Loan Co. 31 U. C. C. P. 574. A loan to a nonmember in contravention of such a statutory prohibition is an ultra vires act on the part of the association. Kadish v. Garden City Equitable Loan, etc. Assoc. 151 Ill. 531, 38 N. E. 236, 42 Am. St. Rep. 256. See also Howard Mut. Loan, etc. Assoc. v. McIntyre, 3 Allen (Mass.) 571. And see the reported case.

Where the loan is made to a member, the fact that the joint obligation of the member and another is taken, or that the loan is secured by a mortgage executed by a third person, does not open the defense of ultra vires. People's Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Billing, 104 Mich. 186, 62 N. W. 373.

Where a building and loan association has no power to loan money except to members, it has been held that the application for a loan by a nonmember is virtually an application for membership in the association, and that the application for a loan and the issue of stock must be considered as one transaction, the result of which makes the borrower a member of the association. Boleman v. Citizens' Loan, etc. Assoc. 114 Wis. 217, 90 N. W. 199.

In Lockwood v. Robbins, 4 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 192, 1 Cleve. L. Rep. 101, it was held that where a building and loan association was forbidden by its charter to loan money to anyone except its members or depositors, a loan was valid where the borrower deposited twenty-five dollars before obtaining the loan, but immediately withdrew the deposit after the loan was obtained.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF

v.

BERTOLI.

Vermont Supreme Court—January 13, 1914.

*87 Vt. 297; 89 Atl. 350.Bills and Notes — Negotiable Instruments Law — Time of Taking Effect.

Negotiable Instruments Law (Acts 1912, No. 99) by the provisions of section 185 does not apply to negotiable instruments made and delivered prior to June 1, 1913.

Husband and Wife — Power of Wife to Contract.

Prior to the passage of Acts 1884, No. 140, relating to the property of married women (P. S. 3037-3051), a note executed by a married woman was void at law, but by such statute the disability of a married woman to contract with others than her husband is removed so far as her separate property is concerned, with a special limitation that nothing contained therein shall authorize her to become surety for her husband's debts except by way of mortgage duly executed, etc.

Suretyship for Husband.

A husband, being indebted to plaintiff bank for $14,500 and being requested to change the indebtedness, procured his wife to execute a note to the bank for $5,000 after one of the bank's officers had informed her that it was desired only as security for her husband's indebtedness and that the first money received on his collections would be applied in payment of the note. The husband was given credit on other notes for the amount of the wife's note, which was renewed from time to time until after the husband's death, when she was induced to pay a large portion thereof and give a new note for the balance, having proved the last renewal note as a claim against her husband's estate. It is held that the transaction showed that the wife executed the note as surety for her husband only, and that the notes as renewed were therefore void as violating P. S. c. 147, providing that a married woman may not become surety for her husband, and hence the note given in partial surrender of the last renewal note was without consideration and unenforceable.

Evidence — Varying Writing — Apparently Independent Transaction as Suretyship Contract.

That a married woman signed a note to plaintiff bank which on its face was a contract apparently independent of her husband's indebtedness to the bank does not preclude her from showing the true intent of the transaction and that she in fact executed the note as surety for him.

Suretyship — Liability Independent or Secondary — Test.

Whether a transaction between a married woman and her husband's creditor is one of suretyship or independent may depend on whether she received in person or for the benefit of her estate the consideration on which the contract depended; the question being determined, not from the form of the contract nor from its basis, but from its real purpose and effect.

Bills and Notes — Illegality — Effect of Renewal after Disability Removed.

Where a married woman executed a note to a bank which was several times renewed, the fact of such renewals, and that the last note was executed by her when sole for a remaining balance of the debt, does not preclude her from urging any defense against it that she might have made against the original note.

Suretyship — Waiver of Defense by Surety — Claim against Principal's Estate.

Where a wife executed a note to plaintiff as surety for her husband, and after executing several renewals her husband died, when she paid a part of the note to the bank and executed the note sued on for the balance, the fact that she proved the last renewal as a claim against her husband's estate does not affect her right to defend her liability on the note for the balance of the debt to the bank on the ground that it was void because she was incapable of becoming surety for her husband.

Consideration for Suretyship Contract by Wife — Evidence Inadmissible.

A married woman having executed a note to a bank as surety for her husband who had executed a mortgage to the bank covering their homestead, the title to which was then in him, the fact that pending her indebtedness to the bank he conveyed the title of the homestead to her without consideration does not authorize the introduction of the mortgage in a suit against her by the bank, on the theory that the mortgage tended to show consideration for her note.

Appeal and Error — Bill of Exceptions — Incorporation of Transcript by Reference.

That the transcript was "referred to and made a part of a particular exception" is not sufficient to give the transcript standing as part of the bill of exceptions so as to entitle the contents thereof to supersede the statement made in the bill.

Evidence — Conclusion of Witness — Purpose of Transaction.

On an issue as to whether a note of a married woman was an independent transaction or given as surety for her husband, an offer to prove by plaintiff's cashier that, if plaintiff took the note without any investigation of the parties or genuineness of the signature, it would appear that the transaction was done merely for collateral security as defendant claims and to get rid of the complaint of a bank examiner, is properly refused as an offer to elicit argument from the witness and not to show facts.

Hearsay — Statements of Principal to Surety — Inadmissible against Creditor.

In an action against a widow on a note executed by her to pay the balance of a debt which she had incurred as surety to plaintiff for her husband since deceased, statements made by him not in the presence of any of the officers of plaintiff bank by way of inducement to secure the witness' signature to the original note with his wife are hearsay and not admissible on the theory that the husband was the bank's agent to secure the note from his wife.

Agency — Proof — Acts and Declarations of Agent.

The fact of agency cannot be shown by the mere acts and declarations of the alleged agent.

Exceptions from Washington County Court:
FISH, Judge.

Action by First National Bank of Montpelier, plaintiff, against Maria Bertoli, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

J. W. Gordon and S. Hollister Jackson for defendant.

Edwin M. Harvey for plaintiff.

[299] TAYLOR, J.—The action is general and special assumpsit to recover on a note signed by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff. There was trial by jury and verdict directed for the plaintiff for the amount of the note with interest.

The defendant was the wife of the late Henry J. Bertoli. They had lived together as husband and wife for more than twenty years prior to his death on March 22, 1911. Mr. Bertoli was a granite manufacturer in the city of Montpelier. He had done business at the plaintiff bank for more than fifteen years [300] prior to his death. On September 11, 1908, he had paper which the plaintiff bank had discounted and held to the amount of about $14,500. Previous to this time the United States bank examiner had had some talk with the officers of the bank in regard to the amount of Mr. Bertoli's paper held by the bank. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that it called upon Mr. Bertoli to reduce his indebtedness and that after some talk with him he presented on September 11, 1908, a note payable to the order of the plaintiff ninety days from September 11, 1908, for five thousand dollars signed by the defendant and one G. Gentili; that the plaintiff bank took this note and surrendered to Mr. Bertoli and cancelled as paid about four thousand dollars of his notes, indorsing the balance of the five thousand dollar note upon other notes held by the bank against him; that the plaintiff bank knew at the time they received the note of the defendant and Gentili that the defendant was Harry J. Bertoli's wife; that no part of the proceeds of said note went for the benefit, directly or indirectly, of the defendant or Gentili or to them together; that it held this note for the ninety days, whereupon Mr. Bertoli presented a renewal note signed by the defendant and Gentili for ninety days and that there were five renewals of said note at intervals of ninety days by the defendant and Gentili; that the discounts were paid by Mr. Bertoli on each of such renewal notes; that the last renewal of the five thousand dollar note by both the defendant and Gentili was on November 12, 1909; that thereafter the note was renewed by the defendant signing it alone, and the bank knew that it thereby released Gentili; that the defendant's renewals extended a little beyond the date of the husband's death on March 22, 1911; that Arthur G. Eaton was cashier of the plaintiff and did all the business relating to matters in controversy as a duly authorized agent of the plaintiff; that at the time the plaintiff took the note of the defendant and G. Gentili, both signers did not own property above mortgages to exceed three thousand dollars; that the plaintiff received no security whatever for the said five thousand dollar note. The plaintiff's evidence further tended to show that on January 16, 1902, some six years previous to the giving of the five thousand dollar note, Mr. Bertoli gave a mortgage of his homestead to the plaintiff for three hundred and five dollars "and to secure other and further indebtedness" but this mortgage was not given by Mrs. Bertoli.

[301] The defendant's evidence tended to show that her husband had asked her to sign the five thousand dollar note in 1908 and that she refused to sign it; that thereupon Mr. Eaton representing the plaintiff, came to her and urged her to sign the note on the ground that it would be taken and held only as security for her husband's indebtedness to the plaintiff; that her husband, Mr. Bertoli, had a great deal of money coming due and more than enough to cover the five thousand dollar note and that the first money received on his collection would be applied in payment of this note; that her signing the note would help the bank with the examiner; that on this understanding she finally consented to sign the note and renewed the same from time to time during the lifetime of the said Mr. Bertoli; that after his death on March 22, 1911, Mr. Eaton, representing the bank, came to the defendant and asked her to pay the note out of five thousand dollars of insurance money that she had received on the life of her husband; that she objected to the payment of the note and told Mr. Eaton that it belonged to the estate to pay it; that he told her that he would take her home and just leave her $500 for a homestead; that she afterwards saw her attorney and that he told her she would have to pay it; that she then went to the bank on April 24, 1911, and paid on the note $3,468.76 and gave a note which is the note in suit for the balance of $1,673.90; that she proved the note against her husband's estate upon the advice of the commissioners; that she subsequently dismissed her first attorney and employed others; that there was never any consideration moving between the plaintiff and the defendant for the original five thousand dollar note or any renewals thereof or of the note in suit; that the defendant never had any benefit of the proceeds of said note and that she only signed it by way of surety for her husband's indebtedness to the plaintiff; that the defendant never authorized her husband to exchange her original five thousand dollar note for his, as the plaintiff's evidence tended to show was done, and that she never knew that such a transaction occurred until the time of the trial; that her husband never had any authority to dispose of her note in the way he did; that the note was not payable to him but was payable to the plaintiff itself.

At the close of all the evidence the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount due on the note on the ground that all the evidence showed no question to be submitted to the [302] jury and that as a matter of law the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The defendant excepted to the action of the court in ordering a verdict and rendering judgment thereon.

On the foregoing facts was the defendant entitled to go to the jury?

Defendant claims that there was evidence tending to show that the note created no obligation against her and that it was without consideration. Whether her contention is well founded depends upon her true relation to the transaction. It is argued that there was evidence for the jury tending to show that the obligation attempted to be created was that of surety for her husband's debt to the plaintiff, which the law forbids. If that is the legal effect of the transaction, it will not be doubted that she cannot be held liable (a) on the original note and its renewals because of the statute prohibiting a married woman from becoming surety for her husband's debt, P. S. 3039; nor (b) on the note in suit given after her husband's death in part payment of the last renewal note, because, if void, it furnished no consideration for her promise after she become sole. Hayward v. Barker, 52 Vt. 429, 36 Am. Rep. 762; Hubbard v. Bugbee, 58 Vt. 172, 2 Atl. 594; Valentine v. Bell, 66 Vt. 280, 29 Atl. 251.

In directing the verdict for the plaintiff, the court, in effect, ruled that the evidence, if tending to show that the first note was given merely as collateral to the husband's debt, was rendered immaterial by her subsequent conduct in giving renewal notes and finally in paying part and giving the note sued on for the balance. Confessedly there was evidence tending to show that the original undertaking, whatever its form and legal effect, was, in essence, an undertaking of suretyship. The case states that defendant's evidence tended to show that after her husband had asked her to sign the original note and she had refused, plaintiff's representative came to her and prevailed upon her to sign it upon the understanding that it would be taken and held only as security for her husband's indebtedness to the bank, and that on the same understanding the note was renewed from time to time during the lifetime of her husband; so that there was evidence tending to show that defendant's relation to the transaction remained unchanged during the time covered by the several renewals all of which were made during the lifetime of her husband.

[303] Considering the evidence in the light most favorable to the defendant, although the original note signed by the defendant and Gentili was in form a promise from the defendant to the plaintiff and on its face the defendant was maker and not surety, still it was signed with express understanding that it was to be held by the plaintiff only as security for Mr. Bertoli's existing indebtedness to satisfy the objections of the bank examiner; it was further agreed that the first money received by the bank on Mr. Bertoli's collections should be applied in payment of this note; no part of the proceeds of the note inured to the benefit of the signers; it was used, without the knowledge of the defendant, until after the final transaction in which the note in suit was given, to pay and discharge a portion of Mr. Bertoli's indebtedness to the bank; at the time of receiving the note the plaintiff knew that the defendant was wife of the principal debtor and that the note was signed by her for use as collateral security. On these facts was she undertaking to become surety for her husband's debts within the meaning of P. S. 3039?

The inquiry is not affected by the recent negotiable instruments act, as its provisions do not apply to negotiable instruments made and delivered prior to June 1, 1913. No. 99, Acts of 1912, § 195. Prior to the passage of No. 140, Acts of 1884, relating to the property rights of married women, now embodied in P. S. chapter 147, a note executed by a woman while femme covert was held to be absolutely void at law. Brown v. Sumner, 31 Vt. 371; Southworth v. Kimball, 58 Vt. 337, 2 Atl. 120. By No. 140, Acts of 1884, the disability of a married woman to contract with others than her husband was removed so far as her sole and separate property is concerned, but with the special limitation that "nothing herein contained shall authorize a married woman to become surety for her husband's debts except by way of mortgage duly executed as now provided by law." This limitation is now contained in P. S. 3039.

In applying this limitation upon the right of a married woman to make contracts with any person other than her husband, we should take into consideration the extent of her disability before the act of 1884. As has been said, her contracts were absolutely void at law. In equity, however, she was deemed a femme sole sub modo in dealing with her separate estate. Her debts contracted in its management and for its benefit, or for her benefit on the credit of such estate, in equity were enforced [304] against such estate, whether personal or real, unless the instrument creating the estate protected it against being charged with such debt; but her general contracts not thus connected with and growing out of her separate estate, being void at law, were not, even in equity, enforced against such estate unless legally made a charge thereon, by mortgage, if real estate, or by pledge and delivery, if personal property. Dale v. Robinson, 51 Vt. 20, 29, 31 Am. Rep. 669; Priest v. Cone, 51 Vt. 495, 31 Am. Rep. 695. But in no case could she be held personally liable. The theory upon which recovery was had out of her separate estate was that the credit was given to the estate and not to the wife individually. There was no personal liability. Sargeant v. French, 54 Vt. 384, 391. It follows that before the passage of No. 140, Acts of 1884, a married woman could not bind herself personally as surety for, or guarantor of, the debt of another, nor even in equity charge her separate estate by such an undertaking; for to charge her separate estate it was not enough to show her promise to pay the debt. It was necessary to show further that the debt for the payment of which the promise was made went to the benefit of her separate estate, or to her benefit on the credit of such estate. Southworth v. Kimball, 58 Vt. 337, 339, 2 Atl. 120. With this as a background, it remains to be considered how far the act of 1884 emancipated a married woman from the disabilities that the then existing law imposed upon her right to make contracts.

While, as was said in Dietrich v. Hutchinson, 81 Vt. 160, 171, 69 Atl. 661, it is an enabling act and not a disabling or restrictive act, it was not the intention of the legislature to set a married woman wholly "free from the thralldom of the common law." It was designed to remove her disabilities so far, and so far only, as could safely be done without prejudice to the marriage relation. It was regarded as against public policy to permit the wife to contract with her husband, or to make contracts with others affecting her property in which the husband continued to have rights by virtue of a marital relation, viz.: property not held to her sole and separate use. As to such property she is still under the common-law disability. Rowley v. Shepardson, 83 Vt. 167, 74 Atl. 1002, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1078; Laird v. Perry, 74 Vt. 454, 52 Atl. 1040, 59 L.R.A. 340; Hubbard v. Hubbard, 77 Vt. 73, 2 Ann. Cas. 315, 58 Atl. 969, 107 Am. St. Rep. 749, 67 L.R.A. 969; Ainger v. White, 85 Vt. 446, 82 Atl. 666. For the same reason, it was also regarded as being unwise to permit her to make contracts with others by which she became [305] surety for her husband's debts except by way of mortgage. Nor do we look far to discover the reason for this limitation upon her right to make contracts. Dependence and natural feelings of trust and confidence arising from the marital relation unfit the wife to "deal at arm's length" with her husband, or with one seeking to fortify his claim against the husband, as is amply illustrated by what the defendant's evidence tended to show happened in this case. Our law makers thought, it seems, that the wife would be deterred from making improvident contracts of suretyship for her husband by requiring that such contract should be by way of mortgage only, thus warning her of the consequences of her act.

Such being the policy of the law, the courts should scan with jealous eye any attempt by indirection to accomplish what the law forbids. While freedom to contract with others than her husband with reference to her sole and separate estate, in the present state of the law, may permit a wife to borrow money on the credit of such estate with which to pay her husband's debts,—a question which we do not need to decide for such was not the case at bar,—the courts will look behind the mere form of the transaction to discover its true import; and if it appears that the spirit, if not the letter, of the statute abridging the power of the wife to contract is being infringed, it becomes their duty to afford her the protection that the law guarantees. As was said in Field v. Campbell, 164 Ind. 389, 72 N. E. 260, 108 Am. St. Rep. 301: "If it appears that an elaboration of outward details was, as both parties knew, but a cloak to cover an attempt to conclude a contract in violation of the statute, the indirection in method by which they have proceeded will not avail to save the transaction." Also in Long v. Crosson, 119 Ind. 3, 21 N. E. 450, 4 L.R.A. 783: "Whatever device may be resorted to for the purpose of evading the statute, if the person seeking to enforce the contract knew of, or participated in, the design, or purpose—remained ignorant, courts will deal with the transaction according to its substance, regardless of the form in which it has been disguised."

In states where the common-law disability of a femme covert to contract still exists so far as to prevent her from becoming surety for her husband's debts the decisions are numerous and nearly all to the same effect. A few more recent cases are noticed to illustrate their trend.

[306] An acknowledgement by a married woman of liability for advances made her husband, and her undertaking that the amount of such advances should be set off against her interest in certain lands, was invalid under Code 1896, § 2529, providing that the wife shall not become surety for the husband. Horton v. Hill, 138 Ala. 625, 36 So. 465. Where a husband and wife executed a joint note as a basis of credit for goods to be furnished the husband in conducting his business, "and for things for her family," to be furnished out of the payee's store, the wife's relation to the note, as to the goods to be supplied, and which were supplied, to the husband for carrying on his business, was that of surety only. Smith v. Hardman, 99 Ga. 381, 27 S. E. 731. A wife who executed a mortgage on her homestead as additional security for notes executed by her husband was merely a surety as to the execution of the mortgage. Lingenfelter v. Bowman, 156 Ia. 649, 137 N. W. 946. Under Code §§ 1754, 1783, 5087, positively forbidding any assumption by a wife of the debts of her husband, if a creditor of the husband in any manner receives in payment of his debt money of the wife, knowing it to be hers, the wife can recover of him the amount so paid. Lewis v. Howell, 98 Ga. 428, 25 S. E. 504. A contract based on a mere colorable transaction to which the lender is a party and a wife the borrower, the purpose of which is to make the wife surety or the husband, will not be enforced against her. Johnson v. A. Leffler Co. 122 Ga. 670, 50 S. E. 488. Where a married woman gave a note to one to whom her husband was indebted in satisfaction of the indebtedness, the wife was not the less a surety because of the fact that the note was given to one to whom the husband was then indebted. Harbaugh v. Tanner, 163 Ind. 574, 71 N. E. 145. A husband applying to a bank for a loan was refused, but was told that he could have it on a note with the wife as principal, or that the loan would be made to the wife. Upon the husband's afterward tendering the note signed by him and his wife with the wife's signature above his own, the proceeds of the note were placed to the husband's credit on the bank's books. The cashier of the bank knew that the husband was the only person to be benefited by the note, and the wife had nothing to do with the transaction except to sign the note; she neither having applied for a loan nor having been seen nor consulted by the bank. Held, that the loan was to the husband as principal, with the wife as surety. The device of placing the [307] wife's signature above the husband's would not evade the statute making the wife's estate not liable upon her contract to be another's surety. Farmers' Bank v. Beck (Ky.) 114 S. W. 1189. Where the husband and wife signed a note jointly, the word "Principal" appearing after the wife's name, when the fact was that the note was executed for the purpose of taking up a note executed by the husband with another as surety, the wife was surety merely, and was therefore not bound. Postell v. Crumbaugh, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2193, 66 S. W. 830. A married woman cannot bind herself by a note given as surety for her husband in order to secure the payment of money nominally received by her, yet in fact, received for the use of her husband. Feather v. Feather, 116 Mich. 384, 74 N. W. 524, 4 Detroit Leg. N. 1209. Where a loan is made to a husband, and he gets the money, and the land on which the deed of trust, signed by the husband and wife, is given, belongs to the wife, her position is that of surty to him. Bruegge v. Bedard, 89 Mo. App. 543. Under Pub. St. c. 176, § 2, providing that no contract or conveyance by a married woman as surety for her husband, nor any undertaking by her in his behalf, shall be binding on her, a wife is not liable on a note given by her for money borrowed by her, and used to pay his note to the person from whom she borrowed the money, provided such payment was a part of the agreement whereby the money was loaned to her. Newport First Nat. Bank v. Hinton, 69 N. H. 509, 45 Atl. 351. Where goods were billed and receipted for in the husband's name, and the wife had nothing to do with ordering them, and there was no evidence that the sellers believed they were giving credit to her, she is not liable for the price because afterwards, when an attachment was about to be made against the husband, she agreed that she and her husband would pay for the goods if the attachment was forborne, since that only tends to prove a promise to pay to the debt of another. Mitchell v. Miller, 54 N. Y. S. 180, 25 Misc. 179. Where a husband is largely indebted to a bank of which he is president, and borrows money to pay the debt, and his wife, who is in no way responsible for it, gives her individual note, secured by bank stock, and her bond, secured by a mortgage, which is joined in by her husband, the wife is surety only for the debt of her husband. Stewart v. Stewart, 207 Pa. St. 59, 56 Atl. 323. Where one who had loaned a husband money took the note of husband and wife without having had negotiations [308] or communications with her as to the matter, he cannot invoke against her an estoppel to set up that she was a mere surety. Ritter v. Bruss, 116 Wis. 55, 92 N. W. 361.

The fact that the defendant signed the note, which, on its face, was a contract with the plaintiff apparently independent of her husband's indebtedness, does not preclude her from showing the true intent of the transaction. It is not necessary that she bring herself within the rules by which the rights of sureties are ordinarily determined. Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. Caswell, 65 Vt. 231, 26 Atl. 956. In the latter case it was held that it was always competent for a married woman who has signed a personal obligation with her husband to show that her relation to the obligation is that of surety. It is consistent with the policy of the law limiting her right to become surety for her husband's debts to permit her to show that a note signed by her in which her husband does not join is given as collateral security of her husband's indebtedness, when, as here, it appears that the other party to the note was cognizant of all the facts. Indeed, it seems that the case was tried in the court below upon this theory, as the evidence tending to support such claim was received without objection.

A satisfactory test as to whether the transaction was one of suretyship within the meaning of P. S. 3039 is whether the defendant received in person, or for the benefit of her estate, the consideration upon which the contract depends; and the question is to be determined, not from the form of the contract, nor from the basis upon which the transaction was had, but from its real purpose and effect. The defendant's evidence, if believed, presented a case clearly within the disabling statute and brought the knowledge of the facts home to the plaintiff. It follows that she was at least entitled to go to the jury. The questions of burden of proof and whether on the plaintiff's case she would have been entitled to a directed verdict are not presented, as these questions were not raised below.

The fact that the note was renewed several times and that the note in suit was given after the defendant became sole does not, as has already been seen, affect the defendant's liability. In the circumstances, any defence that could be made against the original note may be made against renewals thereof. Tyler v. Anderson, 106 Ind. 185, 6 N. E. 600. The last renewal note being void as to the defendant, the note sued on fails of consideration, [309] on the authority of our own cases cited above. The cases in this State cited by the plaintiff on the question of consideration are not in point, none of them involving the disability of married women to contract and they are entirely in harmony with our cases in which that question is ruled against the plaintiff's contention. The fact that she proved the note against her husband's estate does not affect her right to make this defence. While it might throw light upon her claim as to what the transaction in fact was, it would not, as the plaintiff contends, furnish consideration for the note and would not preclude her from asserting that the note was void.

Against defendant's objection and exception the court received in evidence a mortgage to the bank executed by Mr. Bertoli alone covering the homestead, the title to which was then in him. This mortgage was given more than six years before the first note signed by the defendant was delivered to the bank and secured past and future indebtedness of Bertoli to the bank. The mortgage was in force at the time said note was given. The mortgage was offered and received upon the theory that, in connection with the evidence of the surrender to Bertoli of indebtedness to the amount of the note given by the defendant, and with the offer to show further that after the note was given by the defendant she acquired title to the homestead by a series of conveyances without consideration, the surrender by the plaintiff to Bertoli of his notes secured by the mortgage for the wife's unsecured note furnished a consideration moving to the defendant for her note to the bank.

The plaintiff's contention cannot be sustained. Among other objections, the defendant insisted that the mortgage did not tend to show consideration for the note; and that was, so far as appears, its only materiality. At the time the original note was given title to the mortgaged property was in the husband. The only property interest she then had in the premises was a homestead interest, and as to that the mortgage was void, as she did not join in its execution. P. S. 2553; Martin v. Harrington, 73 Vt. 193, 50 Atl. 1074, 87 Am. St. Rep. 704. If it had appeared that she gave the note to relieve the mortgaged premises of so much of the indebtedness resting upon it (which did not in fact appear), it would not have benefited her separate estate, as there was no valid incumbrance resting upon it. The fact that she subsequently acquired title to the mortgaged premises relieved by so much of [310] the incumbrance placed upon it by her husband would not relate back to furnish consideration for the note, certainly unless it appeared that the note was given in contemplation of the subsequent transfer to her. On the case presented it was error to receive the mortgage.

On this question the transcript of the evidence was "referred to and made part of this exception." This reference is not sufficient to give the transcript standing as part of the bill of exceptions. It will not be permitted to contradict or override the statement of the bill unless made controlling. It is not enough to refer to it generally. State v. Howard, 83 Vt. 6, 24, 74 Atl. 392; Lawson v. Crane, 83 Vt. 115, 118, 74 Atl. 641; Slack v. Bragg, 83 Vt. 404, 412, 76 Atl. 148. This being so, we dispose of the question as it is presented in the exceptions.

As bearing upon the question whether the plaintiff accepted the original note in the way its evidence tended to show the defendant offered to show by its cashier that, "if the plaintiff took the note without any investigation of the parties or genuineness of the signature, it would appear that the whole thing was done merely for the purpose of collateral security, as the defendant claims, and to get rid of the complaint of the bank examiner." The offer was excluded to which the defendant was allowed an exception. This was not error. The offer was not to show facts but to elicit argument from the witness. If the offer had been to show that the bank made no such inquiries as a basis for argument, a different question would be presented, which we do not need to consider now, as the question is not raised by the exception.

The sworn statement of G. Gentili who signed the original note with the defendant by agreement was used as a deposition, reserving the right to object to matters of substance. Certain portions of this statement, on the plaintiff's objection, were excluded on the ground that the statements of Bertoli referred to in the deposition were not made in the presence of any of the officers of the bank, to which the defendant was allowed an exception. The case shows that the rejected statements were made by Bertoli to the witness and the defendant with no representative of the bank present. They were by way of inducement to secure the witness's signature to the note and were clearly hearsay and so properly excluded unless they fall within the rule that permits declarations of an agent made in the course of his [311] agency to be shown as part of the transaction. The rule invoked by the defendant requires that the utterance of the agent must have been made in and about the business on which the agent was employed and while actually engaged in that business. 3 Wig. § 1797.

The defendant contends that Bertoli was the bank's agent to procure this note and that as such his declarations would be evidence against the plaintiff. Defendant says further that she had a right to show what authority Bertoli had and that she had no better way to do this than to show what he said to induce her and Gentili to sign the note.

As to the latter contention, it is enough to say that the fact of agency cannot be shown by the mere acts and declarations of the alleged agent. Prouty v. Nichols, 82 Vt. 181, 72 Atl. 988, 137 Am. St. Rep. 996. The case does not support the defendant's claim that Bertoli was acting as agent of the bank. On the plaintiff's case, if an agent, it was for the signers of the note to effect delivery, and the defendant's evidence did not present a case of agency. There being no other theory urged upon which this evidence was admissible, we hold that it was properly excluded.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

I. Introductory.

The general disability of coverture existing under the common law precluded the right of the wife to become surety for her husband. The early view was well expressed in Ben- net v. Smith, 4 Pa. L. J. Rep. 456, 3 Pa. L. J. 138, as follows: "Looking upon the transaction merely as one where one party holds a station of influence in relation to another, it is discountenanced by the law because of the danger that undue influence may be exerted. . . . But there is an objection of serious importance growing out of the ultimate operation of this contract. If the wife should have to pay the money, then the husband becomes her legal debtor, and she will have her remedy against him. She will then become the plaintiff, getting judgment, issuing execution, and selling her husband's property for her benefit. How can these things be, consistently with the harmony of the marriage relation? 'Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder.'"

Constitutional and statutory provisions in the various jurisdictions have caused a considerable departure from the general common-law doctrine, but the rule on the particular point under consideration has not been uniformly established. The purpose of this note is to collate the cases dealing with the inquiry whether a married woman may become surety for her husband. Statutes are treated only as they are involved in the cases. The scope of the note is not confined to technical suretyship, but includes the general question of security. For convenience in presentation, however, the distinction made in some statutes between the assumption of a general liability and the pledge of specific property is followed throughout the note.

The Arkansas Act of 1915, enabling a married woman to contract as a feme sole, and construed to authorize the execution by a married woman of a promissory note for a debt of her husband, has been held not to contravene the constitutional provision that the property of a married woman shall not be subject to the debts of her husband, since that provision means that her property shall not be subject to her husband's debts, without some affirmative act on her part. Holland v. Bond, 189 S. W. 165. Prior to the Act of 1915, a married woman could contract only in reference to her separate property or business, and could not become surety for her husband unless by the contract of suretyship she created a lien on her separate estate or some part thereof. McCarthy v. People's Sav. Bank, 108 Ark. 151, 156 S. W. 1023; Goldsmith Bros. Smelting, etc. Co. v. Moore, 108

The rule in Hawaii was stated in Hackfeld v. Medcalf, 20 Hawaii 47, Ann. Cas. 1912D 105 as follows: "While it is true, under our statute, a married woman cannot contract with her husband, there is no reason or rule of law prohibiting her from entering into a contract as surety for her husband. Indeed, the statute (sec. 2252, R. L.), cited by counsel for plaintiff, with two exceptions only, and the contract of suretyship is not one of those, provides that 'a married woman may make contracts, oral and written, sealed and unsealed, in the same manner as if she were sole.' This language is broad and comprehensive, and we think includes the contract of suretyship."

In Iowa it has been provided by statute that "contracts may be made by a wife and liabilities incurred, and the same enforced by or against her, to the same extent and the same manner as if she were unmarried." Code 1897, § 3164. Apparently that statute has not been construed with reference to the right of a married woman to become surety for her husband on general contract. (See infra, this note as to pledge or mortgage of separate estate.) However, this and related statutes were construed generally in Spafford v. Warren, 47 Ia. 47, wherein the court said: "Coverture, in Iowa, ought to be no shelter to the wife against the enforcement of the rights of others growing out of her contracts. As she has all the rights of the husband, she must assume all his obligations." And see Low v. Anderson, 41 Ia. 476. Formerly it was held that the wife could not bind herself personally as surety for her husband. Jones v. Crosthwaite, 17 Ia. 393; Wolf v. Van Metre, 23 Ia. 397; Sweazy v. Kammer, 51 Ia. 642, 2 N. W. 506.

Under the Maine statute of 1866, which conferred on married women the general power of contract, the power of contracting as a surety has been upheld in broad terms, which apparently include suretyship for the husband. Mayo v. Hutchinson, 57 Me. 546.

The Massachusetts statute has been applied in a case wherein it was said: "Before the St. of 1874, c. 184, . . . contracts could only be made by a married woman in reference to her separate property, business or earnings. . . . But this statute has removed that restriction, and in the broadest terms enables a married woman to 'make contracts, oral and written, sealed and unsealed, in the same manner as if she were sole,' and does not require that the consideration of her contracts should inure to her own benefit. The provision that nothing in this act shall authorize her 'to convey property to, or make contracts with, her husband,' is evidently not intended to impose any new restriction on her capacity, but merely to affirm the rule of the common law, so far as her husband is the other party to her grant or contract; and does not prevent both of them from binding themselves by a joint promise to a third person, within the authority conferred by the statute. Parker v. Kane, 4 Allen 346. The female defendant in each of the cases before us is therefore liable to the plaintiff upon her contract with him, although, by reason of her incapacity to contract with or to sue her husband, no contract of indemnity could be made or implied as between them, as there might be in the case of two promisors capable of contracting with and suing each other. A contract of indemnity between principal and surety is no part of and nowise affects their contract with the creditor." Major v. Holmes, 124 Mass. 108. For cases before the statute of 1874, see Athol Mach. Co. v. Fuller, 107 Mass. 437; Yale v. Wheelock, 109 Mass. 502.

The Minnesota rule was set forth in Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Allis, 23 Minn. 337, wherein the court said: "The first of these points depends on Laws 1869, c. 56. Section 3 of that act reads: 'No married woman shall be liable for any debts of her husband, nor shall any married man be liable for any debts or contracts of his wife, entered into either before or during coverture, except for necessities furnished to the wife after marriage, where he would be liable at common law.' It is argued that, as this note and mortgage were to secure the debt of the husband, she is not liable personally upon them, under this section. Apparently, a good answer to this is that the obligation of the note and mortgage is her debt as well as that of the husband; and, unless the section can be construed as disabling her to make a contract, the consideration for which is a prior debt of her husband, this answer must be conclusive. The defendant claims that, as at the common law the wife was not liable for the husband's debts, the section was not necessary to exclude such liability, and that the section could not have been inserted for that purpose, but must have been for the purpose of disabling her to contract a liability in consideration of such a debt. To give this effect to the section would be to allow inference and conjecture to qualify and restrict the meaning of the clear and precise language of the act removing the wife's common-law disability to contract. Section 2 provides that 'any married woman shall be capable of making any contract, either by parol or under seal, which she might make if unmarried, and shall be bound thereby.' Then follow clearly expressed exceptions to her power to contract without her husband, relating only to her real estate. Section 4 expressly retains the common-law disabilities of husband and wife to contract with each other relative to the real estate of either, or to any authority from one to the other to convey real estate, and continues: 'But, in relation to all other subjects, either may be constituted the agent of the other, or contract each with the other, as fully as if the relation of husband and wife did not exist.' In view of this clear enabling language, and of the clearly expressed exceptions to it, no implication against the force of such language can be allowed from the language of section 3, unless such implication necessarily follows from the presence of the section in the act. It may not have been strictly necessary to insert the section for the purpose of preventing any question as to the liability of one for the debts of the other; but, in view of the difficulties of the subject, it was very proper to be inserted for that purpose, and we think such was its purpose. The note and mortgage were therefore valid."

In Missouri the rule has been stated as follows: "Under our present statute relating to married women, the wife is no longer subject to the common-law disability to contract, except only when she attempts to contract with her husband. This exception remains because the statute did not remove the husband's disabilities. As to the wife, however, the new section engrafted by the revision of 1889, provides that she 'shall be deemed a feme sole so far as to enable her to carry on and transact business on her own account, to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued,' etc. R. S. 1889, sec. 6864. 'The power to contract here given is as broad as that of a feme sole—not limited to any particular class of contracts, or confined to any species of property.' Brown v. Dressler, 125 Mo. 589. Or, as the St. Louis court of appeals states it, 'the intention of the legislature was to confer upon a married woman the absolute freedom of contract as to all the world, except her husband.' McCorkle v. Goldsmith, 60 Mo. App. 475. Under the facts agreed in the case at bar, the defendant, a married woman, contracted with the plaintiff to stand as security for her husband on the note in suit. This was as binding on the defendant as if she had been single and unmarried." Grandy v. Campbell, 78 Mo. App. 502.

The Nebraska rule was announced in McKell v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 62 Neb. 608, 87 N. W. 317, wherein it was said: "After considering the married woman's act from almost every point of view, this court stands irrevocably committed to the doctrine that a married woman is liable on her contract of suretyship, if made with reference to and upon the faith and credit of her separate estate." In Grand Island Banking Co. v. Wright, 53 Neb. 574, 74 N. W. 82, the court said: "The statute does not undertake to confer upon a married woman an unrestricted power to make contracts, but such right is limited to contracts made with reference to, and upon the faith and credit of, her separate property or estate. Upon such contract she is liable, but all her other engagements and obligations are void as at common law. To hold unqualifiedly that a married woman has the same right to enter into contracts, and to the same extent, as a man would be to disregard the qualifying clause of said section 2, which confers upon her the authority to 'enter into any contract with reference to the same [her property] in the same manner, to the same extent, and with like effect as a married man may in relation to his real and personal property.'"

In New York the statute of 1884, providing generally that a married woman may contract as if unmarried, has been held to authorize the wife to become surety for her husband, notwithstanding that contracts between husband and wife were by the same statute prohibited. Bowery Nat. Bank v. Sniffen, 54 Hun 394, 7 N. Y. S. 520. The contract of suretyship must be in writing. Mitchell v. Miller, 25 Misc. 179, 54 N. Y. S. 180; Bauer v. Amba, 144 App. Div. 274, 128 N. Y. S. 1024. And it must be supported by a consideration. Bauer v. Amba, 144 App. Div. 274, 128 N. Y. S. 1024; Harlem River Bank v. Meyer, 16 N. Y. S. 872. Before the statute of 1884, a married woman could become surety for her husband, but only by expressly charging her separate estate. Ledlie v. Vrooman, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 109; Hanse v. DeWitt, 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 53; Phillips v. Wicks, 45 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 477; Yale v. Dederer, 22 N. Y. 450, 78 Am. Dec. 216, 18 N. Y. 265, 72 Am. Dec. 503; Corn Exch. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 42 N. Y. 613, 1 Am. Rep. 601; Yale v. Dederer, 68 N. Y. 329; Gosman v. Cruger, 69 N. Y. 87, 25 Am. Rep. 141; Woolsey v. Brown, 74 N. Y. 82; Phillips v. Wicks, 36 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 254; Queens County Bank v. Leavitt, 56 Hun 426, 10 N. Y. S. 193. See also Sexton v. Fleet, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 477.

The North Dakota statute was construed in Colonial, etc. Mortg. Co. v. Stevens, 3 N. D. 265, 55 N. W. 578, wherein the court said: "The one which bears most directly upon the question is section 2590 of the Comp. Laws. It declares that 'either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might, if unmarried, subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts.' This statute is very broad in its language. It is true that the contract must be one respecting property; but we cannot assent to the view that it must relate to the married woman's separate property. . . .

In West Virginia under the separate estate chapter in the Code of 1868 a feme covert as to her separate estate was regarded as a single woman, and she could in writing bind her estate as surety for her husband. The language which declared that a wife might hold certain estate to her sole use free from her husband's control and debts was held only to change the common-law rule by which the husband acquired ownership of all her personality and the use of the rents and profits of her realty, and such statute did not prevent the wife from subjecting her estate to her husband's debts. Williamson v. Cline, 40 W. Va. 194, 20 S. E. 917. "By the Act of 1891 it was provided that 'no married woman shall become the security, indorser, or guarantor of or for her husband,' etc. See Code 1891, p. 621, c. 66, s. 11. This section was repealed by Act of February 16, 1893. See chapter 3, Acts 1893, p. 6. It was not intended that the Act of 1891 should have any retroactive effect." Wick v. Dawson, 42 W. Va. 43, 24 S. E. 587.

b. Illustrations.

The Alabama statute provides that "the wife shall not, directly or indirectly, become the surety for the husband." Code, § 4497. See Lamkin v. Lovell, 176 Ala. 334, 58 So. 258.

In Georgia the supreme court has said: "The Civil Code, sec. 2488, provides that 'while the wife may contract, she cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor by any assumption of the debts of her husband, and any sale of her separate estate, made to a creditor of her husband, in extinguishment of his debts, shall be absolutely void.' In construing this section, it has been repeatedly held that any contract of suretyship entered into by a married woman, whether in behalf of her husband or any other person, is void, and at her instance will be so declared." Hawes v. Glover, 126 Ga. 305, 55 S. E. 62.

The Indiana statute (Burns 1901, § 6964; R. S. 1881, § 5119) was quoted and explained in Field v. Campbell, 164 Ind. 389, 72 N. E. 260, 108 Am. St. Rep. 301, as follows: "That section is as follows: 'A married woman shall not enter into any contract of suretyship, whether as indorser, guarantor, or in any other manner; and such contract, as to her, shall be void.' . . . It was intended to prevent the making of contracts in the nature of suretyship undertakings by married women in all cases. In Harbaugh v. Tanner (1904) 163 Ind. 574, it was said: 'One of the principal reasons for enacting the statute forbidding married women to enter into contracts of suretyship, and providing that such contracts were void, was to prevent them from squandering or encumbering their property as sureties for improvident husbands.'"

In Kentucky section 2127, Kentucky Statutes, provides in part as follows: "No part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to the payment or satisfaction of any liability, upon a contract made after marriage, to answer for the debt, default or misdoing of another, including her husband, unless such estate shall have been set apart for that purpose by deed of mortgage or other conveyance; but her estate shall be liable for her debts and responsibilities contracted or incurred before marriage, and for such contracted after marriage, except as in this act provided." Lucas v. Hagedorn, 158 Ky. 369, 164 S. W. 978. "In transactions of this kind the courts must look to the substance; and whatsoever the parties themselves may designate or name the undertaking of the wife, if in fact it be an attempted assumption by her of the debt of another, she must be held not liable unless she binds herself in the statutory mode. Any other course will speedily result in a nullification of the statute." Crumbaugh v. Postell, 49 S. W. 334, 20 Ky. L. R. 1366. But "although section 2127 of the statutes provides, in substance, that a married woman shall not be liable upon a contract in which she is merely the surety, this provision does not exempt her from liability if she receives the consideration for which the note was executed." Thomas v. Boston Banking Co. 157 Ky. 473, 163 S. W. 480.

In Louisiana the statutory provisions are as follows: "The wife cannot bind herself for her husband, nor conjointly with him, for debts contracted by him before or during the marriage." Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2398. "The wife cannot become security for her husband's debts. Id. art. 1790." See Maloney, Succession, 124 La. 672, 50 So. 647.

In New Hampshire it has been provided by statute as follows: "No contract or conveyance by a married woman, as surety or guarantor for her husband, nor any undertaking by her for him or in his behalf, shall be binding on her. P. S. c. 176, s. 2." Newport First Nat. Bank v. Hunton, 69 N. H. 509, 45 Atl. 351. The attempt on the part of a married woman to become a surety for her husband is not a waiver of her disability; but since she is not disabled to present the defense of disability, such defense is waived where it is not presented before judgment. Bergeron v. Dartmouth Sav. Bank, 63 N. H. 195.

The New Jersey rule was set forth in People's Nat. Bank v. Schepflin, 73 N. J. L. 29, 62 Atl. 333, as follows: "Section 5 of our revised Married Woman's Act of 1874, as amended in 1895 (Pamph. L. p. 821; Gen. Stat. p. 2017), declares that any married woman shall have the right to bind herself by contract in the same manner and to the same extent as though she were unmarried—'provided, that nothing herein shall enable such married woman to become an accommodation indorser, guarantor or surety, nor shall she be liable on any promise to pay the debt or answer for the default or liability of any other person; provided further, however, that if on the faith of any indorsement, contract of guaranty or suretyship, promise to pay the debt or answer for the default or liability of any other person, any married woman obtains, directly or indirectly, any money, property or other thing of value, for her own use, or for the use, benefit or advantage of her separate estate, she shall be liable thereon as though she were unmarried.'

. . . Since the notes were intended to be and were in fact indorsed by the husband, she was his surety if the money was in fact borrowed by him from the bank. . . . Contracts of suretyship and promises to pay the debt of another person are equally within the ban of the first proviso of section 5 of the married woman's act. . . . Moneys once received by the wife, although they be borrowed, become her property, which the statute permits her to give away or lend as she pleases. So she may pledge or mortgage her separate property to secure the debt of her husband or any third party. But the statute disables her from mortgaging her future to secure the debt of another, which is the effect of a contract of suretyship or the like." In Vliet v. Eastburn, 64 N. J. L. 627, 46 Atl. 735, 1061, the proviso imposing liability on a married woman where she obtains something of value was construed; and in that case the court said: "The provision of 1895 does not alter the general policy of the law which withholds from married women the power to make contracts of suretyship. . . . Although the contract of suretyship is still without force in itself as beyond the legal capacity of a married woman, yet if she does in fact make such a contract, and 'on the faith of it obtains anything of value,' she shall be liable as if sole. Thus construed, the reason of the statute is supported by many analogous instances when a contract not in itself valid becomes incontestable and a liability thereon arises, by reason of some act done by an innocent party in reliance upon it."

3. CONFLICT OF LAWS.

In general the validity of a contract where by a married woman becomes surety for the debt of her husband is determined by the law of the place where it is made. Benton v. German-American Nat. Bank, 45 Neb. 850, 64 N. W. 227; Union Nat. Bank v. Chapman, 7 App. Div. 450, 39 N. Y. S. 1051; Union Nat. Bank v. Chapman, 169 N. Y. 538, 62 N. E. 672, 88 Am. St. Rep. 614, 57 L.R.A. 513 (where the parties do not clearly intend that it shall be governed by the laws of another jurisdiction); Robinson v. Kline, 21 Pa. Dist. 839 (the contract is made where the note is delivered and the consideration paid); Peter

Adams Paper Co. v. Cassard, 206 Pa. St. 179, 55 Atl. 949; Wick v. Dawson, 42 W. Va. 43, 24 S. E. 587. Applying the lex loci contractus, the court in State Bank v. Maxson, 123 Mich. 250, 82 N. W. 31, 81 Am. St. Rep. 196, 6 Detroit Leg. N. 1034, said: "The contract was made in Kansas, and must be controlled by the law of that state. . . . Counsel, however, contend that, under section 17 of the married woman's act of Kansas, it must be held that the defendant is protected under the laws of this state. That section provides: 'Any woman who shall have been married out of this state shall, if her husband afterward becomes a resident of this state, enjoy all the rights as to property which she may have acquired by the laws of any other state, territory or country, or which she may have acquired by virtue of any marriage contract or settlement made out of this state.' 2 Gen. Stat. 1897, c. 123, § 17. Counsel's contention is that, under this statute, 'if a woman acquires property under the laws of this state, when it is assailed in the courts of this state she is entitled to the protection of the laws of this state, and that under the laws of this state it could not be taken for the husband's debt.' It is true that, under a contract made in this state, the wife's property cannot be taken for the husband's debt unless the wife expressly agrees in writing that it may be so taken; that is, unless the contract binds her separate property specifically. The Kansas statute above quoted gives the wife the right to the enjoyment of all her property, but, as held in Deering v. Boyle [8 Kan. 525], her property is subject to seizure and sale upon contract made by her, the same as the husband's property is liable."

But the effect of a contract as constituting a charge on real property is controlled by the law of the place where the property is situated. Frierson v. Williams, 57 Miss. 451; Johnston v. Gawtry, 11 Mo. App. 322; Wick v. Dawson, 42 W. Va. 43, 24 S. E. 587 (holding that a contract valid where made will be enforced if it does not contravene the law or policy of the forum). Compare Evans v. Beaver, 50 Ohio St. 190, 33 N. E. 643, 40 Am. St. Rep. 666. In Frierson v. Williams, supra, the court said: "It is next insisted that by the law of Louisiana the promissory note of the wife, made as surety for her husband, is void for want of the capacity of the wife to enter into such a contract, and that, being void by the lex loci contractus, it is void everywhere. This position is true, if the giving of the note has no other effect than what it purports to have on its face, viz., a personal obligation of the wife. But it is charged in the bill and admitted by the demurrer that at the time this note was made in Louisiana the wife had a separate estate in realty, situated in this state, and that she contracted with reference to this separate estate, and intended to charge it by the promissory note in controversy. Whether this purpose can be carried out with reference to realty here, notwithstanding the fact that the note is void by the law of Louisiana, is the question presented for our consideration. . . . The capacity of Mrs. Williams to take this property, and her rights and powers over it, are derived from and regulated by the law of this state. Her power of disposition and dealing with it are, by our laws, impressed on the property itself. As to none of these things has the law of Louisiana the slightest influence. . . . If the note had not been void by our laws, as the personal obligation of the wife, we should nevertheless, out of comity to a sister state, adjudge it void to that extent, if attempted to be enforced here; but the principle of comity does not require a state to regard the laws of any other state, so far as they may affect contracts in relation to real estate situated in the former state."

In a jurisdiction wherein a married woman cannot become surety for her husband, it has been held that in an action on such a contract made in another jurisdiction, the law of the place where the contract is made will be presumed to be the same as the law of the forum until the contrary is shown. Peter Adams Paper Co. v. Cassard, 206 Pa. St. 179, 55 Atl. 949.

It has been held that the enforcement of a valid contract of suretyship against a married woman is not contrary to the public policy of a state wherein such contract could not have been made. Wright v. Remington, 41 N. J. L. 48, 32 Am. Rep. 180. Compare Grosman v. Union Trust Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 613. In Wright v. Remington, supra, the court said: "That it would have been an act of legislative wisdom to have incorporated into the Illinois act a provision similar to that in our own and the New York state married woman's act, by which the married woman is restrained from assuming a liability as surety, I think the testimony in this case demonstrates. But whatever may be our opinion of the policy of legislation beyond our state, we are bound by the principles of comity to recognize its validity, unless it clearly contravenes the principles of public morality or attacks the interest of the body of the citizens of our state. This does neither, and there is no force in the objection taken upon this ground."

III. By Pledge or Mortgage of Property.

1. JURISDICTIONS IN WHICH RIGHT IS UPHOLD.

a. Rule Stated.

Inasmuch as a wife who mortgages her property to secure the payment of her husband's debt is generally regarded as a surety (see the notes to Hackfeld v. Medcalf, Ann. Cas. 1912D 105, and Browne v. Bixby, 5 Ann. Cas. 642), the right of a married woman to pledge or mortgage her property for her husband's debt is here considered without regard to the fact that in some jurisdictions the wife in such a case does not stand in the position of a surety. (See Philadelphia Sav. Fund Soc. v. Lasher, 144 Ill. App. 653; Hall v. Hall, 118 Ky. 656, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 553, 82 S. W. 269.)

In a majority of jurisdictions a married woman, subject to the statutory requirements as to the manner of so doing, may pledge or mortgage her property for the security of her husband's debts.

The Arkansas constitution (article 9, section 7 of the constitution of 1874) providing, in effect, that the property of a married woman shall not be subject to the debts of her husband, means that her property shall not be subject to the debts of her husband without some affirmative act on her part to make her liable; hence, the provision does not prevent a married woman from pledging or conveying her property to secure the debts of her husband. Holland v. Bond, 189 S. W. 165.

Applying the Connecticut statute, the court in Stafford Sav. Bank v. Underwood, 54 Conn. 2, said: "The only question is—Can a married woman mortgage her real estate to secure a debt of her husband? the plaintiff not seeking to hold the wife upon the note. This question depends largely upon the power given to a married woman by the statute of this state, which provides that 'all conveyances of the real estate of married women, executed by them jointly with their husbands and duly acknowledged and recorded, shall be valid and effectual to transfer such estate, and all conveyances by the husband alone of the real estate of the wife shall be ineffectual to convey her interest therein.' Gen. Statutes. p. 353, sec. 10. It is manifest that under this statute the only limitation upon the wife's power of alienation of her real estate is the consent of her husband. When that is evidenced by his joining her in the execution and acknowledgment of the deed, the power of the wife to transfer her estate is perfect and unrestricted. She may convey her estate absolutely and for any purpose she may desire: she may sell it for a valuable consideration, or she may give it in charity, or transfer it by the ordinary method of conveyance between husband and wife to her husband, either with or without a money consideration. The power of the wife to make an absolute conveyance under the statute cannot be doubted, and as the greater includes the less, it must follow as a logical deduction that she has power to make a conditional conveyance and may mortgage her estate to secure any valid debt, either of herself or her husband."

The rule in Illinois was explained in Edwards v. Schoeneman, 104 Ill. 278, as follows: "It is first urged that appellant, being a married woman, had no power to mortgage her property to pay her husband's debts. The solution of this question depends upon the law in force at the time the mortgages were executed. The first mortgage, having been executed and acknowledged in 1873, will be controlled by 'An act concerning conveyances,' in force July 1, 1872 (Laws of 1872, page 282), the 18th section of which declares: 'Any married woman, being above the age of eighteen years, joining with her husband in the execution of any deed, mortgage, conveyance, power of attorney, or other writing of or relating to the sale, conveyance, or other disposition of her lands or real estate, or any interest therein, shall be bound and concluded by the same in respect to her right, title, claim or interest in such estate, as if she were sole.' Section 19 provides that the acknowledgment may be the same as if she was sole. This act is in substance the same as an act approved March 27, 1869. (Laws of 1869, page 359.) Indeed, it is almost a literal copy of the Act of 1869. Under the last named act this court held, in a number of cases, that a married woman might, by joining with her husband in the execution of a deed or mortgage relating to the sale or disposition of her real estate, bind and conclude herself, the same as a feme sole. Hogan v. Hogan, 89 Ill. 427, is a case which may be regarded as conclusive on the question. We have placed the same construction on the Act of 1872, supra, that we did on the Act of 1869, as may be seen by an examination of Barnes v. Ehrman, 74 Ill. 402. Without, therefore, going back to inquire what the rights and powers of a married woman in regard to a sale or disposition of her real estate were at common law, or even under the statute of 1861, there can be no doubt in regard to the right of appellant to mortgage her lands, as she did in this instance, by joining with her husband in the execution of the mortgage, as provided by the Act of 1872. As respects the second mortgage, which was executed in 1877, the Act of 1872, cited above, was in force, having been incorporated in the revision of 1874, and in addition, sec. 9, chap. 68, Rev. Stat. 1874, page 577, which confer upon a married woman the power to sell and convey her lands in the same manner that her husband can property belonging to him. Under the Act of 1872 it was essential to the validity of a deed or mortgage that the husband should join with the wife when she attempted to convey her real property, but under the provision of section 9, which was incorporated in the revision of 1874, this obstacle was removed, and a married woman was placed upon a perfect equality with her husband, in so far as the conveyance of her lands was concerned."

The Kentucky statute (quoted in Hite v. Reynolds, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 619) expressly provides how a married woman may charge her estate for the debts of another, and unless the statutory method is followed she is not bound. Bowron v. Curd, 88 S. W. 1106, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 58. It has been held that an insurance policy could be set apart, within the meaning of the statute, by a written contract of pledge accompanied by the actual delivery of the policy. Wirgman v. Miller, 98 Ky. 620, 33 S. W. 937, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1174; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 56 S. W. 975, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 230. Prior to 1894 a married woman could not mortgage her separate estate to secure a debt of her husband. Paducah v. Duke, 2 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 229; Hughes v. Shannon, 13 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 782; Miller v. Cropper, 16 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 395; Hirschman v. Brashears, 79 Ky. 259; Magill v. Mercantile Trust Co. 81 Ky. 129; Merchants', etc. Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Jarvis, 92 Ky. 566, 18 S. W. 454, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 797; Morrison v. Morrison, 113 Ky. 507, 68 S. W. 467, 69 S. W. 1102, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 340.

Construing the Missouri statute the court in Schneider v. Stahr, 20 Mo. 269, said: "It cannot be maintained that the Act of the 5th March, 1849, exempting the property of married women from the debts of their husbands, was designed to prevent femes covert from disposing of their real property by a voluntary conveyance, for whatever purpose they thought proper. If married women, clothing their deeds with the solemnities required by law to make them effectual, will convey away their estates the law does not interpose to prevent them. Without their consent signified in the manner prescribed by law, their property cannot be taken by execution to satisfy their husbands' debts. But if they will voluntarily give it away, they cannot be prevented. The husband and wife may unite in a sale of the wife's land, and apply the money thus obtained in payment of the husband's debts. If this can be done, what is to prevent her from joining in a mortgage with her husband and thereby subject her land to the satisfaction of his liabilities?" However, in Bell v. Bell, 133 Mo. App. 570, 113 S. W. 667, it was held that a mortgage to secure the payment of a pre-existing debt of the husband was invalid for lack of a consideration.

The Nebraska rule was set forth as follows in Bode v. Jussen, 93 Neb. 482, 140 N. W. 768: "Can a mortgage by a married woman upon her separate property, given to secure the debt of her husband, be enforced? The law upon that point must be taken as settled in this state. Section 2, ch. 53, Comp. St. 1911, which is the same as it was the time the mortgage in suit was executed, provides: 'A married woman, while the marriage relation subsists, may bargain, sell, and convey her real and personal property, and enter into any contract with reference to the same in the same manner, to the same extent, and with like effect as a married man may in relation to his real and personal property.' This section of the statute was carefully considered by this court in Grand Island Banking Co. v. Wright, 53 Neb. 574. The authorities are there collated and carefully considered, and the conclusion reached that, where a wife executes a mortgage upon her own real estate to secure an indebtedness of her husband, the mortgage will be sustained; but, if the wife also signs the note, she cannot be held upon that for any deficiency after the sale of the premises, where it is not disclosed that in executing the note and mortgage it was the intention to bind her property generally."

In New Jersey, in Butterfield v. Okie, 36 N. J. Eq. 482, the court said: "There can be no doubt that a wife may make a valid mortgage to secure the debt of her husband, and such a mortgage will be upheld, even though it is made simply by way of gift to the husband, and to secure his bond founded on a mere moral consideration, but such an instrument, being purely voluntary so far as the wife is concerned, cannot be upheld against her creditors."

The clause in the Oregon constitution declaring "that the property and possessory rights of every married woman at the time of marriage, or afterward acquired by gift, devise or inheritance, shall not be subject to the debts or contracts of the husband" has been held merely to preserve the property of the wife from its compulsory subjection to the debts or contracts of the husband and not to affect her voluntary disposal of her property. Barrell v. Tilton, 119 U. S. 637, 7 S. Ct. 332, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 511.

In Pennsylvania the clause of the enabling Act of 1893 which provided "but she may not become accommodation indorser, maker, guarantor or surety for another" has been held to prohibit only the incurring of a liability which carries the risk of a general judgment, and not to affect the power of a married woman to pledge specific property as security for her husband. Herr v. Reinoehl, 209 Pa. St. 483, 58 Atl. 862.

The law of the Transvaal concerning the validity of a mortgage was set forth as follows in Africa Bank v. Cohen [1909] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 129, 78 L. J. Ch. 767, 100 L. T. N. S. 916, 25 Times L. Rep. 625: "Unless and until a married woman who does not fall within certain exceptions has gone through certain formalities she is under the Roman-Dutch law incapacitated and incapable of entering into a contract of suretyship for her husband. I may expand that statement of the law and state my own view as follows: A married woman's contract of suretyship for her husband cannot be described (in terms familiar in our own law) as being either void or voidable. It must be stated, I think, in the form that she has a contingent capacity to become bound by such a contract. Thus, if she holds a particular character, that of a trader, or if she receives a pecuniary benefit from the contract (a matter which may have to be ascertained ex post facto), or if after explicit explanation of the exact nature of her rights she formally renounces the Senatus Consultum Velleianum and the Authentica si qua mulier, she may be bound by such a contract. But unless and until some one of those conditions is satisfied the contingency upon which she becomes capable has not happened and she remains incapable of becoming bound by the contract."

2. JURISDICTIONS IN WHICH RIGHT IS DENIED.

a. Rule Stated.

In some jurisdictions a married woman may not pledge or mortgage her property as security for the payment of her husband's debts.

The Alabama statute was set forth as follows in Hanchey v. Powell, 171 Ala. 597, 55 So. 97: "Section 4497 of the Code of 1907 expressly provides that 'the wife shall not, directly or indirectly, become the surety for the husband.' It is needless to consider the technical definitions of the word 'surety,' as our court has repeatedly applied this statute to facts similar to the transaction in question, and has in effect held that if the wife gives a mortgage to secure a debt contracted by the husband, and not for her as her agent, and for which she was not originally liable in law or equity, as distinguished from a mere moral obligation growing out of the fact that she or her estate had been benefited by the money lent the husband, the said mortgage was invalid, and would be canceled at her instance. The test being whether or not she was originally liable in law or equity for the debt, and not whether or not she was benefited by same, if the mortgage is given to secure a debt for which the husband was alone liable, it fails within the prohibition of said section 4497."

In Georgia it has been said: "While the wife is given the right to contract as a feme sole, and to own property, yet she cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor by any assumption of the debts of her husband; and any sale of her separate estate made to a creditor of her husband in extinguishment of his debts shall be absolutely void. Civil Code, § 2488. It is also declared by statute that the property of the wife shall not be liable for the payment of any debt, default or contract of her husband. Civil Code, § 2474. It is not open to dispute that these code sections absolutely deny the liability of the wife on a note executed by her as surety for a principal who also signs the note. In this kind of a transaction, the wife attempts to bind her separate estate by indirection. By signing the note as surety she assumes a liability which, but for the statute, could be reduced to judgment, and its payment enforced against her separate estate by execution. If the wife cannot bind her separate estate generally by entering into a contract of suretyship, surely she cannot bind a specific portion of her separate property by hypothecating it to pay another's debt. The case of Klink v. Boland, 72 Ga. 485, holds that one cannot take property belonging to the wife as security for a credit sale made to the husband. If the debt is the husband's the wife cannot assume its payment, either by promising to pay the debt as a surety, or by pledging her property to pay it. It is not the form of suretyship, nor whether the liability as surety is general, or only limited to the value of the pledged separate estate, which the law condemns. The spirit and purpose of the statute is to prevent the appropriation of the wife's property to the payment of a secondary or collateral liability." Gross v. Whitely, 128 Ga. 79, 57 S. E. 94. The Code of 1863 excepted from its prohibition estates controlled by a marriage settlement. Brodnax v. Atna Ins. Co. 128 U. S. 236, 9 S. Ct. 61, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 445.

Applying the Indiana statute, the court in Cupp v. Campbell, 103 Ind. 213, 2 N. E. 565, said: "This section (§ 5119, R. S. 1881) prohibits a married woman from entering into a contract of suretyship, in any manner whatever, and declares all such contracts void as to her. That a mortgage executed by a wife upon her separate property, to secure the debt of her husband, is a contract of suretyship, and that such contracts are invalid, is not the settled law of this state." In Frazer v. Clifford, 94 Ind. 482, the court sketched the history of the Indiana legislation on this subject, saying: "When the note and mortgage in suit were executed, 'An act concerning married women,' approved March 25th, 1879, which took effect on the 31st day of May, 1879, was in force as a law of this state. In section 10 of this act it was provided as follows: 'A married woman shall not mortgage or in any manner encumber her separate property acquired by descent, devise or gift, as a security for the debt or liability of her husband or any other person.' Acts 1879, p. 161. This section remained in force at least until the 19th day of September, 1881, when it was, perhaps, superseded or repealed by implication by the broader and more comprehensive provisions of section 4 of the Act of April 16th, 1881, concerning husband and wife. Section 18 of this latter act provides that 'all laws and parts of laws within the purview of this act, or (and) inconsistent therewith, are hereby repealed.' Acts 1881, p. 531. In section 4 of this latter act (§ 5119, R. S. 1881) it is provided as follows: 'A married woman shall not enter into any contract of suretyship, whether as indorser, guarantor, or in any other manner; and such contract, as to her, shall be void.' Prior to the taking effect of the Act of March 25th, 1879, concerning married women, on the 31st day of May, 1879, the law of this state, in relation to the right and power of a married woman to encumber her own separate real property, was contained in section 5 of 'An act touching the marriage relation and liabilities incident thereto,' approved May 31st, 1852. This section 5 provided as follows: 'No lands of any married woman shall be liable for the debts of her husband; but such lands and the profits therefrom shall be her separate property, as fully as if she was unmarried: Provided, That such wife shall have no power to encumber or convey such lands, except by deed, in which her husband shall join.' 1 R. S. 1876, p. 550. Under and by virtue of the power conferred upon a married woman by this section of the statute, it was repeatedly held by this court that she and her husband might execute a valid mortgage on her separate lands to secure the debt of her husband."

In Louisiana a married woman cannot bind herself or her property for the debt of her husband. See Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2398; Keating v. Wilbert, 119 La. 461, 44 So. 265. "It is well settled in our jurisprudence that the courts will look through all disguises and protect the wife in her property." Byerley v. Walker, 118 La. 265, 42 So. 931. But by early statutes, exceptions were made to the general rule and particular banks were authorized to accept a pledge by a married woman as security for the debt of her husband. Louisiana Bank v. Farrar, 1 La. Ann. 94; Farrar v. New Orleans Gaslight, etc. Co. 2 La. Ann. 873. See also Mechanics, etc. Bank v. Rowly, 2 La. Ann. 372.

In New Hampshire it has been said: "'No contract or conveyance by a married woman as surety or guarantor for her husband, nor any undertaking by her for him or in his behalf, shall be binding on her.'" Laws 1876, c. 32. This chapter is entitled 'An act to remove the disabilities of married women;' but, so far as it applies to this case, it is a disabling act, imposing a new protective incapacity. At common law, a married woman could charge her separate estate with the payment of her husband's debts. Babbitt v. Morrison, 58 N. H. 419; Thompson v. Fla., 58 N. H. 490. By this statute no 'conveyance by a married woman as surety or guarantor for her husband' is binding on her. The plaintiff's conveyance of her land as security for her husband's debt was a conveyance by her as surety for him, within the meaning of the statute." Buss v. Woodward, 60 N. H. 58. For cases decided under the law prior to the statute of 1876, see Thompson v. Fla., 58 N. H. 490; Pittsfield Sav. Bank v. Berry, 63 N. H. 109.

In South Carolina under the statute of 1870 and until 1882 a married woman could mortgage her property to secure the debt of her husband. And under the statute of 1887 the question was one of intention; where the mortgage contained an express intention to charge the separate estate the court was obliged to hold the mortgage to be valid. But by the Act of 1891 the question was made one of power, and if the mortgage was executed as security for the husband's debt it was one which the married woman had no power to make. Chambers v. Bookman, 32 S. C. 455, 11 S. E. 349; Connor v. Edwards, 36 S. C. 563, 15 S. E. 706 (citing Pelzer v. Campbell, 15 S. C. 581, 40 Am. Rep. 705); Scottish, etc. Mortg. Co. v. Mixson, 38 S. C. 432, 17 S. E. 244; Reid v. Stevens, 38 S. C. 519, 17 S. E. 358; Dunbar v. Foreman, 40 S. C. 490, 19 S. E. 186; Hester v. Barker, 42 S. C. 128, 20 S. E. 52.

In Texas under earlier statutes a married woman apparently could mortgage her separate property for the security of her husband's debts. Beattie v. Keller, 49 S. W. 408. But see the construction placed on the Act of March 21, 1913, by the federal court in Grosman v. Union Trust Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at p. 613.

3. CONFLICT OF LAWS.

It has been generally held, in regard to the validity of a mortgage by a married woman on her real property to secure her husband's debt, that the lex rei sitae governs. Africa Bank v. Cohen [1909] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 129, 78 L. J. Ch. 767, 100 L. T. N. S. 916, 25 Times L. R. 625; Thomson v. Kyle, 39 Fla. 582, 23 So. 12, 63 Am. St. Rep. 193; Post v. Springfield First Nat. Bank, 138 Ill. 559, 28 N. E. 978; Swank v. Hufnagle, 111 Ind. 453, 12 N. E. 303, 13 N. E. 105. See also Burr v. Tobey, 182 Ill. App. 228. Thus in Thomson v. Kyle, supra, the court said: "It is not denied by appellants that had the mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this case been executed in this state, it would have been valid and enforceable under our laws. . . . It is insisted, however, that under the laws of Alabama a married woman is without capacity to bind herself or her property as security for the debt of her husband, and as the mortgage sought to be enforced in this case was executed, and the debt secured thereby was payable in that state, and all the parties were there domiciled, that those laws necessarily entered into and became a part of the contract rendering it void in that state; and that, being void in Alabama, it is by virtue of interstate law, void in Florida. It may be admitted that this argument has strong application to the note executed by Mrs. Thomson with her husband, which the mortgage was given to secure, for the note being a general personal obligation, if void by the laws of the state in which it was extended and made payable, it ought likewise to be void in every other state where it is sought to be enforced. But it does not follow that because Mrs. Thomson is not bound by the note it is for that reason totally void. It still remains a valid obligation of her husband which she can in this state secure by a mortgage of her separate statutory property. Dzialynski v. Jacksonville Bank, 23 Fla. 346, 2 So. 696. We do not understand that any principle of interstate law requires us to test the validity or sufficiency of conveyances of, or liens upon, real estate in this state by the laws of other states or nations, even though such contracts may have been executed, or given to secure the performance of some act, within their jurisdiction. The reasons why we should not are obvious. The subject-matter with reference to the title of which the conveyance or lien is executed, being at the time of such execution an immovable thing, not only located beyond the control of that sovereignty within whose jurisdiction the contract is executed, and forever so to remain, but then within the exclusive jurisdiction of another independent sovereignty, and forever so to remain, the parties to such conveyance are presumed to have contracted, at least so far as the immovable thing is concerned, with reference to the laws of that jurisdiction within whose borders the thing is situated. And no sovereign state, without express legislative sanction, is presumed to surrender to owners of immovable property within its limits the power to encumber or change the title thereto in any other manner than that pointed out by its laws. It is, therefore, almost universally held that so far as real estate or immovable property is concerned, we must look to the laws of the state where it is situated for the rules which govern its descent, alienation and transfer, and for the construction, validity and effect of conveyances thereof. U. S. v. Crosby, 7 Cranch 115 [3 U. S. (L. ed.) 287]; McGoon v. Scales, 9 Wall. 23 [19 U. S. (L. ed.) 545]; Brine v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627 [24 U. S. (L. ed.) 858]; Gault v. Van Zile, 37 Mich. 22; Bissell v. Terry, 69 Ill. 184; West v. Fitz, 109 Ill. 425; Fessenden v. Taft, 65 N. H. 39, 17 Atl. 713; Curtis v. Hutton, 14 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 537; Frierson v. Williams, 57 Miss. 451; Crolly v. Clark, 20 Fla. 849; Frazier v. Boggs, 37 Fla. 307, 20 So. 245; and it is to the same law that we must look for the rules governing the capacity of the parties to such contracts or conveyances, and their rights under the same. Doyle v. McGuire, 38 Ia. 410; Baum v. Birchall, 150 Pa. St. 164, 24 Atl. 620; Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 627, 31 Am. Dec. 264; Larendon's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 952, 3 So. 219; Cassidy's Succession, 40 La. Ann. 827, 5 So. 292; 2 Parsons on Contracts, 572; Story on Conflict of Laws, sec. 431; Rorer on Interstate Law, p. 263. It would seem, therefore, that upon principle the mortgage in this case should be subjected to the laws of this state, in order to ascertain its validity, construction and the capacity of the parties to execute it, rather than to the laws of the state of Alabama, within whose borders the real estate is not situated, and as to which her laws can have no extra-territorial effect. . . . We hold that, notwithstanding Mrs. Thomson's incapacity by the laws of Alabama to execute the mortgage sought to be foreclosed here, she was capable under our laws of executing in Alabama a mortgage upon her separate statutory real property in this state to secure her husband's debt." And in Africa Bank v. Cohen [1909] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 129, 78 L. J. Ch. 767, 100 L. T. N. S. 916, 25 Times L. Rep. 625, it was said: "Where, as we find to be the case here, the lex situs declares an instrument of suretyship intended to operate upon real estate to be void because of an incapacity of one of the parties, except upon certain conditions which have not been fulfilled, to bind herself by such an instrument, it is the duty of this forum to respect the lex situs and to treat the instrument as of no validity against that party. In such a case, where our court recognizes an incapacity to contract so as to bind herself on the part of the person sued, it plainly cannot at the same time make a decree as the plaintiffs here ask, either for specific performance of the engagement by which she was incapable of binding herself, or, as the plaintiffs alternatively ask, award damages for its nonperformance. There have been no doubt cases where our courts have by their judgment indirectly affected real property out of the jurisdiction, where the parties to the action have been within the jurisdiction, as the parties to this action are. Acting in personam and not in rem—"upon the conscience," in the language of one of these judgments, 'of the person living here,' Lord Cranstown v. Johnston, 3 Ves. Jr. 170, 182—the court has given effect to contractual or equitable rights and so indirectly affected, as I have said, immovable property abroad. Several of these cases, such, for example, as Ex p. Pollard, Mont. & C. 239, were cited to us in argument, and most, if not all of them, are referred to and classified in Mr. Foote's work, pp. 186, 192. But in none of those cases have our courts given effect to a contractual or equitable right in personam which the lex rei sitae would treat as incapable of creation. No case has been cited to us, and, upon principle, I should be surprised if any could be found, in which this jurisdiction in personam has been assumed where according to the lex situs, the party sued was incapable of making the contract sued upon, and where therefore the court of the country in which the property indirectly to be affected lay would treat the English decree, in the language of Lord Campbell in Norris v. Chambers, 3 DeG. F. & J. 583, as 'brutum fulmen.'"

In Swank v. Hufnagle, 111 Ind. 453, 12 N. E. 303, 13 N. E. 105, the court said: "In the argument on the petition for a rehearing, counsel contend that we were in error in holding that a mortgage executed by a married woman in Ohio as surety for her husband cannot be enforced in this state, and they refer us to cases holding that the construction of a contract is governed by the law of the place where it is made. But the argument is unavailing, for counsel mistake the point in dispute. The question is not how the contract shall be construed, but had the married woman capacity to execute it? The question is one of capacity, not of construction. The trial court was not asked to construe a mortgage, but to enforce one which our statute declares shall not be enforceable. The purpose of the suit is not to obtain a judicial interpretation of a contract, but to foreclose a mortgage which our law declares a married woman has no capacity to execute. We suppose it quite clear that if the mortgagor has no capacity to execute a deed or mortgage, the instrument cannot be enforced, although the incapacity is established by the law of the place where the land is situated."

But in Evans v. Beaver, 50 Ohio St. 190, 33 N. E. 643, 40 Am. St. Rep. 666, wherein it appeared that the land on which the mortgage was given was situated in Ohio, but that the parties resided and the payment was to be made in Indiana, in which state a married woman was incapable of making a contract of suretyship in any form, it was held that the mortgage was void in Ohio as well as in Indiana, although by the laws of Ohio the mortgage would have been valid.

It has been held that the lex loci contractus governs the assignment of an insurance policy by a married woman as security for her husband. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Woods, 11 Ind. App. 335, 37 N. E. 180, 39 N. E. 205, wherein the court said: "It is . . . contended . . . that . . . the assignment must be held sufficient 'upon the theory that the policy being an Ohio contract, and the assignment being a mere incident to the policy, both the policy and assignment are to be construed according to the laws of Ohio; and, further, that the assignment is a chattel mortgage of the insurance money, the situs of which is in Cincinnati, Ohio, and that the assignment is therefore to be construed by the laws of Ohio, and that by the laws of that state the assignment is valid.' It is true that the policy itself is an Ohio contract and governed by the laws of that state, but this rule has no application to the contract of assignment which, though made by indorsement on the policy, is yet a separate and distinct contract from that of the policy.

. . . We need not decide what would be the proper rule if the transaction is question were a mortgage. It is not a mortgage, and the words quoted above do not stamp it with that character. In the written transfer itself, it is denominated an 'assignment' four times, and what it undertakes to do is to 'assign, set over, and transfer' the policy. The appellee and her husband owned a chose in action, represented by the policy. This chose in action was for money to become due in Ohio. We apprehend that if a person residing in Indiana, who holds a note or claim against a citizen or corporation in Ohio, and attempts, by indorsement, to 'assign, set over and transfer' such note or claim 'and all sums of money that may become due by virtue thereof,' it would hardly be claimed that this was a mortgage on the money to become due in Ohio, and that although the transfer of the note might be void so as to retain the legal title of the same in the assignor, yet that an interest in the money in Ohio would be conveyed to the assignee. We regard the position of appellant's counsel (that the attempted transfer of the policy, though void as an assignment, is still valid as a chattel mortgage) as utterly untenable. It is the policy that constitutes the chose in action attempted to be transferred, and the situs of the policy is the domicile of the owner, and by the laws of the place where the transfer was made or attempted to be made, the contract must be controlled."

GROSMAN ET AL.

v.

UNION TRUST COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit—January 4, 1916.

228 Fed. 610.

Conflict of Laws — Enforcing Foreign Contract — Public Policy of Forum.

A contract, though valid under the law of the place where it was made, will not be enforced in a jurisdiction where to so enforce it would involve a disregard of the established public policy of that jurisdiction.

[See 5 R. C. L. tit. Conflict of Laws, p. 911.]

Husband and Wife — Contracts by Wife — Suretyship for Husband.

Rev. St. Tex. 1911, art. 4621, as amended by Act March 21, 1913 (Acts 33d Leg. c. 32), provides that neither the separate property of the wife, nor the rents from her real estate, nor the interest on bonds and notes belonging to her, nor her personal earnings, shall be subject to the payment of debts contracted by the husband. Article 4624, as amended by the same act, after providing that the separate property of the husband and certain community property shall not be subject to the payment of debts contracted by the wife, except for necessities, contains a proviso that the wife shall never be the joint maker of a note, or a surety on any bond or obligation of another, without the joinder of her husband with her in making such contract. It is held that a contract made by the wife alone, by which she undertakes to become a surety on a bond or obligation on which her husband is a principal is forbidden by the statute, as the word "another" cannot reasonably be given such a meaning as would prevent the husband from being regarded as "another" than his wife, and the wife may not become a surety on bonds and obligations in which the husband cannot join.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Act Tex. March 21, 1913 (Acts 33d Leg. c. 32), amending Rev. St. 1911, arts. 4621, 4622, 4624, governing a married woman's liability on contracts, evidences the establishment, or the continuance, with the modifications thereby made, of a well-defined public policy of preventing the diminution of the estates of married women by unauthorized transfers or conveyances, or by subjecting them to the payment of forbidden obligations; and a contract made in Illinois by a married woman residing in Texas, whereby she became a surety for her husband, being contrary to this public policy, cannot be enforced in the courts of Texas, or in courts administering the laws of Texas.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from United States District Court, Northern District of Texas: MECK, Judge.

Action by Union Trust Company, plaintiff, against Minnie Kahn Grosman et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

F. M. Etheridge, Joseph M. McCormick and H. L. Bromberg for appellants.
Wm. H. Atwell for appellee.

Sitting: PARDEE and WALKER, Circuit Judges, and SPEER, District Judge.

[611] WALKER, J.—On May 23, 1914, the appellant Mrs. Minnie Kahn Grosman, who has been a resident of Texas since her birth, while on a visit to Chicago, accompanied by her husband, Hiram Grosman, also a resident citizen of Texas, executed a guaranty or suretyship contract, signed by her alone, by the terms of which she made herself a surety for a debt of her husband's firm, Hiram Grosman & Co., evidenced by its note, signed in the firm name by her husband. Some months after Mrs. Grosman's return to her home in Texas, and after the maturity of the obligation of Hiram Grosman & Co. which was referred to in the suretyship contract, this suit was brought against her, against her husband's firm, and against the individuals composing it. The objects of the suit were a recovery against the defendants other than Mrs. Grosman on the obligation for which she signed as surety or guarantor, and also on other obligations, the foreclosure of an asserted lien on personal property by which those obligations were secured, and a recovery against Mrs. Grosman on her contract above mentioned. At the time of the institution of the suit a writ of attachment was issued, which was levied on real estate in the city of Dallas which belonged to Mrs. Gros-man and was her separate property. Mrs. Grosman duly pleaded her coverture and raised the [612] question of the right of the plaintiff to have enforced by the court in which the suit was brought the liability which was asserted against her. By the decree appealed from the court adjudged in favor of the plaintiff and against Mrs. Grosman the amount called for by her guaranty or suretyship contract, less a credit allowed on account of the application upon the demand of the plaintiff of the proceeds of the sale of personal property upon which a lien in its favor was decreed, and for the amount decreed against Mrs. Grosman ordered the foreclosure of the lien of the writ of attachment levied on her separate property and the sale of that property.

Evidence was adduced to the effect that under the law of Illinois, the state in which Mrs. Grosman signed the instrument sought to be enforced against her, her act had the effect of creating a valid and enforceable contract. It is contended in behalf of Mrs. Grosman that, notwithstanding the validity of the contract where it was made, the decree appealed from was unwarranted, because the effect of it was to contravene a public policy of Texas, established by express legislative enactment. The doctrine which this contention invokes is a well-settled one. A statement and application of it are found in the opinion in the case of The Kensington, 183 U. S. 263, 22 S. Ct. 102, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 190. That case involved the question of the enforceability in the courts of the United States of a provision of a contract of a carrier made in Belgium; the provision being valid there, and the contract expressly providing that "all questions arising hereunder are to be settled according to the Belgium law, with reference to which this contract is made." It was insisted that the law of Belgium should be applied, though the provision in question contravened a public policy applied by the courts of the United States. With reference to this position the court said:

"The contention amounts to this: Where a contract is made in a foreign country, to be executed at least in part in the United States, the law of the foreign country, either by its own force or in virtue of the agreement of the contracting parties, must be enforced by the courts of the United States, even although to do so requires the violation of the public policy of the United States. To state the proposition is, we think, to answer it. It is true, as a general rule, that the lex loci governs, and it is also true that the intention of the parties to a contract will be sought out and enforced. But both these elementary principles are subordinate to and qualified by the doctrine that neither by comity nor by the will of contracting parties can the public policy of a country be set at naught." The Kensington, 183 U. S. 269, 22 S. Ct. 104, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 190.

The result was that the court, concluding that the provision in question was one which contravened a rule of public policy applied in the forum in which the provision came into question, decided that it was not there enforceable. In a much earlier case in the same court the ruling was to the effect that the enforcement of a contract, no matter where made or where to be executed, if that contract is in violation of the law or contravenes the public policy of the government in a forum of which its enforcement is sought, cannot be compelled in that forum. Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. 38, 52, 14 U. S. (L. ed.) 316. For other statements and applications of the same rule, see Emery v. Burbank, 163 Mass. 326, 39 N. E. 1026, 47 Am. St. Rep. 456, 28 L.R.A. 57, 5 [613] Ruling Case Law, 944, and notes. In an action to enforce any kind of liability, the law of the forum is material in so far as it sets a limit of policy beyond which such obligations as the one asserted will not be enforced there. Cuba R. Co. v. Crosby, 222 U. S. 473, 478, 32 S. Ct. 132, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 274, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 40. We do not understand that there is a controversy in this case as to the proposition that a court charged with the administration of the laws of Texas is not required to enforce a contract made in another jurisdiction, and valid there, when to do so involves a disregard of an established public policy of Texas. But it is contended by the counsel for the appellee that the statute law of Texas, which is invoked by the counsel for the appellant, does not evidence the existence of a public policy of that state which would be contravened by the enforcement of the contract in question by a court which administers the laws of that state.

This brings us to a consideration of the statute laws of Texas, to which our attention is directed. Before the taking effect of an act of the Legislature of Texas which was approved March 21, 1913 (Acts 33d Leg. c 32), article 4621 of the Revised Statutes of Texas of 1911 defined the separate property of the husband and of the wife; article 4622 defined the community property of the husband and wife; and article 4624 specified what contracts could be made by the wife. Under the law as it existed while the three articles mentioned were in force, a married woman could only bind herself by a contract entered into for necessities of herself or children or for the benefit of her separate estate. Cruger v. McCracken, 87 Tex. 584, 30 S. W. 537; Noel v. Clark, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 136, 60 S. W. 356; Stroter v. Brackenridge, 102 Tex. 386, 118 S. W. 634. In immediate connection with the provisions above mentioned is found the following, being article 4625 of the same compilation:

"Judgment and Execution in Such Cases.— Upon the trial of any suit as provided for in the preceding article, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court and jury that the debts so contracted or expenses so incurred were for the purposes enumerated in said article, and also that the debts so contracted or expenses so incurred were reasonable and proper, the court shall decree that execution may be levied upon either the common property or the separate property of the wife, at the discretion of the plaintiff."

The act of March 21, 1913, amended articles 4621, 4622, and 4624. It did not mention article 4625. That article remains in force to some extent, at least, unless it has been deprived of all operative effect as a result of the incompatibility of any of its provisions with those of the later enactment of March 21, 1913. Article 4621, as it was amended by that act, defines the separate properties of the husband and of the wife, provides, subject to qualifications in the case of the wife, for each having the sole management, disposition, and control of his or her separate property, specifies how named separate property of the wife may be conveyed or transferred, and contains the provision that:

"Neither the separate property of the wife, nor the rents from the wife's real estate, nor the interest on bonds and notes belonging to her, nor her personal earnings shall be subject to the payment of debts contracted by the husband."

[614] Article 4622, as amended, specifies what shall be deemed the common property of the husband and wife—commonly called the community property—and designates the part of it which shall be under the control, management, and disposition of the wife alone, "subject to the provisions of article 4621, as hereinabove written." Article 4624, as amended, reads as follows:

"Neither the separate property of the husband nor the community property other than the personal earnings of the wife, and the income, rents and revenues from her separate property shall be subject to the payments of debts contracted by the wife, except those contracted for necessities furnished her or her children: Provided, the wife shall never be the joint maker of a note or a surety on any bond or obligation of another without the joinder of her husband with her in making such contract."

Whatever enlargement of a married woman's right to bind herself by contract can be regarded as having been effected by the act above referred to is subject to the qualification or exception stated in the proviso found in amended article 4624, which has just been quoted. So far as that proviso affects the right of a married woman to become a surety, its explicit prohibition is that:

"The wife shall never be . . . a surety on any bond or obligation of another without the joinder of her husband with her in making such contract."

We think the language of this provision forbids a married woman becoming surety for another, unless her husband joins her in the suretyship contract. The word "another," used as it is in that proviso in describing any bond or obligation of any one besides the wife, cannot reasonably be given such a meaning as would prevent the husband being regarded as another than his wife within the purpose of the proviso. Giving to the proviso the meaning its words express, for the bond or obligation of another to be one as to which a married woman may become a surety, it must be one with reference to which her husband may join her in a contract of suretyship. This excludes a bond or obligation upon which the husband is a principal, as he cannot be his own surety. The result is that the wife is forbidden to become a surety when, from the nature of the case, her husband cannot join her as a cosurety. At any rate, the husband, in becoming a principal on a bond or obligation, cannot well be regarded as joining his wife in the separate contract by which she undertakes to bind herself as a surety. The two obligations are separate and distinct in their natures and consequences, though one of them is collateral to the other.

Whatever doubts as to the correctness of these conclusions might exist, if the proviso in question stood by itself, we think are removed when it is considered in connection with the above-quoted provision of article 4621 as amended. The embodying of the two provisions in the same statute we think clearly manifests a legislative purpose to forbid a married woman becoming a surety for an obligation on which her husband is a principal. It cannot be supposed that it was in the legislative contemplation that the quoted provision of amended article 4621, prohibiting the subjecting to the payment of debts contracted by the husband of the wife's separate property and specified parts of the [615] community property, was to be effective only in the case of the wife failing to become a surety for her husband's debts. If it was so supposed, the will of the Legislature would not control, unless it happened to coincide with that of the wife. The conclusion is that a contract made by the wife alone, by which she undertakes to become a surety on a bond or obligation on which her husband is a principal, is one which a married woman is forbidden by the statute law of Texas to make, and the enforcement of which against her separate property or against specified parts of the common property of herself and husband is prohibited by the same law.

When the act of March 21, 1913, is considered in connection with the previously existing statute law which it amended, we think it clearly discloses a legislative purpose to enlarge the capacity of the married women of Texas to bind themselves by contract and to extend their powers over property, both their separate property and specified parts of the community property; but we think, also, that with equal clearness it manifests a purpose to provide, for the protection of the property interests of Texas married women, safeguards which are put beyond their power to remove or dispense with. The act evidences the establishment, or rather the continuance with modifications it makes, of a well-defined public policy of preventing the diminution of the estates of the married women of Texas by unauthorized transfers or conveyances, or by subjecting them to the payment of forbidden obligations. A notable feature of that policy is disclosed by the prohibition found in the provision of article 4621, as it was amended, that:

"Neither the separate property of the wife, nor the rents from the wife's separate real estate, nor the interest on bonds and notes belonging to her, nor dividends on stocks owned by her, nor her personal earnings shall be subject to the payment of debts contracted by the husband."

An effect of this provision is to forbid courts which administer the laws of Texas to afford a remedy for the enforcement against the mentioned property interests of the wife of debts contracted by the husband. The denial of such a remedy is general in its terms. It is not confined to Texas contracts of the kind mentioned, but is broad enough in its terms to apply to such contracts wherever made, though they may be valid and enforceable where they were made. It well may happen that an attempt to enforce an obligation, recognized as valid where it was entered into, will fail where the remedy sought is one which is forbidden by the law of the forum. Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 1 S. Ct. 102, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 104; and see notes to Union Nat. Bank v. Chapman, 57 L.R.A. 513, 522, and to International Harvester Co. v. McAdam, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 774. Certainly it would be overtaxing the comity, which reasonably may be expected to influence the forum resorted to, to call for the enforcement by it of such a remedy, when the obvious purpose of the law of the forum in forbidding the remedy is to prevent the setting at naught of a public policy established by the same law.

The conclusions are that it is a part of the public policy of Texas, established by statute, to prevent the separate property of its married women being subjected to the payment of such a demand as the one [616] asserted against Mrs. Grosman in this case, and that the decree appealed from is erroneous, in that it subjected her separate property to the payment of that demand.

It follows that the decree against Mrs. Grosman should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Rehearing denied February 1, 1916.

NOTE.

As a result of the construction placed on the Texas statutes in the reported case, the court holds that a contract by a married woman as surety for her husband is against the public policy of the state of Texas, and therefore that such a contract, although valid under the law of the place where it is made, is not enforceable under the Texas law.

A discussion of the right of a married woman to become surety for her husband, and a particular reference to the question of the conflict of laws on that point, will be found in the note to First Nat. Bank v. Bertoli, reported ante, this volume, at page 590.

SHARPE

v.

DENMARK ET AL.

Georgia Supreme Court—February 11, 1915.

143 Ga. 156; 84 S. E. 554.

Husband and Wife — Contracts of Wife — Suretyship for Husband.

Where certain sureties on the bond of a tax collector borrowed money from a bank and loaned it to the wife of the tax collector, who paid it to the county in settlement of a shortage due the county by the collector, and the wife executed a mortgage to the sureties on her land to secure the payment of the money thus loaned, such a transaction would come within the provisions of the statute, which declares that a wife cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor by any assumption of the debts of her husband, and that any sale of her separate estate, made to a creditor of her husband in extinguishment of his debts, shall be absolutely void.

(a) In such a case the sureties on the husband's bond are his creditors within contemplation of law.

(b) It follows that a mortgage executed and delivered by the wife, on land belonging to her individually, to the sureties on her husband's bond, as set out in the first head-note, is absolutely void, and, on foreclosure proceedings in behalf of the sureties, the wife can defend on such ground and defeat the proceedings.

New Trial Improperly Denied.

The court erred in refusing a new trial.

Error to Superior Court, Toombs county: RAWLINGS, Judge.

Action by Remer L. Denmark, administrator, et al., plaintiffs, against Sallie C. Sharpe, defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

C. W. Sparks and Hines & Jordan for plaintiff in error.

Hitch & Denmark and Enoch J. Giles for defendants in error.

[157] HILL, J.—Remer L. Denmark as administrator on the estate of James H. Odom, Joseph H. Odom, and A. G. Williamson were plaintiffs in a case seeking the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Sallie C. Sharpe for the purpose of securing her promissory note for $4,425.26, payable to the order of James H. Odom, Joseph H. Odom, and A. G. Williamson. The defendant admitted the execution of the note and mortgage, and defended on the ground that they had been fully paid by a conveyance of certain land to one of the plaintiffs, James H. Odom, by Miss Sallie Odom, her aunt. The suit was further defended on the ground that the note and mortgage were given to pay the debt of her husband, who was tax-collector of Toombs county, and who, according to an audit of his books, had been found to be short in his accounts and indebted to the county in a certain sum. The plaintiffs were sureties on his bond as tax-collector; and the consideration of the mortgage was alleged to be for money borrowed of one of the plaintiffs for the purpose of paying the amount claimed to be due by the tax-collector and his sureties on the bond. On the trial of the issue thus raised by the pleadings, and after evidence and charge of the court, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs. The defendant, being dissatisfied with the verdict, made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and she excepted.

The motion for a new trial complains of the charge of the court, and of failure to charge, and that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. The plaintiffs contend, that Mrs. Sharpe voluntarily borrowed the money from James H. Odom, Joseph H. Odom, and A. G. Williamson, for the purpose of paying it to Toombs [158] County for a shortage of her husband due to the county as tax-collector; that she herself received the money from the plaintiffs and paid it over to the ordinary of Toombs county; that the lenders were not the creditors of her husband to be paid with the money borrowed, and were not parties to any scheme or arrangement between the husband and wife to borrow the money for such purpose. On the other hand, it is insisted that the sureties were creditors of the husband, and that the mortgage was given to the creditors for money with which to pay the husband's debt, and is void because it is in violation of the statute which provides that "while the wife may contract, she cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor by the assumption of the debts of her husband, and any sale of her separate estate, made to a creditor of her husband, in extinguishment of his debts, shall be absolutely void." Civil Code, § 3007. Are the sureties here creditors of the husband?

"One who has entered into contract with a party as indorser, guarantor, or surety," is a creditor. 11 Cyc. 1195, and cases cited. Banks v. McCandless, 119 Ga. 793, 47 S. E. 332; Tifton Nat. Bank v. Smith, 142 Ga. 663, 83 S. E. 526, L.R.A.1915B 1116, was an action by the bank against Mrs. Smith to recover the amount due on a note signed by her, payable to the order of the James Manufacturing Company, and indorsed by that company and W. E. James. The defendant pleaded, that the note was given to the company without consideration, and was made by her solely as an accommodation to W. E. James and the company, in order that the latter might secure the indorsement of E. A. Buck on notes given to the Commercial National Bank and the American National Bank of Macon; that she was a married woman, and E. A. Buck had full notice of that fact and of all the circumstances attending the execution of the note and the purposes for which it was made; that in substance her contract was one of suretyship, and being a married woman she was not liable thereon, by reason of the statute forbidding a married woman to bind her separate estate by a contract of suretyship. The jury found for Mrs. Smith. It was held: "One who contracts with the payee of an accommodation note, executed by a married woman, that on the faith of its security he will indorse a note for the payee for discount at a bank, and receives her note with full knowledge of all the facts, enters into an arrangement to make [159] the married woman ultimately liable to pay the debt of another; and such a contract will fall within the law's condemnation of contracts of suretyship by a married woman." We think the instant case comes within the principle decided in the Smith case. The sureties are creditors of the husband; and when the wife's separate estate is mortgaged to secure those creditors, who have borrowed the money from a bank to lend the defendant's wife for the purpose of paying the deficit in her husband's account as tax-collector, and the creditors take the wife's mortgage on her land, given to secure the note of the creditors, with a full knowledge of all the facts, as the evidence in this case discloses, this is but another way of making the wife a surety by taking her property in pledge to pay the husband's debt. The evidence is undisputed that one of the creditors, James H. Odom, agreed to raise the money with which to pay the shortage of the husband as tax-collector, and thus relieve him and his sureties, if Mrs. Sharpe would secure the sureties by a mortgage, which was done. It is argued that this was an original undertaking on the part of the wife, and that she voluntarily mortgaged her property to secure the money borrowed by the sureties in order to lend it to the wife, who was to settle the shortage with the county; but it is equally true that if the sureties are creditors of the husband—and we hold that they are,—this act is, on the principle decided in the Smith case, making the wife liable to pay the debt of her husband, which the law says shall not be done. So, irrespective of the instructions of the court to the jury, and of the failure to charge as complained of, we think that the wife's property, under the facts of this case, cannot be thus taken in extinguishment of her husband's debts.

From what has been said, it follows that the court erred in refusing a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except Fish, C.J., absent.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that a mortgage given by a married woman to secure sureties on her husband's bond is void, on the ground that the sureties are to be regarded as creditors of the husband and that any arrangement which makes a married woman ultimately liable to pay the debt of another falls within the statutory condemnation of contracts of suretyship by a married woman. The question of the right of a wife to become surety for her husband is fully treated in the note to First Nat. Bank v. Bertoli, reported ante, this volume, at page 590.

HITE

v.

REYNOLDS ET AL.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—March 12, 1915.

163 Ky. 502; 173 S. W. 1108.

Suretyship — Agreement to Resort First to Surety — Evidence Sufficient.

Evidence held to sustain a finding that the wife of a purchaser of mortgaged land mortgaged her separate property to the mortgagee for the amount of the incumbrance, on the agreement that the mortgagee in case of default should first resort to her property before resorting to the property purchased by her husband, who executed notes to the vendor for the price.

Husband and Wife — Contracts of Wife — Suretyship for Husband.

Under Ky. St. § 2127, providing that no part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to the payment for the debt of another, including her husband, unless set apart for that purpose by deed or mortgage, a wife's separate property may be mortgaged by her and her husband to secure the debt of the husband or another, regardless of whether her property is a homestead.

[See note at end of this case.]

Marshaling Assets — Necessity of Common Debtor — Injury to Third Persons.

Equity will not marshal securities except as against a common debtor, and will never do so where it will work injustice to an innocent third person.

Evidence — Parel to Vary Writing — Showing Consideration.

Under Ky. St. § 472, providing that the consideration of any writing with or without seal may be impeached or denied by pleading verified by oath, the true consideration of a deed may be shown though it contradicts the writing.

Pleading — Verification — Time to Object to Failure to Verify.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 138, providing that no objection shall be taken after commencement of the trial to any pleading for want of verification, want of verification to a petition alleging a mistake in a deed will be treated as waived when not objected to.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Graves county.

Action by M. W. Reynolds et al., plaintiffs, against Mrs. J. E. Hite et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant named appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Moorman & Warren for appellant.

Hester & Hester for appellees.

[503] SETTLE, J.—This litigation arose out of the sale and conveyance by the appellee, M. W. Reynolds, of a seventy-two-acre tract of land lying in Graves County, to John W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor. The appellant, Mrs. J. E. Hite, wife of John W. Hite, owned in her own right a thirty-acre tract of land in the same county, upon which she, her husband and E. R. O'Connor, their adopted son, resided. Shortly after reaching his majority O'Connor married, following which he and the Hites found the thirty-acre farm too small for their joint needs, so they concluded to sell it and invest the proceeds, as far as they would go, in a larger tract of land, better suited to their purposes. To this arrangement Mrs. J. E. Hite seems to have fully assented and was a party.

Thereafter J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor, with the consent of Mrs. J. E. Hite, opened negotiations with the appellee Reynolds looking to the purchase of his seventy-two-acre farm. At that time the appellee R. S. Wilson held a mortgage on Reynolds' farm, to secure a note of $800.00 for money he had loaned Reynolds. The appellant, Mrs. J. E. Hite, J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor were advised of the existence of this mortgage. Reynolds offered to sell J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor his farm at the price of $1,800.00; $800.00 to be paid in cash and the remainder in five notes of $200.00 each, bearing six per cent. interest from date, payable in one, two, three, four and five years, respectively, and secured by a vendor's lien on the land. The cash payment was, as Reynolds informed Hite and O'Connor, desired to pay the $800.00 note held against Reynolds by Wilson, and discharge the mortgage lien given on his farm to the latter. J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor expressed their willingness to pay $1,800.00 for Reynolds' farm upon the terms proposed, but admitted their inability to make the $800.00 cash payment. They, however, told Reynolds that they or Mrs. J. E. Hite had a thirty-acre farm which they could sell for $800.00 and would give him a mortgage on the farm to secure the $800.00 payment. Reynolds refused to accept the mortgage, but informed them that as he wanted to pay the $800.00 he owed Wilson, the latter might be willing to accept the mortgage for $800.00 on the Hite thirty-acre farm in satisfaction of the mortgage debt of that amount Reynolds was owing him.

[504] Thereupon J. W. Hite, O'Connor and Reynolds went to see Wilson and laid the matter before him. Wilson refused to accept a mortgage on the Hite thirty-acre farm in satisfaction of the note and mortgage of Reynolds held by him, but agreed that Reynolds might sell his farm to Hite and O'Connor for $1,800.00; that he would accept the joint note of Hite and O'Connor for $800.00, secured by a mortgage on the Hite thirty-acre farm, and give them a year to pay it, but that he would still hold his lien on the Reynolds farm as additional security for the $800.00, and that as Reynolds was to give Hite and O'Connor from one to five years to pay the remaining $1,000.00 of the $1,800.00 they were to give him for his land, he (Wilson) would expect his $800.00 note to be paid before Reynolds was paid the $1,000.00 due him, and, if not so paid, he would enforce its satisfaction by a sale of the Hite land under his mortgage before enforcing his lien on the Reynolds land.

The trade was closed between the parties upon the terms proposed by Wilson, and Reynolds and wife in accordance therewith executed to J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor a deed conveying them the seventy-two acres of land, upon receiving which J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor executed to Reynolds their five joint notes of $200.00 each, bearing interest and payable as above stated. At the same time J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor executed their joint note to the appellee R. S. Wilson for the $800.00 due him, and the mortgage agreed to be given on the Hite thirty-acre farm to secure its payment was also executed by J. W. Hite and his wife, the appellant J. E. Hite, as had been agreed between them, Wilson and Reynolds. The deed and mortgage were written by the Clerk of the Graves County Court, and a vendor's lien was retained in the deed on the seventy-two acres of land, to secure the payment of the five notes of $200.00 each executed by J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor to Reynolds, it being provided therein that if the makers failed to pay the first or any one of the $200.00 notes when due, all should immediately become due and payable. The deed also retained a lien on the land to secure the $800.00 note held by R. S. Wilson, in respect to which it says:

"It is understood, agreed and made a part of the consideration herein, that the $800.00 note above described is and shall be superior to the balance of the [505] notes described herein, and the said last notes are not collectable until after said first note has been fully paid."

The mortgage from J. E. Hite and J. W. Hite to R. S. Wilson, in addition to setting out the $800.00 note executed by J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor to R. S. Wilson, and describing the thirty-acre tract of land, contains this recital:

"And in order to further secure the payment of the said note the parties of the first part hereby grant, sell and mortgage to the party of the second part, etc."

Shortly after the execution of the mortgage to R. S. Wilson by J. W. Hite and J. E. Hite on the thirty-acre farm of the latter, she sold and, in conjunction with her husband, conveyed the land to one T. L. Cameron, at the price of $800.00 and accepted his note therefor, payable on the day the note of $800.00 to R. S. Wilson, secured by the mortgage, became due. The deed to Cameron was made subject to the mortgage lien in favor of Wilson. After thus purchasing the land of the Hites, Cameron advised them that he would be unable to pay for it and offered to reconvey it to Mrs. Hite in satisfaction of the note which he had executed to her. This offer she accepted, and Cameron thereupon executed to her a deed reconveying her the land, which reinvested her with the legal title, subject to the mortgage in favor of Wilson.

J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor having failed to pay at their maturity the $800.00 note of Wilson and the first of the $200.00 notes of Reynolds, Wilson and Reynolds instituted a joint action against them and Mrs. J. E. Hite, whereby Wilson sought to recover of J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor personal judgment for the amount of the $800.00 note they had executed to him, and to enforce, first, his mortgage lien on the Hite thirty-acre farm for its payment, and second, his lien on the Reynolds land for the balance; and Reynolds sought a personal judgment against J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor for the aggregate amount of the several notes, to wit: $1,000.00, due him, and the enforcement of his vendor's lien on the seventy-two-acre farm in satisfaction thereof.

It was, in substance, alleged in the petition that the draftsman of the deed from Reynolds to J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor, by the fraudulent procurement of the latter, or mistake on his part, erroneously inserted [506] therein the clause quoted above instead of stating, as he was instructed by Reynolds and Wilson to do, what had actually been agreed upon by the parties to the conveyance, viz.: that the appellant, Mrs. J. E. Hite's, thirty-acre tract of land, in the event of the nonpayment at maturity of the $800.00 note due Wilson, should first be subjected to its payment; and that Wilson's lien on the seventy-two acre tract sold by Reynolds to J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor to further secure its payment, which was superior to that retained by Reynolds to secure the payment of the five $200.00 notes executed to him by J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor, should next be enforced, if necessary, for such balance thereof as the Hite land did not pay. The court was asked to reform the deed by making the corrections indicated.

By their joint answer J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor denied the alleged mistake in the deed from Reynolds to them, and also denied that the contract under which they purchased the Reynolds land required the sale first of Mrs. J. E. Hite's land to pay the Wilson $800.00 note; and alleged that she gave the mortgage on her land to secure its payment, with the agreement and understanding that it would be enforced and her land sold in satisfaction of the Wilson note, only in the event it was not paid by the enforcement of the lien which Wilson also held on the Reynolds land to secure its payment.

The appellant, J. E. Hite, filed a separate answer, containing substantially the same denials and averments found in the joint answer of J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor; and further alleging that the thirty-acre farm upon which she gave the mortgage was owned and occupied by her as a homestead; that it was of less value than $1,000.00 and that she executed the mortgage to secure the $800.00 note to Wilson under an agreement that she was to be conveyed by the deed from Reynolds, such an interest in the seventy-two-acre tract of land as would equal the value of her thirty-acre farm, but that the deed was not so made. The affirmative matter of the two answers was controverted by reply.

Following the taking of proof by the parties and the submission of the case, the circuit court gave the appellee R. S. Wilson personal judgment against the defendants, J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor, for the amount of the $800.00 note, with six per cent interest from August 21, 1913, and the appellee M. W. Reynolds personal judgment [507] against them for $1,080.00, with six per cent interest from August 21, 1913; adjudged the enforcement of Wilson's mortgage lien on the Hite thirty-acre tract of land and the lien given him by the deed from M. W. Reynolds to J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor on the seventy-two acres of land therein conveyed the latter, by a sale of the lands to satisfy his lien debt, but directed that the Hite land be sold first for that purpose, and then the Reynolds land to pay such part of the debt as may not have been discharged by the sale of the Hite land. Also adjudged the enforcement of Reynolds' lien on the seventy-two-acre tract and directed its sale in satisfaction of his debt, subject to the prior lien and debt of Wilson, or so much thereof as may not have been satisfied by the sale of the Hite land. From that judgment Mrs. J. E. Hite has appealed.

It is proper to say in this connection that the record furnishes no proof whatever of any such agreement as that set up in the answer of Mrs. Hite. On the contrary, the absence of any such agreement or understanding is established by her deposition, for it frankly admits that she consented to mortgage her thirty-acre farm to secure Wilson's note, to aid her husband and adopted son in purchasing the Reynolds land; and that she sold her farm to Cameron because she wished and intended that its proceeds should be used by her husband and adopted son in paying for the Reynolds land. The deposition also contains the admission that there was no agreement between her, Reynolds and Wilson, or between her and her husband or son, that she was to be conveyed an interest in the Reynolds land as a consideration for mortgaging or selling her land.

It is equally manifest from her testimony, and other evidence as well, that she was fully informed of the nature and terms of the contract under which Reynolds sold his farm to her husband and son; that she even went to the trouble of going with her husband to view the Reynolds land before its sale to him and the son was consummated, and that her husband had full authority from her to act for her in selling her land or in representing that she would mortgage it for the purpose of enabling him and the son to buy the Reynolds farm.

According to the testimony of R. S. Wilson, M. W. Reynolds, Sam Hall, Mrs. Mary Fortner and ——— Lockhart, the trade as made between Reynolds and Wilson, [508] J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor, was that J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor were to buy the Reynolds farm at the price of $1,800.00; $800.00 of which was to be paid in their note of that amount executed to R. S. Wilson and due one year after date, to be secured by a mortgage on the thirty-acre farm owned by Mrs. J. E. Hite; and that for the remaining $1,000.00 J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor were to execute to Reynolds their five notes of $200.00 each, payable in one, two, three, four and five years, respectively, which notes were to be secured by a lien on the Reynolds farm, and that upon the same farm R. S. Wilson was also to have a lien, as additional security for the $800.00 note executed to him by J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor; but that this lien, while superior to that of Reynolds for the several notes aggregating $1,000.00 executed to him by J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor, was not to be enforced by Wilson until he had first exhausted his mortgage lien on the Hite thirty-acre farm. These facts, corroborated by the other witnesses mentioned, will more clearly appear from the following questions and answers taken from the deposition of Wilson:

"Q. Which place was to furnish the money first towards paying your debt? A. My understanding was that they were to pay me out of the one they sold, the Hite land. Q. Then if I understand you, in the talk between you and the parties O'Connor said they had sold the Hite land, or contracted it to a party, at $800.00, and agreed that you could have a mortgage on this land to secure you, and if that failed to pay all of the $800.00 to you then Reynolds agreed that you should collect the balance out of his land. A. Yes, sir, that was what was said about it. Q. The deed that was actually written provides that the $800.00 should be a superior lien and be paid in full before any part of the $1,000.00 balance was to be paid. But it fails to mention anything about the Hite land in that deed. Now explain how the matter should have been arranged to agree with the contract, as it was made by the parties in your presence. A. They were to make the first payment out of the Hite land, the deed ought to have shown that. Q. State whether or not you told Reynolds that you would not look to the Hite place for your money at all. A. I did not. That was where I was expecting to get it. Q. In the contract and agreement between you parties, out of what was the [509] $800.00 note due you to be paid? A. Out of the Hite place. Q. Why did you require a lien on the Reynolds place for your $800.00? A. That was a small place, the Hite place was, and I wanted to be sure to get my money. . . . I told them that I didn't know anything about the Hite place and would not want to risk that, so I would want a lien on both places. Q. State what was said, if anything else, about the matter. A. I was talking to O'Connor one day and I said wasn't that the agreement, for them to pay that money out of that place on the other, and he said that was the agreement and trade, but it was not on record."

The case turns upon an issue of fact and the question of credibility of witnesses. On the one hand we find five witnesses, Reynolds, Wilson, Hall, Lockhart and Mrs. Fortner, the last three wholly disinterested, testifying that the contract was as claimed by appellees and held by the circuit court. On the other hand, of the few other witnesses whose depositions were taken, only J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor testified that the contract was as claimed by them. In addition, the circumstances attending the transactions between the parties to the contract support the testimony of appellees' witnesses. Mrs. Hite, after mortgaging her land to Wilson to secure the $800.00 note of her husband and son, sold it to Cameron to get the money to pay the note. This she would not have done if she had understood that it was required of Wilson to enforce the lien he held on the Reynolds land in satisfaction of the note, before he would have the right to enforce the mortgage on her land for its payment. Furthermore, it is altogether reasonable that Wilson should have been willing to aid Reynolds to sell his farm, and J. W. Hite and E. R. O'Connor to purchase it, by taking their note for $800.00, secured by a mortgage on the farm of Mrs. J. E. Hite, in lieu of the note of Reynolds for a like amount, and yet retain as additional security for the note a lien that he already had on the Reynolds land, to be enforced, however, only in the event he failed to collect the note by enforcing the mortgage on the Hite land; but wholly unreasonable that Reynolds would have consented to such a contract as Hite and O'Connor claim was made, which would not only have allowed the retention by Wilson of the lien on the seventy-two acres of land constituting the only security Reynolds had for the $1,000.00 of [510] purchase money owing him thereon, but compelled him to exhaust such lien in satisfaction of his $800.00 note, before enforcing his mortgage on the Hite land to pay it.

It appears from the record that both the Reynolds and Hite lands were sold as directed by the judgment; the former bringing $1,250.00 and the latter $725.00. So, if appellant's contention were allowed to prevail, to pay the Wilson debt, now amounting to about $1,000.00, out of the proceeds of the Reynolds land, would leave but about $250.00 to be applied on the Reynolds debt, now amounting, approximately, to $1,200. As the sale resulted under the judgment, the proceeds of the Hite land lacked $275.00 of paying Wilson's debt, and this $275.00 must, of course, be paid out of the $1,250.00 realized for the Reynolds land, which will leave but $975.00 to be applied on Reynolds' debt of $1,200.00, thereby causing the latter to sustain a loss of $225.00. The fact that Mrs. Hite's land was of no greater value than a homestead, and that it was occupied by her as such, gives her no right to complain of the judgment. Although the land could not otherwise be subjected to the payment of the note owing by her husband and adopted son to Wilson, the mortgage made it liable therefor.

Section 2127, Kentucky Statutes, provides: "No part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to the payment or satisfaction of any liability, upon a contract made after marriage, to answer for the debt, default or misdoing of another, including her husband, unless such estate shall have been set apart for that purpose by deed of mortgage or other conveyances. . . ."

This is an express declaration that the wife's property may be mortgaged by her and her husband to secure the debt of the husband or another, regardless of whether or not it is a homestead. Miller v. Sanders, 98 Ky. 535, 33 S. W. 621; Wirgman v. Miller, 98 Ky. 620, 33 S. W. 937; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Miller, 56 S. W. 975, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 230.

The case presented is not one requiring the adjustment of equities as between creditors or as between debtors. Equity will not marshal securities except as against a common debtor, and will never do so where it will work injustice to an innocent third person. Hughes v. Shannon, 13 Ky. L. Rep. (abstract) 782. To have compelled Wilson to collect his debt out of the seventy-two-acre tract instead [511] of the Hite land, would have ignored the contract made by the parties and resulted in the very injury to Reynolds he attempted from the beginning to guard against. In selling his land he doubtless had two objects in view, viz.: to obtain its market value, and to be discharged from the debt of $800.00 he was owing Wilson. To effect the latter object he had first demanded that enough of the $1,800.00 he was to receive as the consideration for the land, be paid in cash to be used in liquidating the Wilson note. Failing to get the cash, he and Wilson agreed with J. W. Hite and O'Connor that Wilson would accept the joint note of the latter for the $800.00, secured by a mortgage on the land of Mrs. Hite; and while Wilson also retained as security for this note a lien on the Reynolds land, it was with the distinct understanding between all the parties that in the event of the failure of Hite and O'Connor to pay the $800.00 note at maturity, Wilson would enforce the mortgage on the Hite land for its payment; and in the event all of the debt was not obtained from the sale of the Hite land, that, for the balance, he would enforce the lien retained on the Reynolds land. That this arrangement was fully understood and agreed to by J. W. Hite, E. R. O'Connor and Mrs. J. E. Hite, the evidence leaves no doubt. Indeed, at the time of the purchase by J. W. Hite and O'Connor of the Reynolds land, they and Mrs. Hite had already contracted a sale of the latter's land to Cameron, and the mortgage was given on the Hite land with the full knowledge and intention on the part of Mrs. Hite, her husband and O'Connor, that it was to be sold and its proceeds applied to the payment of the Wilson note.

Under the contract as thus made, the lien retained by Reynolds on the land he sold J. W. Hite and O'Connor to secure the $1,000.00 of the purchase money going to him, furnished apparently safe security for the debt, as the lien of Wilson on the same land could only be enforced for what might be left unpaid of his debt after the application thereto of the proceeds arising from the sale of the Hite land. This view of the case is supported by the great weight of the evidence and is, in addition, consonant with reason.

The circuit court by the judgment rendered determined the rights of the parties without reforming the deed. This, in view of the relief sought, it had the right [512] to do. We are, however, satisfied from the evidence that the misleading statement in the deed was caused by a mistake or inadvertence on the part of the draftsman thereof.

Section 472, Kentucky Statutes, provided: "The consideration of any writing, with or without seal, may be impeached or denied by pleading verified by oath."

It has been held that under this statute the true consideration of a deed may be shown, although it contradicts the writing. Neurenberger v. Lehenhauer, 66 S. W. 15, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1753. Here the mistake in the deed is alleged in the petition, and though the petition is not verified, as the want of verification was not objected to, it must be treated as having been waived. Civil Code, Section 138; Myers v. Douglas, 99 Ky. 267, 35 S. W. 917.

As in our opinion the rights of the parties were properly determined by the circuit court, the judgment is affirmed.

Whole court sitting. Judge Turner dissenting.

NOTE.

In the reported case a statute providing, substantially, that no part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to her husband's debts unless that estate shall have been set apart for that purpose by mortgage or other conveyance, is held to be an express declaration that a married woman may mortgage her property in the statutory manner for her husband's debts. For a full discussion of the right of a wife to secure the payment of her husband's debts, see the note to First Nat. Bank v. Bertoli, reported ante, this volume, at page 590.

ROYAL ET AL.

SOUTHERLAND ET AL.

North Carolina Supreme Court—March 17, 1915.

168 N. Car. 405; 84 S. E. 708.

Husband and Wife — Contracts of Wife — Suretyship for Husband.

A contract of suretyship being primarily a contract between the surety and creditor, a wife may, under Laws 1911, c. 109, authorizing married women to contract and deal as femes sole, become surety for her husband.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Const. art. 10, § 6, declaring that the real and personal property of any woman acquired before marriage shall be and remain her sole and separate property not liable for the debts of her husband, does not inhibit a wife from becoming the surety of her husband; the purpose being merely to protect the estate of the wife from liability for her husband's debts arising by reason of the coverture.

[See note at end of this case.]

Effect of Fraud of Husband — Rights of Creditor.

Where a wife signed a note as surety for her husband, the fact that he induced her through false representations cannot be shown in defense; the note being given for a good consideration and the creditor not being a party to the fraud.

Evidence — Parol to Vary Writing — Scope of Contract of Suretyship.

Where a wife as surety for her husband signed a note and mortgage, she cannot in an action on the note and mortgage testify that she only intended to pledge her land and did not intend to incur further obligation, for that would contradict the terms of the written instrument.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson county: DANIELS, Judge.

Action by Alvin Royal et al., plaintiffs, against Mrs. Georgie A. Southerland, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant named appeals. AFFIRMED.

[405] Civil action to recover balance due on a note under seal, executed by feme covert defendant with her husband, R. B. Southerland, as his surety. The note was given for $1,000, to secure same a second mortgage on the wife's land was also executed. The land having been sold under decree of foreclosure, the sum of $757.50 was realized thereon as the portion applicable to the present note, and this sum having been properly entered as a credit, there was recovery against the feme defendant for the balance due. Judgment on the verdict for balance due on note, and defendant excepted and appealed, assigning a number of errors.

John D. Kerr for appellant.
B. H. Crumpler for appellees.

[406] HOKE, J.—The statute of 1911, ch. 109, known as the Martin Act, authorizes married women to contract and deal as if they were unmarried except in reference to conveyances of real estate and as to contracts between the husband and the wife, in both of which cases certain formalities are required to make these conveyances and contracts efficient and binding.

It is the obvious intent and meaning of the statute that a feme covert may bind herself by her ordinary contracts (Lipinsky v. Revell, 167 N. C. 508, 83 S. E. 820), and we see no reason why the privilege or capacity does not extend to contracts of suretyship for her husband when the same are otherwise valid; and the same view has prevailed in other States having laws of similar import. Pelzer v. Campbell, 15 S. C. 581, 40 Am. Rep. 705; Major v. Holmes, 124 Mass. pp. 108-109; Mayo v. Hutchinson, 57 Me. 547.

This is not primarily a contract between the husband and the wife, but, so far as this statute is concerned, is to be properly considered as one between the husband and wife on the one part and the creditor on the other.

It is urged that to allow recovery on the facts presented would be in contravention of Article X, sec. 6, of our Constitution, which provides that the "real and personal property of any female in this State, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may, after marriage, become in any manner entitled, shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female and shall not be liable for any debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband," etc.

The purpose of this section was to protect the estate of the wife from liability for her husband's debts arising under the common law by reason of the coverture, but it was not intended by that section to protect the property from her own obligations. Vann v. Edwards, 135 N. C. 661, 47 S. E. 784, 67 L.R.A. 461; Brinkley v. Balance, 126 N. C. 393, 35 S. E. 631.

By the enactment of the Martin Act, conferring the capacity to contract on married women as if they were feme sole, when she signs and delivers a note, though it may be as surety, in reference to the creditor or holder the obligation is hers and not his, and the constitutional provision referred to has no application.

It was further contended that his Honor committed error in excluding testimony tending to show certain representations on the part of the husband to the wife as to the effect of putting her signature on the note, but there is no claim or suggestion that these representations were made known to the payee of the note or that he had any part in them.

[407] The note is under seal and given for valuable consideration, and, under the circumstances appearing, the representations to the wife by the husband may not be allowed to affect the creditor.

Again, it is insisted that error was committed in not allowing the feme defendant to testify that in signing the note and mortgage to secure the same she only intended to pledge her land for the debt, and did not intend to come under any further obligation; but this would be in express contradiction of her written note, and it is well understood that when the entire agreement is in writing and the language is clear and meaning plain, the same may not be contradicted or varied by parol. In such case, and in the language of the Chief Justice in Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, 62 S. E. 510, "The written word abides." Deering v. Boyles, 8 Kan. 529, 12 Am. Rep. 480.

There seems to be no question of parties raised in the record, but there is high authority for the position that in conferring on married women the absolute freedom of contract the right carries with it the privilege and liability of suing and being sued alone. Paterson v. Franklin, 168 N. C. 75, 84 S. E. 18; Lipinsky v. Revell, 167 N. C. 508, 83 S. E. 820; Worthington v. Cooke, 52 Md. pp. 297-309.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment in plaintiff's favor is Affirmed.

NOTE.

The court in the reported case holds that under a general enabling statute a married woman has the power to contract as surety for her husband, such a contract not being one between husband and wife. The court further holds that a constitutional provision to the effect that the wife's property shall not be liable for the husband's debts protects the estate of the wife from the common-law liability of coverture but does not protect her estate from her own obligation incurred as surety for her husband. The right of a wife to become surety for her husband is discussed in the note to First Nat. Bank v. Bertoli, reported ante, this volume, at page 590.

STATE

v.

BOWEN AND COMPANY, INCORPORATED.

Washington Supreme Court—June 9, 1915.

86 Wash. 23; 149 Pac. 330.

Constitutional Law — Policy or Wisdom of Statute.

Questions of the wisdom, necessity, and policy of law are solely for the legislature, Ann. Cas. 1917B.—40.

and if the legislature proceeds regularly, violating no constitutional restriction, questions as to the necessity and policy of the law are conclusively determined in favor of the statute, if any state of facts could exist which would justify it.

[See 6 R. C. L. tit. Constitutional Law, p. 107.]

Commission Merchants — Validity of Regulation.

The rights of liberty and property, guaranteed by Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and the corresponding provisions in the state constitution are not designed to interfere with the police power of the state for the protection of the health, safety, morals, and welfare; hence Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 7024-7035, known as the Commission Merchants' Law, enacted to protect those consigning property to commission merchants, is a valid exercise of the police power, and does not interfere with the rights of liberty and property, which include the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling without restriction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Constitutional Law — Presumption in Favor of Statute.

Every presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and, until the contrary is shown beyond a reasonable doubt, a statute enacted in the exercise of the police power will not be overturned.

[See 6 R. C. L. tit. Constitutional Law, p. 97.]

Commission Merchants — Validity of Regulation.

The Commission Merchants' Law (Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 7024-7035) is not invalid because requiring a small license fee from such person; the fee not being oppressive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Nor is it invalid as unreasonable because requiring the giving of a surety bond for $3,000 before license can be issued.

[See note at end of this case.]

Constitutional Law — Right to Attack Statute — Persons Not Affected.

The defendant cannot attack the validity of the Commission Merchants' Law on constitutional grounds not applicable to their particular situation.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 175; Ann. Cas. 1915C 57.]

Statutes — Effect of Partial Invalidity.

Where the provisions of the Commission Merchants' Law (Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 7024-7035) applicable to defendants were valid, the invalidity of other portions which could be separated from the remainder will not defeat the entire act.

[See Ann. Cas. 1916D 9.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King county: ALBERTSON, Judge.

Criminal action. Bowen and Company convicted of violation of statute and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Bogle, Graves, Merritt & Bogle for appellant.

John F. Murphy and H. B. Butler for respondent.

[24] HOLCOMB, J.—Appellant was prosecuted in the superior court and convicted of a violation of chapter 139, Laws of 1907, p. 266 (Rem. & Bal. Code, §§ 7024-7035), known as the commission merchants' law, in having carried on the business of commission merchant without first having given bond and procured a license as required by said law. Appellant demurred to the information upon the ground that the act in question is invalid, unconstitutional, and void, for the reasons, (1) that it violates articles 4, 5, and 7, and § 1 of art. 14, of the amendments to the constitution of the United States, and §§ 3, 7, 9, 17, and 21 of art. 1 of the constitution of the state of Washington; and (2) that it is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. The court overruled the demurrer. At the trial appellant admitted all the allegations of fact contained in the information, and also admitted additional facts not alleged, to wit, that, at the time in question, appellant's principal business was to sell farm, dairy, orchard, and garden products on commission, and that the person from whom he received the produce in question was then a resident of the state of Washington.

Appellant concedes the right of the legislature to pass proper laws reasonably tending to regulate such occupations and business as affect the health, safety, comfort, or welfare of the public in general, but insists that the business [25] attempted to be regulated by the law in question is a harmless and ordinary business or calling, and that to justify interference by the state with such occupation at least two conditions must clearly appear: (1) that the interests of the public generally, as distinguished from those of a particular class, require such an interference; and (2) that the regulation attempted is reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose, and not unduly oppressive upon individuals.

Appellant's brief while being very forceful and presenting a painstaking review of the authorities upon the questions involved, follows no set order of presentation, and we shall not attempt to follow any set order.

Great reliance seems to be placed in the holdings of this court in the case of State v. Smith, 42 Wash. 237, 7 Ann. Cas. 577, 84 Pac. 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 114, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 674, involving the plumbers' licensing law, and In re Aubrey, 36 Wash. 308, 1 Ann. Cas. 927, 78 Pac. 900, 104 Am. St. Rep. 952, involving the horseshoers' licensing law. Those cases are very illuminating and correctly state the principles of law applying to the regulation of businesses and callings under the police power of the state. The Richey case, as was stated by the court, per Rudkin, J., was where the law obviously attempted to place the control of the plumbing business in the hands of a board to be composed of two master plumbers and one journeyman plumber, who were given power to pass upon the qualifications of other persons desiring to follow that business, and there was no other end in view. The court there said:

"We are satisfied that the act has no such relation to the public health as will sustain it as a police or sanitary measure, and that its interference with the liberty of the citizen brings it in direct conflict with the constitution of the United States."

The same was true of the horseshoers' law, passed upon in the Aubrey case. Manifestly there was no relation between [26] the law there in question and the public health, peace, safety, or general welfare. As a general proposition, the questions of the wisdom, necessity, and policy of the law are for the legislature to determine, and if the legislature proceeds regularly, violating no other constitutional restriction or prohibition, the questions of fact as to the wisdom, necessity, and policy of the law are conclusively determined if a state of facts could exist which would justify the legislation in question. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 77; Home Telephone, etc. Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, 29 S. Ct. 50, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 176; State v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 46 L.R.A. 442; State v. Pitney, 79 Wash. 608, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 209, 140 Pac. 918; Carstens v. DeSelle, 82 Wash. 643, 144 Pac. 934. Authorities could be multiplied to the same effect, but it is needless.

We may also give assent to the main proposition advanced by appellant, that the enjoyment upon terms of equality with all orders in similar circumstances of the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling or business and of acquiring, holding, and selling property, subject only to its civil liability for debt or damages and the right to contract in respect thereto, is an essential part of its rights of liberty and property, as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment to the Federal and the corresponding provisions of our state constitution. But the Federal and state constitutional limitations were not designed to interfere with the exercise of the police power of the state for the protection of health, safety, morals, and welfare, and the prevention of fraud. The power which the legislature has to promote the general welfare is very great, and the discretion which it has and may exercise in the employment of means to that end is very large. True, it is not all powerful, while both its power and its discretion must be so exercised as not to impair the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property, to the end that no man may be compelled to hold his life or the means of living or any material [27] right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another,

"and in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 370, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 220.

The precise bounds of the police power have never been prescribed, nor will the courts attempt to define and prescribe its limitations rigidly. Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 53; State v. McFarland, 60 Wash. 98, 110 Pac. 792, 140 Am. St. Rep. 909; State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 117 Pac. 1101, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 466; State v. Sommerville, 67 Wash. 638, 122 Pac. 324; State v. Superior Court, 87 Wash. 37, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D 78, L.R.A. 1915C 287; State v. Mountain Timber Co. 75 Wash. 581, 135 Pac. 645; State v. Pitney, 79 Wash. 608, Ann. Cas. 1916A 209, 140 Pac. 918; Carstens v. DeSelle, supra.

Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of the statute until the contrary is shown beyond a reasonable doubt. One branch of the government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule. Sinking-Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 496; Livingston County v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 407, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 1015; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 8 S. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 253; State v. Carey, 4 Wash. 424, 30 Pac. 729.

As to the exercise of the police power, it suffices in general to say that the courts will arrest the execution of the statute when it manifestly conflicts with the constitution, either state or Federal; but the courts cannot run a race of opinion upon points of right, reason, and expediency with the law-making power. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations (7th ed.) 236.

"It is true that equality of rights, privileges, and capacities should be the aim of the law, and if . . . special burdens or restrictions are imposed in any case it must be [28] presumed that the legislature designed to depart as little as possible from fundamental maxims of government." Cooley, Constitutional Limitations (7th ed.), 562.

The particular business here sought to be regulated is, of course, a legitimate and, in many respects, a necessary and important business. The business of producing farm, garden, orchard, and dairy products is one of the most important industries of the state. The producer cannot ordinarily be both producer and marketer. The legislature seems to have found that there exists a class of factors or merchants whose principal business is that of selling such produce on commission, and that certain abuses have grown up in that business; so, to provide regulation and prevent such abuses, the act in question was passed. Such an act, similar in most of the provisions, was sustained in Minnesota, in State v. Wagener, supra, and a similar act was also sustained in Illinois, in Lasher v. People, 183 Ill. 226, 55 N. E. 663, 75 Am. St. Rep. 103, 47 L.R.A. 802. A similar act in Michigan was held bad, in People v. Berrien Circuit Judge, 124 Mich. 664, 83 N. W. 594, 83 Am. St. Rep. 352, 50 L.R.A. 493. Bringing to aid the presumptions in favor of the legislative power, and, also, the presumption that a state of facts exists which would warrant the selection of the persons or classes which this law hits, we believe that the reasoning in the Minnesota and Illinois cases is convincing.

"This objection to the law is not valid. The legislature has power to form classes for the purpose of police regulation, if they do not arbitrarily discriminate between persons in substantially the same situation. A discrimination must rest upon some reasonable ground of difference, but the classification in this case is a natural one. The commission merchants dealing in the kinds of produce named in this act, which constitute the small products of the farm, are of a different class from those who transact business in the great markets for the sale of grain, live stock and dressed meats." Lasher v. People, supra.

[29] See also McKnight v. Hodge, 55 Wash. 289, 104 Pac. 504, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1207, and cases there cited.

The law appears to be a very stringent and in some respects even drastic one, but the validity of a statute is not subject to objection because of the stringency or difficulty of its requirements. Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 9 S. Ct. 231, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 623.

"It is not for the court to say that a constitutional law shall not have effect, because it is in the judgment of a court unreasonable." Barton v. McWhinney, 85 Ind. 481.

See also People v. Worden Grocer Co. 118 Mich. 604, 77 N. W. 315; Hamilton v. St. Louis County Court, 15 Mo. 3; State v. Cary, 126 Wis. 135, 105 N. W. 792, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174; Point Roberts Fishing Co. v. George, etc. Co. 28 Wash. 200, 63 Pac. 438.

Nor does that part of the law requiring a license render the act void.

"The most proper business may be regulated to prevent its becoming offensive to the public sense of decency or for any other reason injurious or dangerous, and rules for the conduct of the most necessary and common occupations are prescribed when from their nature afford peculiar opportunities for imposition and fraud." Cooley, Constitutional Limitations (7th ed.) 886.

See also 8 Cyc. 1067; 25 Cyc. 614.

The fact that this law in the main provides for prevention of fraud upon the customer of the commission merchant, assuming that the legislature found a state of facts requiring such regulations to prevent such fraud, renders the regulation by licensing, among other features, appropriate. The license fee here is small, not in any way oppressive or unreasonable, and for any revocation or threatened revocation of the license by the licensing authority, without just cause, relief is to be afforded by the courts.

Appellant insists that the requirement of the law, in order to obtain a license, that a surety company bond in the sum of $3,000 be furnished, is an unreasonable and invalid requirement. [30] It insists also that it is impossible of performance. The last contention is undoubtedly merely a conclusion or statement of opinion. We have heretofore held, in the case of Ferguson-Hendrix Co. v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 79 Wash. 528, 140 Pac. 700, that the provision of the law requiring such bond in order to obtain a license is a valid exercise of the police power of the state. It is urged, however, that that question was not involved and was not proper to be decided in that case. State v. Robins, 71 Ohio St. 273, 2 Ann. Cas. 485, 73 N. E. 470, 69 L.R.A. 427, where a similar statute in Ohio was not sustained, is cited in support of appellant's contention. We cannot give our assent to the reasoning or the conclusion in that case; and while it may be true that the validity of this section of the law was not involved in the Ferguson-Hendrix case, supra, yet we adopt the reasoning in that case as supporting this provision of the law.

The appellant urges the unconstitutionality of the other provisions of the law to render the entire act void. We conceive it to be the unquestioned rule that a person cannot invoke a constitutional objection to a part of a statute not applicable to its own particular case. Southern R. Co. v. King, 217 U. S. 524, 30 S. Ct. 594, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 868; Engel v. O'Malley, 219 U. S. 128, 31 S. Ct. 190, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 128; Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright, 225 U. S. 540, 32 S. Ct. 784, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1197; Rosenthal v. New York, 226 U. S. 260, Ann. Cas. 1914B 71, 33 S. Ct. 27, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 212; Darnell v. Indiana, 226 U. S. 390, 33 S. Ct. 120, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 267; Cram v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 85 Neb. 586, 19 Ann. Cas. 170, 123 N. W. 1045, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1028; Wadin v. Czuczka, 16

Ariz. 371, 146 Pac. 491. Unless a person's rights are directly involved, courts will postpone inquiry into constitutional questions which are separable therefrom until they are met upon a question directly at issue, unless the unconstitutional feature of it, if it exists, is of such a character as to render the entire act void. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. v. U. S. 212 U. S. 481, 29 S. Ct. 304, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 613; People v. Huff, 249 Ill. 164, 94 N. E. 61; Hammer v. State, 173 Ind. 190, 21 Ann. Cas. 1034, 89 N. E. 850, 140 Am. St. Rep. 248, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 795; Wadin v. Czuczka, [31] supra. But that a law may be valid in part and separable and capable of being executed, so that the invalid part may be disregarded, is a well settled principle of statutory construction. Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, 578, 579; Cooley, Constitutional Limitations (7th ed.) 246, 247; Pullman State Bank v. Manring, 18 Wash. 250, 51 Pac. 464; Albany County v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 1044.

The provisions in some sections of the act, for imprisonment for debt and for recovery of attorney's fees in suits upon the bonds provided for in the act, are matters not involved in this prosecution, and with which the appellant has no concern. We may well assume that the legislature would have enacted the body of the act providing for licensing and regulation of commission merchants regardless of the provisions for recovery of attorney's fees in civil actions upon the bonds and for prosecution and punishment for violation of any of the sections of the act. We, therefore, hold that, as to those sections, whether they are or are not unconstitutional and void, the provisions, so far as involved in this prosecution, are entirely independent and separable therefrom; and if said sections should be determined to be unconstitutional and void, such determination and the elimination of such provisions would not affect the remainder of the act.

The same reasoning applies to the contention of the appellant that the law contravenes the provisions of the Federal constitution relating to interstate commerce. So far as the present case is concerned, there is no issue involving rights under the interstate commerce clause of the Federal constitution. However, the question whether a statute applies to interstate commerce depends upon the actual operation; and a statute which is void as to interstate commerce may be valid as regards commerce which is carried on wholly within the state. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 792; State v. Wagener, supra.

Other matters are discussed by appellant which are not involved in the prosecution and are not, in our opinion, to be [32] passed upon in this case. We cannot say that the act, so far as it applies to the facts upon which appellant was prosecuted, is palpably in violation of any of the provisions referred to in the Federal or state constitution.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Parker, Mount, Main, and Ellis, JJ., concur.

CHADWICK, J. (dissenting).—No one can take exception to the abstract propositions stated in the majority opinion. They require no citation of authority. Granting that the Ferguson-Hendrix Co. case was correctly decided, the real question in this case was not even discussed in that opinion. The Ferguson-Hendrix Co. case decided nothing more than that the provision of the commission merchant law requiring a surety bond was constitutional. It did not assume to pass upon other provisions of the law.

The power of the state to pass laws to preserve the peace, to protect the health and safety of the citizen, and promote his welfare is axiomatic. That such laws must be general in their application is admitted. It does not follow that, in the application of its power, the state cannot make classes. But it is equally true that the state cannot make classes or a class within a class, unless the class to which the law is made to apply and the distinction drawn bears some reasonable relation to the evil sought to be cured. In this case the evil sought to be remedied is the impositions practiced upon the producers of farm and dairy products who live at a distance from the market places and who are, perforce of that circumstance, compelled to trust their commodities to those who sell their goods on commission.

Granting that it is within the power, as is held by the majority and as I admit, of the state to provide that all commission merchants must take out a license and must give a bond, and make the report required by the statute and subject their books to the inspection of all who are interested, the real point in this case is not whether that can be [33] done, but whether the legislature can say that it shall be done by some commission merchants and not by others.

Section 16 of the act defines commission merchants. It says that commission merchants within the meaning of this act are those whose principal business is dealing in farm and dairy products. Unless we can find some reason for the distinction between those who are doing some of their business with the farmers and dairymen and those who are doing the principal part of their business with farmers and dairymen, the law cannot be sustained. What is the test? A reference to the evil and the proposed remedy. Under the law, a man or firm who is doing a $100,000 business, $40,000 being with goods consigned from farmers and dairymen, and $60,000 in flouring mill products, commercial food stuffs and fruits from foreign shipments, would clearly be exempt because the principal part of his business is not with farmers and dairymen. On the other hand, if a firm does a business of $10,000, all or the major part of which is with the farmers and dairymen upon consigned goods, he is subject to the law because it is the principal part of his business. If a grower ships a ton of potatoes to the man who does the $100,000 business, his farm consignments being the smaller part of the business, and at the same time ships a ton of potatoes to the man who does the $10,000 business, it being all with the farmers and dairymen, can it be said that there is any reasonable ground upon which to rest the distinction made by the law? Is not the farmer just as liable to imposition from the man who is doing the lesser part of his business in farm and dairy products as he is from the man who is doing the greater part? It follows that no reasonable ground for the distinction can be drawn.

This principle was noticed and adhered to by this court in the Spokane employment agency case, Spokane v. Macho, 51 Wash. 322, 98 Pac. 755, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1100, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263. We there said:

[34] "When exercising its power to regulate a business, the municipality may classify subjects of legislation, but the law must treat alike all of a class to which it applies, and must bring within its classification all who are similarly situated or under the same condition."

We also quoted from the case of State v. Ramsey County, 48 Minn. 236, 51 N. W. 112, 31 Am. St. Rep. 650:

"The classification must be based on some reason suggested by a difference in the situation and the circumstances of the subjects treated, and no arbitrary distinction between different kinds or classes of business can be sustained, the conditions being otherwise similar."

We also quoted the principle from the case of Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405:

"An ordinance which would make the act done by one penal and impose no penalty for the same act done under like circumstances by another, could not be sanctioned or sustained because it would be unjust and unlawful."

Other cases and McQuillin, Municipal Ordinances, 193, were cited to sustain our opinion. Under this case and all the elementary rules of law, the distinction made by the statute must be sustained by the character of the act and not by the extent of the act, or the amount of business done by those against whom the law is directed. Indeed, this case is an aggravated violation of the rule, for the one who does a lesser part of his business with the farmer and dairyman may in fact be the worst offender.

The Macho case was followed in Seattle v. Dencker, 58 Wash. 501, 108 Pac. 1086, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1076, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 446, and State v. W. W. Robinson Co. 84 Wash. 246, 146 Pac. 628. See also State v. McFarland, 60 Wash. 98, 110 Pac. 792, 140 Am. St. Rep. 909. It is possible that a law providing that all commission merchants having transactions with farmers and dairymen exceeding in amount a certain sum could be sustained as a proper classification, but to hold that the aggregate amount of business done with the farmer and [35] dairyman is a basis of classification cannot be sustained by reason or authority. They might just as well say that dry goods merchants dealing with farmers and dairymen should give a bond as a precaution and remedy against imposition and that hardware merchants should not.

"A much worse discrimination would be a discrimination between citizens of the same class engaged in the same business, where there is no reason suggested by the difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects treated; for not only is the business in this case similar and identical, but it is purely and simply a difference in the mode of transacting the business [amount of business], a mode which cannot possibly affect any principle or affect deleteriously the consumer or purchaser of the article." Seattle v. Dencker, supra.

Neither can it be said that § 16 of the act can be held to be unconstitutional and the rest of the act remain. Section 16 is the very cap-stone of the arch. Without it there could be no law, for the legislature in that section says who are and who are not commission merchants within the meaning of the statute. Following the rule and construction laid down by us in the stock food case, State v. W. W. Robinson Co. supra, and by all courts when a similar question has been presented, we must presume that the law would not have been passed unless a section had been included exempting a certain class within a class. Otherwise no reference would have been made to the character and amount of business done. The law would have been complete without it. Answering a similar contention made in the stock food case, we said:

"The Attorney General further argues that, if § 13 (Id. § 6022) is void, it may be excluded from the act, and the balance of the act may still remain a valid law. But it is apparent that § 13 (Id. § 6022) is a material part of the act. It is more than probable that if this section had not been inserted the act would not have passed. It was inserted for the purpose of excluding cereal and flouring mills from the operation of the act. To say that this section is [36] unconstitutional and does not affect the remainder of the act is to say that every person, firm or corporation is bound to comply with the terms of the act, when the legislature itself has said that cereal and flouring mills are not bound by the act. In short, to hold this section void and the rest of the act valid is to determine, in face of an express statement of the legislature to the contrary, that the act applies to all persons dealing in concentrated commercial feeding stuffs."

The statutes in Wisconsin, Illinois and Minnesota are not the same as ours. They do not make a class within a class. The statutes in each of those states cover "every," "any" and "all" "persons, firms and corporations" dealing in farm products on commission. Undoubtedly the power to classify all who are so engaged is within the power of the legislature. In State v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 46 L.R.A. 442, the court, after finding that a law controlling commission merchants was constitutional, noted some of the abuses calling for the law, and of the sale of farm products, said:

"And, with respect to other agricultural products and farm produce, it is to be observed that they are largely of a perishable nature, and subject to rapid deterioration in transit, or after reaching the consignee. This fact gives to the latter an opportunity to falsify his report of a sale to the distant consignor, and to insist that the article consigned had become more or less unmarketable before sale could be made; and here, as in the case of grain, the latter has little or no opportunity to ascertain the truth. Without wishing to intimate that fraud of this nature had actually become so prevalent as to justify the accusation made, we do say that a majority of the people in this state had become convinced of the truth of these charges, and in great numbers besieged the legislature in behalf of the suppression of the alleged evil practices. This was a matter of common knowledge. It was publicly believed that the business of selling agricultural products and farm produce on commission had become saturated with false and fraudulent methods, to the great injury of a large class of our citizens, who were compelled to deal with commission men, and who were powerless to detect [37] or prevent the wrong, and that the business had thus become sufficiently affected with public interests as to be the proper subject of police regulation."

The principle of the law is right, but it cannot be sustained under an act making the things complained of penal in one class and not in another. It seems to me that a joker was deliberately slipped into the law.

For these reasons, I dissent.

Morris, C.J., Fullerton, and Crow, JJ., concur with Chadwick, J.

NOTE.Validity of State or Municipal Regulation of Commission Merchants.General Rule.*

The enactments in various jurisdictions designed to control and regulate the business of commission merchants dealing in farm produce by requiring the payment of a license fee and the execution of a bond for the faithful performance of duty to the consignor as a condition precedent to doing business have generally been held to find support in the police power inherent in the state and not to be void as class legislation. State v. Mohler, 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408; State v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 46 L.R.A. 442. And see the reported case, in connection with which should be noted, however, the holding in the more recent decision of State v. Powles, 90 Wash. 112, 155 Pac. 774, wherein the act declared to be constitutional in the reported case was held to be void because of the indefiniteness of the term "commission merchant" as used therein. Compare People v. Berrien Circuit Judge, 124 Mich. 664, 83 N. W. 594, 83 Am. St. Rep. 352, 50 L.R.A. 493. Thus in State v. Mohler, supra, the court said: "The business of commission merchants dealing in farm produce has grown to be one of great volume and much importance. In its development its tendency seems to be to centralize in the larger cities, far removed from the points of origin, and where by no practical possibility can the originators of the traffic, the consignors, keep personal check on the doings of the commission merchants, who are merely the agents of the consignors. Such a situation would seem to warrant a reasonable extension of the state's governmental power over the business. The act does classify commission merchants, but the classification is reasonable. It relates to all who sell farm produce on commission for resale, and this includes 'agricultural, horticultural, vegetable and fruit products of the soil, and meats, poultry, eggs, dairy products, nuts and honey,' but not timber, floricultural products, tea or coffee. It practically reaches all the important and useful products of farm and truck garden. It specifically exempts matters of little consequence to the Kansas producer. If, as argued, it also exempts live stock, that too is a reasonable exemption, since live stock is almost invariably shipped in carloads and is so valuable as to justify the producer or shipper in the expense of accompanying his shipment to market and personally supervising the fidelity of the commission merchant who makes the sale for him or in making the sale himself. As modern business is now conducted, it is practically impossible for the ordinary farmer or fruit producer or truck gardener to market his own products without the agency of the commission merchant. Nor do the exactions of the statute seem unduly burdensome. It exacts a license of $10 per annum. That fee is not onerous. It requires a bond to insure the commission merchant's fidelity and the payment of his obligations. This is in accord with the general tendency of modern business, to relieve it from the uncertainty of fraud or insolvency."

In State v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 46 L.R.A. 442, supra, it was said: "The act . . . if sustained at all, must be upon the ground that it is a lawful regulation for the public good—a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state. The design seems to have been to protect a large class of people engaged in agricultural pursuits, and more or less remote from market, from imposition and actual fraud when intrusting their products and produce into the hands of commission men for sale. And it is no argument against the statute to say that commission men are engaged in a legitimate business, and for that reason are not subject to police regulation, if the public good demands it. . . . What evils or supposed evils did the members of the legislature have in mind, and were attempting to remedy, when enacting this law? The fact is that the public generally looked with distrust upon the methods of merchants engaged in selling agricultural products and farm produce upon commission, perhaps without good reason. It had become a matter of common talk among the people that those who handled wheat imposed upon their consignors by reporting sales and accounting for the proceeds at the lowest prices at which that article had been sold within the period of time during which the sale could have been made, and without regard to the prices actually obtained. With prices fluctuating at all times, as is the fact in the wheat market, and rarely remaining stationary for more than a few minutes at a time, the opportunity for fraud seems to be without limit when selling this commodity on commission. In addition to this is the fact that the consignor usually resides at a considerable distance from the commission merchant, and is practically unable to discover whether he has been cheated or not. And, with respect to other agricultural products and farm produce, it is to be observed that they are largely of a perishable nature, and subject to rapid deterioration in transit, or after reaching the consignee. This fact gives to the latter an opportunity to falsify his report of a sale to the distant consignor, and to insist that the article consigned had become more or less unmarketable before sale could be made; and here, as in the case of grain, the latter has little or no opportunity to ascertain the truth. Without wishing to intimate that fraud of this nature had actually become so prevalent as to justify the accusation made, we do say that a majority of the people in this state had become convinced of the truth of these charges, and in great numbers besieged the legislature in behalf of the suppression of the alleged evil practices.

. . . It was publicly believed that the business of selling agricultural products and farm produce on commission had become saturated with false and fraudulent methods, to the great injury of a large class of our citizens, who were compelled to deal with commission men, and who were powerless to detect or prevent the wrong, and that the business had thus become sufficiently affected with the public interests to be the proper subject of police regulation. We are of opinion that the legislature did not exceed its powers when, under the circumstances, it enacted a measure having relation to, and a tendency to accomplish, the desired end, such as is the law now before us. . . . The class here created consists of those who engaged in the business of receiving agricultural products and farm produce for sale, or receive or solicit the same for sale; in short, those who are engaged in the business of selling the same. The class is as broad as it need be. The peculiar characteristics of the agricultural products and farm produce already referred to, and the liability to peculiar abuses resulting from a sale thereof on commission, are such as to suggest the practical necessity for distinctive legislation on the subject—different from what would be expedient or necessary in the case of other property sold on commission—and to justify the legislature, in its discretion, in putting those who sell such articles on commission in a class by themselves. It was the evils which were thought incident to the sale of agricultural products and farm produce which evoked the law. Here was a class of merchants who . . . had peculiar opportunities to defraud, not common to other merchants, although they might sell on commission, and it was this class that the legislature proposed to put under restraint."

But in People v. Berrien Circuit Judge, 124 Mich. 664, 83 N. W. 594, 83 Am. St. Rep. 352, 50 L.R.A. 493, supra, the court in holding a statute to be unconstitutional said: "The act is . . . aimed solely at commission merchants who engage in the business of selling farm produce for producers upon commission. It provides that such a merchant shall pay a fee and execute a bond, as conditions precedent to doing business. The condition of the bond is the honest and faithful performance of his contracts. The business of buying and selling on commission has existed ever since commerce began. There are and always have been dishonest men engaged in it, as there are and always have been in every other branch of business. There are and always have been dishonest sellers, who will pack their produce in such a manner as to deceive. It would be as reasonable to require the latter to give bond to properly pack their produce. In every such case the common law provides an ample remedy for redress to the injured party for breach of contract. There is no more reason why a commission merchant should pay a license fee, and execute a bond to pay his debts and do his business honestly, than there is that any other merchant should pay a like fee, and file a like bond to properly do his business and pay his debts. The business requires no regulation, any more than any other mercantile pursuit. There is nothing in it hostile to the comfort, health, morals, or even convenience, of a community. It is carried on by private persons in private buildings, and in a manner no different from that in which the merchant selling hardware or groceries or dry-goods carries on his business. The law can find no support in the police power inherent in the state. . . . The legislature of this state is not empowered by the constitution to regulate contracts between its citizens who are engaged in legitimate commercial business, or to require any class of persons to pay a fee for the right to carry on business, or to give a bond to perform their contracts which other parties may choose to make with them. The constitution guarantees to citizens the right to engage in lawful business, unhampered by the legislative restrictions, where no restrictions are required for the protection of the public. We are compelled to hold this law void, because (1) it is class legislation and (2) it is an unjustifiable interference with the right of citizens to carry on legitimate business."

It would seem that an act regulating the business of commission merchants is not void as an improper interference with interstate commerce. In State v. Mohler, 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408, the court said: "The question concerning this act's interference with interstate commerce might well be left until some specific difficulty concerning such commerce arises, for it is familiar law that no act is ever declared to be unconstitutional except where the party challenging it is directly affected and prejudiced by some specific invasion of his constitutional rights. A commission merchant's business is that of a warehouseman and sales agent. As a warehouseman, his business is subject to state control notwithstanding the goods which he handles may be commodities of interstate commerce. . . . As a sales agent, the commission merchant is subject to state control although the commodities sold by him be of an interstate character. . . . Even if it were held that the Act of 1915 did not or could not apply to interstate commerce, the state's power over domestic or intrastate commerce is supreme. Certain it is that the federal government may not meddle with purely intrastate business, and it would hardly do to say that where there is a domestic business and an interstate business of the same nature the state may not regulate the domestic business because the federal government does not likewise and similarly regulate the competitive interstate business in the same territory. To admit that would be an end of all state government. . . . Sad indeed would be the situation of a poor truck gardener of the Kaw valley if he might not apply to some state or local official, but only to some bureau in far-off Washington, D. C., to learn whether John Doe was a licensed and trustworthy commission merchant to whom he might intrust his little stock of garlic and radishes for resale."

And in State v. Edwards, 94 Minn. 225, 102 N. W. 697, 69 L.R.A. 667, it was held that a statute providing for the keeping of records by commission merchants was not void as an interference with interstate commerce. The court therein said: "The law under consideration is assailed upon the ground that it is in violation of the federal constitution, as an interference with interstate commerce. . . . In the case before us, the consignor resided within the state, but, to our minds, that fact is not significant. The law applies to all shipments, from beyond as well as within the state. The object of the statute is to protect the public in its dealings with commission merchants against an infringement upon the rights of shippers of grain. Indeed, the law might be open to the objection of an unjust discrimination were its benefit conferred only upon the citizens of the state. The question of transportation is not involved. It is immaterial from whence the grain is shipped, over what route or through what states it travels to the point of destination. The provisions involved in this case take no account of the grain as an article of commerce until it has been sold, and, even then, only to require the consignee to make a true report of the transaction within a reasonable time. The subject-matter of the law as applicable to this case no more relates to interstate commerce than the criminal statutes which protect grain from larceny after arrival within the borders of the state. If it be an interference with the prerogative of Congress to require commission merchants to make a true report of their dealings with citizens of Dakota or Wisconsin for their protection, why is it not equally an interference with interstate commerce when our criminal laws are put in force to arrest and punish for the larceny of such grain upon arrival within the borders of our lines? We fancy there is no crying demand on the part of the citizens of our sister states to be excluded from the benefit of these protective measures."

In Kansas City v. Grush, 151 Mo. 128, 52 S. W. 286, it was held that a city having under its charter the power to license, tax and regulate "merchants" could not by ordinance tax produce dealers and exempt other merchants since by so doing a part of a class which could be legally taxed was singled out and thus the uniform taxation provision of the state constitution was violated.

The New York legislature has enacted a statute for the regulation and control of commission merchants doing business in farm produce which requires the payment of a license fee and the execution of a bond. (Agricultural Law, § 284.) See Huson v. Brown, 90 Misc. 175, 154 N. Y. S. 131. In that case it was held that the principal by giving the bond and receiving produce as a licensed commission merchant had effectually waived its right to attack the constitutionality of the act, and that the surety company stood in no better position than its principal.

Application of Rule.

In Lasher v. People, 183 Ill. 226, 55 N. E. 663, 75 Am. St. Rep. 103, 47 L.R.A. 802, the court sustained the Illinois statute which required the payment of an annual license fee by commission merchants in cities of more than 50,000 population dealing in "butter, eggs, poultry, game, dressed calf, green and deciduous fruits, berries, and other commodities, the product of the farm, with the exception of grains, live stock and dressed meats." The court said: "It is argued that the statute is invalid as discriminating between commission merchants, because it excepts those who deal in grain, live stock and dressed meats. The claim is, that produce commission merchants constitute a class, and that the legislature must require a license from all or none. This objection to the law is not valid. The legislature have power to form classes for the purpose of police regulation, if they do not arbitrarily discriminate between persons in substantially the same situation. The discrimination must rest upon some reasonable ground of difference, but the classification in this case is a natural one. The commission merchants dealing in the kinds of produce named in this act, which constitute the small products of the farm, are of a different class from those who transact business in the great markets for the sale of grain, live stock and dressed meats. The state laws for the inspection of grain provide for the protection of shippers in that market, and there is also state inspection of live stock and dressed meats. The law which classifies small commission merchants engaged in the produce commission business rests upon a reasonable ground as a basis for the classification. Such a business may afford great opportunities for swindling, and be productive of great abuses, and the legislature may properly enact a law applying to cities of such size as in the legislative judgment would permit the growth and existence of such abuses."

Statutory provisions requiring commission merchants to keep records of the sales of all consignments, and to account and report promptly to the consignor are valid. Lasher v. People, 183 Ill. 226, 55 N. E. 663, 75 Am. St. Rep. 103, 47 L.R.A. 802; State v. Mohler, 98 Kan. 465, 158 Pac. 408; State v. Wagener, 77 Minn. 483, 80 N. W. 633, 778, 1134, 77 Am. St. Rep. 681, 46 L.R.A. 442; State v. Edwards, 94 Minn. 225, 102 N. W. 697, 69 L.R.A. 667. Thus in State v. Mohler, supra, the court declared to be valid an exactment of the legislature of that jurisdiction providing as follows: "Every commission merchant must keep a complete record of all consignments received and sold by him, with the name of the consignor, date of receipt, kind and quality of the consignment, the price received, name and address of person to whom the goods are sold, and the items of expense, and this record must be forwarded to the consignor within forty-eight hours after the transaction unless otherwise agreed. Such a record shall also be kept by the commission merchant for one year, and shall be open to the inspection of the consignor and the secretary of state, board of agriculture or their agents." It was therein said: "Perhaps this has always been the law, for what is the relation of consignor and commission merchant but that of principal and agent, and what is the statutory requirement to account and report but the common-law duty of faithful and full disclosure to his principal of all the agent's doings? Illustrations are submitted in affidavits showing how onerous, burdensome, and expensive it would be to make a detailed account of the sales of a commission merchant. Thus a barrel of garlic is usually sold in small quantities, the remainder being kept in cold storage until called for. A carload of onions containing 470 crates is disposed of by the commission merchant to perhaps 400 different retail merchants. A barrel of radishes is usually sold in bunches of a few dozen. Many such illustrations are given, and while they do show that a strict compliance with the act will necessitate a good deal of bookkeeping, we cannot but marvel how commission merchants have kept track of all these details hitherto. Probably the legislature was convinced that they did not keep accurate accounts of these innumerable transactions—not through wilful breach of faith—but because it was not humanly possible for a man's memory to stand such a strain, and hence the legislative determination that the memory method, or whatever method it was, should be superseded by an accurate and detailed system of accounting. If this occasions an added expense to the business, the traffic will have to bear it."

A requirement that the bond given by the commission merchant shall be executed by a surety company, thus denying the right to deposit money or to give personal security, does not render the act unconstitutional. Ferguson-Hendrix Co. v. Fidelity, etc. Co. of Maryland, 79 Wash. 528, 140 Pac. 700, where in the court said: "It is well known that lapse of time, fluctuations in values of property, the uncertainty of human life, and the risk of a dishonest surety, often render personal security inadequate when called upon to meet its promised responsibility. This is doubtless one of the reasons which influenced the legislature in requiring that the bond be executed by a surety company authorized to do business in this state."

SOUTHWESTERN SURETY INSURANCE COMPANY.

Arkansas Supreme Court—January 25, 1915.

119 Ark. 12; 173 S. W. 398.

Fraudulent Conveyances — Consideration — Indemnity to Surety.

A surety who guaranteed performance of a contract may, upon furnishing the principal with advances necessary to enable him to carry out his contract, demand security, and other creditors of the principal cannot attack mortgages given or assignments made as in fraud of creditors.

Assignment — What Constitutes — Agreement between Debtor and Creditor.

Where the commissioners of an improvement district agreed to hold up payment until plaintiff's claim was satisfied, and the debtor consented, there is no assignment of the payment; plaintiff not being a party to the agreement.

Foreign Corporations — Authority of Court to Dissolve.

The courts of the forum have no authority to dissolve or wind up a foreign corporation: their powers being limited to taking charge of the property within the jurisdiction of the court and enforcing the rights of creditors there.

[See note at end of this case.]

Conflict of Laws — Existence of Corporation.

Whether a foreign corporation, doing business in the state and treated as a de facto going concern, has a legal existence, depends upon the laws of the state of its domicil.

Corporations — Forfeiture of Charter — Who May Assert Forfeiture.

Oklahoma statutes requiring corporations to pay a license tax for doing business, and providing that a failure shall work a forfeiture, being chiefly revenue measures, individuals dealing with an Oklahoma corporation cannot question the validity of its existence on the ground that it had not paid its tax.

Appeal from Crawford Chancery Court: FALCONER, Chancellor.

Action by W. S. Dickey, plaintiff, against Southwestern Surety Insurance Company et al., defendants. Judgment for named defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

L. H. Southmayd, New & Krauthoff and Frederic O. Berge for appellant.

Read & McDonough and G. A. Paul for appellee.

[15] McCULLOCH, C. J.—This case originated in the chancery court of Crawford County as an action instituted by appellant, W. S. Dickey, against the Oklahoma Engineering Company, a corporation domiciled in the State of Oklahoma, to subject assets of that corporation in this State to the payment of a debt owing by said corporation to appellant, and to cancel a mortgage and other securities executed by said Oklahoma Engineering Company to the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company, another foreign corporation. On July 8, 1912, the Oklahoma Engineering Company entered into a contract with an improvement district in the city of Van Buren, Arkansas, for the construction of sewers in that city, and appellee, at the instance of said Oklahoma Engineering Company, entered into obligation with the improvement district to guarantee performance of the contract on the part of the Engineering Company. The Engineering Company proceeded to perform said contract and purchased from appellant material to be used in the work of constructing the sewers. A balance in the sum of $1,646.69 is still due appellant on the account for the price of said material furnished. On November 27, 1912, the Engineering Company executed to appellee a mortgage on machinery and tools which it owned to secure advances of money which had already been made to it and to be thereafter made, and further to indemnify appellee company from loss on the aforesaid bond. About the same time, the Engineering Company made an assignment in writing to appellee of the amounts due upon estimates from the improvement district. Appellee was joined as defendant in the suit [16] and the prayer of the complaint was that said mortgage to appellee and the assignment of the amounts due upon estimates from the improvement district be cancelled and set aside as a fraud on the rights of appellant, and that the property be subjected to the payment of appellant's debt. Appellee filed an answer and cross-complaint, in which all the allegations of fraud were denied and a foreclosure of the mortgage was prayed for.

After the proof was taken, and before the submission of the case, appellant offered to file an amended complaint setting up the fact that the Engineering Company had forfeited its charter on June 30, 1912, by failing to pay the corporation tax in the State of its domicile, and asked that the three directors be substituted as defendants and held to account as trustees for the creditors of the corporation pursuant to the statutes of Oklahoma.

The case was heard upon the pleadings and the testimony, and final decree was rendered dismissing appellant's complaint as against the appellee and awarding to appellee a foreclosure of the mortgage and directing payment over of the funds paid into court under the assignment of estimates due from the improvement district.

(1) The evidence supports the finding that when appellee gave the bond to the improvement district to guarantee performance of the contract on the part of the Engineering Company, the latter undertook to indemnify appellee against loss. The contract of the Engineering Company with the improvement district provided for completion of the work on a certain date, and before that date it became apparent that the Engineering Company would not be able to complete performance of its contract. In order to protect itself from loss, appellee agreed to make advances of money to enable the Engineering Company to complete performance of the contract, and the mortgage and the assignments of estimates were executed to secure the amounts so advanced. The testimony is very voluminous and a strenuous effort has been made to show that improper motives prompted these transactions [17] between the Engineering Company and appellee, but we fail to find anything at all in the evidence which would warrant the conclusion that the transactions were in any wise tainted with fraudulent intention, or that the effect thereof was to cheat, hinder or delay the creditors of the Engineering Company. Appellee was already liable to the improvement district for the performance of the contract, and the agreement to make further advances was prompted alone by that obligation and to protect itself from loss. It certainly had a right to exact security from the Engineering Company, and there is no semblance of fraud in the transaction so far as we are able to discover from the evidence. Certainly, the form of the transaction did not operate as a wrongful interference with the assets of the corporation so as to amount to a hindrance or defeat of its creditors, and there is, as already stated, nothing in the evidence to show that there was any actual fraud intended. We fail to see any principle upon which the transactions could be declared to be fraudulent or that would warrant a court of equity in setting aside the security. The evidence is entirely too voluminous to justify an analysis and discussion in this opinion.

(2-3) It is contended that prior to the assignment, the amount due on one of the estimates was assigned or appropriated to the payment of appellant's debt and that it should not be included within the securities held by appellee. The facts upon which this claim is based are that some time prior to the time the mortgage and the assignment to appellee were executed, appellant, through his representative in Van Buren, insisted upon payment of his account, and the commissioners of the improvement district showed a disposition to hold back payment of an estimate until appellant's account should be paid. The sum of $500 was paid on the estimate to the agent of Engineering Company and there was an agreement that the balance should be held by the improvement district pending a settlement with appellant. There was no agreement, either express or implied, that the money should be appropriated to the payment of appellant's debt. The most [18] that can be made out of it was that the amount should be held up indefinitely until a settlement be made with appellant. This does not constitute an assignment of the amount in the hands of the improvement district nor an appropriation to the payment of appellant's debt. Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. 69, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 762. In the case just cited, the court said: "A mere promise, though of the clearest and most solemn kind, to pay a debt out of a particular fund, is not an assignment of the fund even in equity. To make an equitable assignment there should be such an actual or constructive appropriation of the subject-matter as to confer a complete and present right on the party meant to be provided for, even where the circumstances do not admit of its immediate exercise." Now, if the improvement district was being sued, there might be more force in the contention that the agreement to postpone payment until after settlement with appellant barred the right of the Engineering Company or its assignee to recover until after settlement with appellant; but there being no appropriation of this fund to the payment of appellant's debt, the parties to that agreement, namely, the improvement district and the Engineering Company, could have rescinded it at any moment and paid the money over to the Engineering Company or any one to whom it assigned the debt. It is not contended that appellant had any lien which he could assert against the improvement district, or that the money was held back for the purpose of enabling the improvement district to protect itself against any claim made by appellant. Appellant was not a party to that agreement, if it can be properly held in law to constitute a contract, and is therefore not in position to challenge the right of the Engineering Company or appellee, as its assignee, to collect the amount from the improvement district.

(4) The remaining question to be determined relates to the contention of appellant that the Engineering Company forfeited its right to exist as a corporation under the laws of Oklahoma, the place of its domicile, that the forfeiture resulted ipso facto from the failure to comply [19] with the statute with respect to the payment of a license fee, and that its property passed into the hands of the directors as trustees for the benefit of creditors. It is contended, on the other hand, by appellee, that under the Oklahoma statute the legal existence of the corporation could not be questioned collaterally and could only be drawn into question by a suit brought at the instance of the State of Oklahoma. The Engineering Company being a foreign corporation, the courts of this State have no right or authority to dissolve it and wind up its business, the courts of equity of this State being limited to taking charge of the property within the jurisdiction of the court and enforcing the rights of creditors here. Culver Lumber, etc. Co. v. Culver, 81 Ark. 102, 99 S. W. 391, 118 Am. St. Rep. 17; Federal Union Surety Co. v. Flemister, 95 Ark. 389, 130 S. W. 574. The Engineering Company existed de facto when all the transactions under review took place, and both parties to the present controversy dealt with it as a valid corporation and as a going concern, so to speak. Therefore, the question of the legal existence of the corporation depends upon the Oklahoma laws as interpreted by the courts of that State.

The statutes of Oklahoma provide that every corporation organized under the laws of the State and every foreign corporation doing business therein shall "procure an-nally from the Corporation Commission a license authorizing the transaction of such business in this State," that such corporation shall pay a license fee of fifty cents for each one thousand dollars of authorized capital stock, and that "every domestic corporation subject to the provisions of this act, who shall fail to file the annual statement and to pay the annual fees required by the provisions of this act for sixty days after the time provided therefor, shall forfeit its charter." Another section of the statute provides that in case of forfeiture, the directors of any domestic corporation or any foreign corporation doing business in the State "are deemed to be trustees of the corporation and all the stockholders and members of the corporation whose power or right to do business [20] is forfeited, and as such trustees shall have full power to settle the affairs of the corporation and to maintain or defend any such corporation, or to take such legal proceedings as may be necessary to finally settle the affairs of said corporation." Another section reads as follows: "The due incorporation of any company claiming in good faith to be a corporation under the laws of this State, and doing business as such, or its rights to exercise corporate powers cannot be inquired into collaterally, in any private suit to which such de facto corporation may be a party; but such inquiry may be had, and action brought at the suit of the State, in the manner prescribed in civil procedure."

The Supreme Court of Oklahoma, in the case of Higbee v. Aetna Bldg. etc. Assoc. 26 Okla. 327, 109 Pac. 236, after quoting the statutes above, said that the corporation involved in that controversy was doing business under the laws of that State and that "the regularity of its incorporation could not be inquired into in this proceeding." In a later case, Smith Rolfe Co. v. Wallace, 41 Okla. 643, 139 Pac. 248, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma reviewed the statutes relative to foreign and domestic corporations doing business in the State, and announced the rule that those statutes were designed chiefly for raising revenue and that it was not the intention of the Legislature to invalidate contracts made by delinquent corporations. That interpretation is binding on us here and we are of the opinion that the courts of this State would exceed their power and jurisdiction in declaring the charter of an Oklahoma corporation forfeited contrary to the statutes of that State as interpreted by its highest judicial tribunal.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that the powers of a state court with respect to a foreign corporation are limited to taking charge of property within its jurisdiction and enforcing the rights of local creditors. It has no power to pass on the question whether such a corporation has forfeited its charter by a failure to comply with a statute of the state of its incorporation. The power of a court over the internal affairs of a foreign corporation is discussed, with a specific treatment of the question of dissolution, in the notes to Babcock v. Farwell, as reported in 19 Ann. Cas. 74, and 137 Am. St. Rep. 284, and Van Dyke v. Railway Mail Assoc. Ann. Cas. 1913E 455.

Process — Exemption from Service — Member of Legislation.

Const. art. 4, § 14, exempting senators and representatives from arrest during the sessions of the general assembly, did not impliedly deprive the assembly of power to enact Practice Act (Laws 1907, p. 470), § 126, exempting members of the assembly from service of civil process during sessions of the assembly; since the constitution is not a grant of power to the legislature, but a limitation upon its powers.

Same.

Practice Act (Laws 1907, p. 470), § 126, exempting members of the general assembly from service of civil process during the sessions of the assembly, violates Const. art. 4, § 22, prohibiting the enactment of local or special laws granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise, as the constitutional inhibition applies, unless there is a sound basis in reason and principle for regarding the beneficiaries of the act as a distinct and separate class for the purpose of the particular legislation, and the statute is not based upon any actual, substantial difference in circumstances or condition between the members of the general assembly and other public officials of the state who in the performance of their official duties are required to spend a portion of their time in counties in which they do not reside, especially in view of Practice Act, § 66, providing for continuances until after the adjournment of the general assembly upon a showing that any party to any civil or criminal suit or proceeding is a member of either house of the general assembly.

Const. art. 4, § 14, exempting members of the general assembly from arrest, except for treason or felony, during sessions of the assembly, does not exempt them from service of civil process during such sessions.

Error to Superior Court, Cook county:
GOODWIN, Judge.

Action by Edward L. Phillips, plaintiff, against Lee O'Neil Browne, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Shepard, McCormick, Thomason & Patterson for plaintiff in error.

Frank D. Ayers and Samuel Alschuler for defendant in error.

[451] COOKE, J.—Plaintiff in error, Edward L. Phillips, brought his action in trespass in the superior court of Cook county on November 4, 1911, against defendant in error, Lee O'Neil Browne. The declaration consisted of one count and was in the usual form of a declaration in trespass for assault and battery. To this declaration the defendant in error filed a special plea in abatement, in which it was averred that the defendant in error was a resident of LaSalle county; that at the time the said suit was commenced he was a duly elected member of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois; that prior to the commencement of the suit the Governor of Illinois convened a special session of the legislature, which continued until November 14, 1911; that defendant in error, as a member of the General Assembly, was present and took part in the deliberations of said special session; that the summons in this cause was served upon him during said special session and while defendant in error was present in Cook county; that there is in force in the State of Illinois a certain statute, being section 126 of an act in relation to practice and procedure in courts of record, which is as follows: "Any member of the General Assembly shall be exempt from the service of any civil process during the session of the General Assembly;" that by virtue of said statutory provision, and by reason of the fact that at the time of the said service of summons upon him defendant in error was a member of the General Assembly and a session of the same was then in existence, he was not subject to service of process in this cause, and that therefore the superior court of Cook county did not have jurisdiction of the defendant in error. To this plea plaintiff in error interposed a general demurrer, which was overruled. Plaintiff in error having elected to stand by his demurrer, judgment was entered against him for costs, and this writ of error has been sued out to review that judgment.

[452] It is contended that the section of the statute set out in the plea, being section 126 of an act in relation to practice and procedure in courts of record (Laws of 1907, p. 470), is unconstitutional; and further, that that section has no application to a special session of the legislature. The contention of plaintiff in error is, that said section 126 contravenes section 14 of article 4 of the constitution, which is as follows: "Senators and representatives shall, in all cases, except treason, felony or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during the session of the General Assembly, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place." The argument advanced in support of this contention is, that when the constitution expressly conferred this immunity it impliedly limited the right of the legislature to extend the exemption further than provided by the constitution itself. This contention cannot be sustained. That our constitution is not a grant of power but is a limitation upon the power of the General Assembly is too well recognized to require the citation of authority. This provision of the constitution constitutes no exception to the general rule.

Said section 126 does, however, contravene section 22 of article 4 of the constitution, which provides that "the General Assembly shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: For . . . granting to any corporation, association or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise whatever." Section 126 singles out a particular class of public officials and grants to the individual members of that class special immunity from the service of civil process during the periods when they are actually and theoretically engaged in the performance of their official duties. In Sanitary Dist. v. Bernstein, 175 Ill. 215, 51 N. E. 720, we said: "Every citizen has an equal right with every other to resort to the courts of justice for the settlement and enforcement of his rights, [453] and it is true that a discrimination between different classes of litigants, which is merely arbitrary in its nature, is a denial of that right and of the equal protection of the law."

The members of the General Assembly constitute but a portion of the public officials chosen to transact the business of the State, and we perceive no good reason why they should be singled out as immune from service of civil process while engaged in the line of their duty any more than the members of any other class of public officials. If the purpose of the provision is to prevent suits being brought against members of the General Assembly in foreign counties into which they may be required to go in the performance of their official duties, then the law applies only to a portion of the public officials of this State who are at times required to leave their home counties to perform their official duties. While for some purposes the members of the General Assembly may be properly considered as in a class by themselves, it needs no extended argument to show that they cannot be regarded as in a class by themselves for all purposes of legislation. Thus, it would hardly be contended that the statute which granted to members of the legislature, as a class, more liberal exemptions from levy and sale under execution than those granted to other citizens of the State, would be valid. That the statute operates uniformly upon all members of a class created as the beneficiaries of the act is not the sole test to be applied, but in order to avoid the constitutional inhibition last above quoted it must also appear that there is a sound basis, in reason and principle, for regarding the class of individuals as a distinct and separate class for the purpose of the particular legislation. In People v. Adams County, 185 Ill. 288, 56 N. E. 1044, we said: "A class cannot be created by arbitrary declaration of the law-making power and endowed with special legislative favors. It is essential to the validity of the classification, in such instances, it shall be based on material distinctions in the situation and circumstances of the individuals who are to be embraced [454] therein, and the grounds of distinction and classification must have relation, in reason and principle, to the privileges proposed to be granted to the individuals, as a class, by the proposed legislation." Again, in Jones v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 231 Ill. 302, 83 N. E. 215, 121 Am. St. Rep. 313, it was said: "When a law is made applicable only to one class of individuals, however, there must be some actual, substantial difference between the individuals so classified and other individuals in the State or community, when considered with reference to the purposes of the legislation. The class, if the law confers a benefit upon it, must be composed of individuals possessing in common some disability, attribute or qualification, or in some condition marking them as proper objects in whom to vest the specific right granted unto them." To the same effect are People v. Kewanee Light, etc. Co. 262 Ill. 255, 104 N. E. 680; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Doyle, 258 Ill. 624, 102 N. E. 260, and numerous other cases decided by this court.

The creation of a class of public officials, consisting solely of members of the General Assembly, upon whom the legislature confers immunity from the service of civil process while engaged in the performance of official duties is not based upon any actual, substantial difference in circumstances or condition between the members of the General Assembly and other public officials of the State who in the performance of their official duties are required to spend a portion of their time in counties in which they do not reside. It may well be that as statutes exempting firemen and certain others from jury service, and like statutes, are valid, so an act intended to prevent the compulsory attendance of members of the General Assembly upon court during sessions of the legislature would not violate the constitutional provision above quoted, the duties of members of the legislature being so dissimilar from those of any other class of public officials of the State as to warrant legislation preventing their compulsory attendance upon court during sessions [455] of the legislature while not extending the same immunity to other public officials. Such, however, is not the purpose of said section 126, as is clearly apparent from the fact that if a member of the General Assembly should be served with process of summons before the beginning of the session requiring him to appear in court at some fixed time during the session, or if, after having been served with process of summons prior to the session, his case is set for trial during such session, section 126, supra, would furnish no excuse or justification for not appearing in court at the time so fixed. On the contrary, section 66 of the Practice act takes care of this situation by providing that in all suits or proceedings, either civil or criminal, at law or in equity, pending in any court of this State at any time when the General Assembly is in session, it shall be sufficient cause for a continuance if it shall appear to the court by affidavit that any party applying for such continuance is a member of either house of the General Assembly and in actual attendance on its sessions, and on the filing of such affidavit the court shall continue such suit, and when so continued no trial or other proceeding shall be had thereon until ten days after the adjournment of the General Assembly.

Section 126 of the Practice act is not in conflict with said section 14 of article 4, but it is in conflict with said section 22 of that article, and is therefore invalid.

It is urged by defendant in error that even in the absence of said section 126 of the Practice act he is entitled to exemption from the service of process in this case under said section 14 of article 4 of the constitution, for the reason that the exemption from arrest granted by that article of the constitution should also be held to include exemption from service of civil process, and in support of this contention he cites Anderson v. Rountree, 1 Pin. (Wis.) 115; Doty v. Strong, 1 Pin. (Wis.) 84; Miner v. Markham, 28 Fed. 387; Bolton v. Martin, 1 Dall. 296, 1 U. S. (L. ed.) 144; and Geyer v. Irwin, 4 Dall. 107, 1 U. S. (L. ed.) 762. These cases hold, in substance, that the [456] words "privileged from arrest," will not be construed in a confined or literal sense, and that the member of a legislative body to whom the privilege is extended is entitled to exemption from service of process although the same is not accompanied with the arrest of his person. The great weight of authority is against this proposition, and we are of the opinion that the cases holding to the contrary are supported by the better reasoning. Among the cases holding that privilege from arrest does not constructively include exemption from the service of civil process, are Merrick v. Giddings, MacArthur & M. (D. C.) 55; Johnson v. Offutt, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 20; Cattlett v. Morton, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 122; Rhodes v. Walsh, 55 Minn. 542, 57 N. W. 212, 23 L.R.A. 632; Berlet v. Weary, 67 Neb. 75, 2 Ann. Cas. 610, 93 N. W. 238, 108 Am. St. Rep. 616, 60 L.R.A. 609; Worth v. Norton, 56 S. C. 56, 33 S. E. 792, 76 Am. St. Rep. 524, 45 L.R.A. 563; Gentry v. Griffith, 27 Tex. 461; McPherson v. Nesmith, 3 Grat. (Va.) 237; Kimberly v. Butler, 16 Pittsb. Leg. J. 11, 1 Chi. Leg. N. 245, 3 Am. L. Rev. 777, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,777; Howard v. Citizens' Bank, etc. Co. 12 App. Cas. (D. C.) 222. We concur in the holding in those cases that the exemption granted is an exemption from arrest with a view to imprisonment, and nothing else.

It will not be necessary to consider the other point urged.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the superior court is reversed and the cause is remanded to that court, with directions to sustain the demurrer.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

CRAIG, J. (dissenting)—Under the rule for determining the constitutionality of a statute we should hold the statute constitutional unless we are satisfied that it is unconstitutional beyond all reasonable doubt. This rule particularly applies to the statute in question, which affects certain privileges which the General Assembly has seen fit to grant to the members thereof the better to facilitate their work. Section 22 of article 4 of the constitution provides: "The General Assembly shall [457] not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases: . . . Granting to any corporation, association or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise whatever." The constitution does not prohibit the granting of a special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise by general law,—the prohibition is against doing so by a local or special law. The constitution, by article 3, expressly divides the powers of the government of the State into three distinct departments,—the legislative, executive and judicial. This, in itself, is a classification by the fundamental law of the State, and places the members of the legislative department, constituting the General Assembly, in a class by themselves, distinct from other State officers. Aside from this the classification is not arbitrary, and there are good reasons for holding the law in question valid and necessary.

In Munn v. People, 69 Ill. 80, section 22 of article 4 of the constitution is quoted, and with respect to its meaning it is there said (p. 85): "The inhibition extends only to passing special laws for such purpose. But the law in question is general in its objects, operative throughout the State, and confers no immunity or special exclusive privilege or franchise upon any individual, association or corporation. It deals with an existing business closely associated with the great agricultural interests of the State and seeks to regulate it by law. This is the whole scope of the act."

The point in question is the distinction between "local," "special" and "general" laws. A local law is defined in People v. Wilcox, 237 Ill. 421, 86 N. E. 672 (on page 424), as being a law which relates to only a portion of the territory of the State, and it is said the word "special" is more appropriately applied to laws that grant some special right, privilege or immunity to some portion of the people of the State less than all. In People v. People's Gas Light, etc. Co. 205 Ill. 482, 68 N. E. 950, 98 Am. St. Rep. 244, it was held that the act of 1897, authorizing merger of gas companies in the same city, was not violative of section [458] 22 of article 4 of the constitution, prohibiting special laws granting exclusive privileges to any corporation, association or individual, for the reason that it applied to all gas companies doing business in the same city. On page 494 of the opinion, with respect to whether or not a law is special, it was said: "These laws are general and uniform, not because they operate upon every person in the State, for they do not, but because every person who is brought within the relations and circumstances provided for is affected by the laws. They are general and uniform in their operation upon all persons in the like situation, and the fact of their being general and uniform is not affected by the number of those within the scope of their operation."

Laws public in their objects may be confined to a particular class of persons if they be general in their application to the class to which they apply, provided the distinction is not arbitrary but rests upon some reason of public policy growing out of the condition or business of such class. Such distinctions are being constantly made, as in cases of infants, married women, laborers, heads of families, common carriers and the like. For example, it may be public policy to give laborers a lien or other preference for the collection of their wages not given to other creditors, or give a lien to laborers in some one line of employment while it would be neither practicable nor policy to give it to laborers in other employments. Laws which provide that the homestead to the value of $1000 to the head of a family and $400 in personal property shall be exempt from forced levy and sale for debt have never been questioned. Section 4 of chapter 78, entitled "Jurors," exempts certain persons and public officers from jury service, and if the act in question is unconstitutional then that act also must be held unconstitutional. So long as a law applies equally to all engaged in that kind of business, treating them all alike, subjecting them to the same restrictions and giving [459] them the same privileges under similar conditions, it is public in its character and not subject to the objection of being partial or unequal legislation, provided, of course, as already stated, the distinction made is based on some reason of policy and is not purely arbitrary. Potwin v. Johnson, 108 Ill. 70; People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 388; People v. Martin, 178 Ill. 611, 53 N. E. 309; Dawson Soap Co. v. Chicago, 234 Ill. 314, 14 Ann. Cas. 1131, 84 N. E. 920; People v. Nellis, 249 Ill. 12, 94 N. E. 165; People v. Kaelber, 253 Ill. 552, 97 N. E. 1068.

Section 126 of the Practice act is not a special law granting an exclusive privilege or immunity to an individual. Every member of the legislature or any individual elected to that office has certain powers and duties, and, it may be said, certain special privileges common and necessary to that office. Among these is the right to a voice and vote in the enactment of laws, the right to receive a salary and certain perquisites, the right to a seat in the branch of the General Assembly to which elected, and to the use of the capital building. Under the constitution every member is privileged from arrest except for certain offenses. Section 66 and 126 merely bestow those privileges which the law-making power has deemed necessary and incidental to properly performing the duties of that office. They cannot be said to be exemptions to an individual who has no public duties to perform. They are exemptions pertaining to the office, bestowed on all those, as a class, who hold such office. The fact that other officers of the State have not been granted such an exemption is no reason why members of the General Assembly should not be allowed that privilege. There is so great a difference between members of the General Assembly and other State officers as to qualifications, tenure, residence and general duties that it would be impossible to place them all in one classification for all purposes. Many of the other State officers are provided with assistants and a considerable office force, so that the business of their respective offices goes on in case of an [460] enforced absence. But this is not true of members of the General Assembly. They must be personally present during the sessions and cannot delegate their votes and the proper performance of their duties to others. Other State officers would be exempt from service during the whole of their terms of office, while members of the General Assembly, —representatives elected for terms of two years and senators for four years,—would not be exempt from the service of process during the whole of their terms of office, but, on the contrary, for only a part of such terms, viz., while legislature is in session. It is undoubtedly the intent of all laws governing the procedure of the legislature that the members should go into session, transact the necessary business of that body and adjourn, and not remain in continuous session. They should not be harassed by lawsuits and compelled to absent themselves from the sessions of the legislature when the actual presence of each member is necessary in order that all the people may have representation.

It is difficult to see how section 126 is contrary to section 22 of article 4 of the constitution unless section 66 is also and for the same reason contrary to the constitution. It cannot be said that a right to a continuance merely because the party to a suit, or his attorney, is a member of the General Assembly is not a privilege or immunity just as much as the exemption of a member of the General Assembly from the service of civil process while the General Assembly is in session. The constitutionality of section 66 has never been questioned. It has frequently been construed by this court, and we have held that it is error to refuse to continue a case on application where the party applying for a continuance has brought himself within the provisions of the section. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Teters, 68 Ill. 144; Chicago Public Stock Exch. v. McLaughry, 148 Ill. 372, 36 N. E. 88; Ware v. Jerseyville, 158 Ill. 234, 41 N. E. 736.

NOTE.

Service of Civil Process upon Members of Legislature.

A full review of the earlier cases on the discussing of the service of civil process on a member of a state or the national legislature, while the legislature is in session may be found in the notes to Berlet v. Weary, 2 Ann. Cas. 610, and Worth v. Norton, 76 Am. St. Rep. 524.

The reported case holds that a provision in a state constitution exempting members of the legislature from arrest does not include an exemption from service of civil process; and it further holds that an act of the legislature providing that "any member of the general assembly shall be exempt from the service of any civil process during the session of the general assembly" is unconstitutional and invalid, as being in conflict with the constitutional inhibition against the passing of local or special laws granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise.

A decision in apparent conflict with the principle enunciated in the reported case was made, however, in the recent case of Walsh v. Mooney, 33 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 214, wherein it was held that a statute of Ohio privileging members of the general assembly from answering to certain suits, and staying proceedings in those suits during the sessions of the general assembly, together with a statute exempting members from arrest during a session of the assembly, operated to render members of the general assembly privileged or exempt from service of civil process, during a session of the legislature. In that case the court said: "Our attention is directed to art. 2, sec. 12, of the constitution, to R. S. 5031 (Gen. Code 11278), and to R. S. 5457-5459 (Gen. Code 11754-11756). It is said in behalf of the defendant in error here that the action of the court of common pleas was fully justified by R. S. 5031 (Gen. Code 11278), which reads as follows: 'A member of the senate or house of representatives, or any officer of either branch of the general assembly, shall be privileged from answering to a suit instituted against him in a county other than the one in which he resides, upon a cause of action which accrued ten days before the first day of the session of the general assembly of which he is an officer or member. All proceedings in actions to which such a person is a party shall be stayed during such session, and the time necessarily employed in going thereto and returning therefrom.' Counsel for the plaintiff in error contend that this section amounts to no more than a privilege to a member of the house or of the senate from filing an answer in the case in which he is thus sued; that it does not relieve him from being served with summons and required at a later time to answer, but only suspends the time which he must answer, and our attention in support of this proposition is directed to the sections I have mentioned, R. S. 5457 (Gen. Code 11754) and incidentally R. S. 5458 and particularly R. S. 5459 (Gen. Code 11756). R. S. 5457 (Gen. Code 11754) is the section of the statute that enumerates the persons who are exempt from arrest. It has seven subdivisions, and the first mentions the members, clerks, sergeants-at-arms, doorkeepers and messengers of the senate and the house during the session of the senate or house and during the time they travel either way in attending the sessions, allowing twenty-five miles per day, etc. The second subdivision mentions electors attending and returning from election, and the third, judges of court while attending court, and the time necessarily employed in going and returning; the fourth, officers of the court, including attorneys, counselors at law, clerks, sheriffs, coroners, constables and criers, and all suitors and jurors and witnesses; the fifth, females and soldiers of the Revolutionary war; sixth, Israelites, and persons observing the last day of the week, etc., and seventh, persons of the militia during the time they are on duty and going and returning therefrom. R. S. 5458 prescribes the places in which arrest shall not be made—the senate and the house and a court in session. R. S. 5459 is the general section that prescribes that none of the foregoing privileges shall apply in certain instances, and says: 'Nothing in this subdivision contained shall be construed to extend to cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace, or to privilege any persons herein specified from being served at any time with a summons or notice to appear; and all arrests, not contrary to the provisions herein contained, made in any place, or in any river or water course within or bounding upon this state, shall be deemed lawful.' The particular part of the section to which our attention is directed is, 'or to privilege any persons herein specified from being served at any time with a summons or notice to appear,' and it is said that unless effect be given to this language and the service in this case sustained by reason of this language in R. S. 5459 (Gen. Code 11756), then the language must be held to have no effect in the statute at all. Our attention has been called to but one case in Ohio which supports the action of the court of common pleas, and counsel on behalf of the plaintiff in error contend that it is not a controlling authority and really of no weight in consideration of the question presented here. This section of the statute, R. S. 5457 (Gen. Code 11754), is the only section of the statute which provides for this privilege from arrest, and it might appear upon a hasty reading of the section that it refers to nothing but arrest; but an examination of the question will show that that is not the case. [Here the court reviews cases holding a suitor and a lawyer to be privileged from service of process by the statutes in question]. . . . It will be observed that this section, R. S. 5459, follows all the provisions exempting parties from arrest, one of the seven subdivisions of R. S. 5457; and it would look, as I have said, upon first reading, as though while those parties thus enumerated are all exempt from arrest, none of them would in effect be exempt from the service of summons, and no very good reason appears why a suitor or witness or a lawyer or any of the other parties enumerated in these seven subdivisions, with the exception of two, should be exempt from arrest and be exempt from summons if the members of the legislature should not. They are all put on the same ground, and the first persons enumerated as being exempt are the persons mentioned as members of the legislature. They are exempt from arrest and it would seem as if the legislature had made ample provision in those sections which have long been upon the statute book to prevent the arrest or the summoning of a legislator while attending the session or while going or returning from it. But in addition to that we find R. S. 5031 (Gen. Code 11278) specifically provides that they shall be exempt during the session from answering to any cause of action which accrued more than ten days prior to the opening of the session. It seems to us that the sections of the statute which I have mentioned, and taken in connection with the two cases which I have cited, clearly indicate that the legislature did not intend to provide that a member of the senate might be relieved from the duty of answering some petition filed against him in a county other than his residence until the session had closed and he had returned home, and then he must answer; but the section, we think, clearly indicates that during the session, or during the period necessary to travel to and return from the session, and especially when the matter in question is a cause of action which arose more than ten days before the beginning of the session, as mentioned in R. S. 5031, the privilege is that he will not be summoned at all, and that no legal summons can be served upon him, excepting of course in the county of his residence, and therefore we conclude that the action of the court of common pleas must be affirmed in quashing the service."

The principle of the ruling of the reported case is sustained, however, by the case of Worth v. Norton, 56 S. C. 56, 33 S. E. 792, 76 Am. St. Rep. 524, 45 L.R.A. 563, wherein it was held, by a divided court, that the language of the Federal Constitution (art. 1, § 6; 8 Fed. St. Ann. 331) providing that senators and representatives shall "be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses" did not extend to a grant of privilege against the service of civil summons and that, even if it did, that privilege would not apply to a member absent with leave from a session of Congress, on private business.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

United States Supreme Court—December 4, 1916.

242 U. S. 153; 37 S. Ct. 28.

Food — Validity of Regulation — Percentage of Butter Fat in Ice Cream.

State statutes which prohibit the sale as "ice cream" of a product containing less than a fixed percentage of butter fat do not take property without due process of law nor deny the equal protection of the laws—the particular percentages fixed not being so exacting as to be in themselves unreasonable—although the ice cream of commerce is not iced or frozen cream, but is a frozen confection, varying in composition, and under some formulas may be made without either cream or milk.

[156] BRANDEIS, J.—These cases were argued together. In each a state statute which prohibits the sale of ice cream containing less than a fixed percentage of butter-fat is assailed as invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment; the Supreme Court of each State having held its statute constitutional. State v. Hutchinson Ice Cream Co. 168 Ia. 1, 147 N. W. 195; Com. v. Crowl, 245 Pa. St. 554, 91 Atl. 922. Iowa makes 12 per cent. the required minimum; Pennsylvania 8 per cent. The material provisions of the several statutes are copied in the margin.¹

[157] The right of the State under the police power to regulate the sale of products with a view to preventing frauds or protecting the public health is conceded by plaintiffs in error. And they do not contend that the particular percentages of butter-fat set by Iowa and Pennsylvania are so exacting as to be in themselves unreasonable. Thirteen other States have by similar legislation set 14 per cent as the minimum; five other States 12 per cent; only eight States have fixed a percentage as low as Pennsylvania; and [158] the United States Department of Agriculture has declared 14 per cent to be standard.² The main objection urged is this: To require that ice cream, in order to be legally salable, must contain some butter-fat is a regulation so unreasonable and arbitrary as to be a deprivation of property without due process of law and a denial of the equal protection of the laws. To support this contention the following trade facts are shown:

The ice cream of commerce is not iced or frozen cream. It is a frozen confection—a compound. The ingredients of this compound may vary widely in character, in the number used and in the proportions in which they are used. These variations are dependent upon the ingenuity, skill and judgment of the

"SECTION 2. Ice cream shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this act—

"First. If it shall contain boric acid, formaldehyde, saccharine, or any other added substance or compound that is deleterious to health.

"Second. If it shall contain salts of copper, iron oxide, ochres, or any coloring substance deleterious to health: Provided, That this paragraph shall not be construed to prohibit the use of harmless coloring matter in ice cream, when not used for fraudulent purposes.

"Third. If it shall contain any deleterious flavoring matter, or flavoring matter not true to name.

"Fourth. If it be an imitation of, or offered for sale under, the name of another article.

"SECTION 4. No ice cream shall be sold within the State containing less than eight (8) per centum butter fat, except where fruit or nuts are used for the purpose of flavoring, when it shall not contain less than six (6) per centum butter fat."

maker, the relative cost at a particular time or at a particular place of the possible ingredients, and the requirements of the market in respect to taste or selling price. Thus, some Philadelphia Ice Cream is made of only cream, sugar and a vanilla flavor. In making other Philadelphia Ice Cream the whites of eggs are added; and according to some formulas Vanilla Ice Cream may be made without any cream or milk whatsoever; for instance by proper manipulation of the yolks of eggs, the whites of eggs, sugar, syrup and the vanilla bean. All of these different compounds are commonly sold as ice cream; and none of them is necessarily unwholesome.

Plaintiffs in error contend that as ice cream is shown to be a generic term embracing a large number and variety of products and the term as used does not necessarily imply the use of dairy cream in its composition, it is arbitrary and unreasonable to limit the ice cream of commerce to that containing a fixed minimum of butter-fat. But the legislature may well have found in these facts persuasive [159] evidence that the public welfare required the prohibition enacted. The facts show that in the absence of legislative regulation the ordinary purchaser at retail does not and cannot know exactly what he is getting when he purchases ice cream. He presumably believes that cream or at least rich milk is among the important ingredients; and he may make his purchase with a knowledge that butter-fat is the principal food value in cream or milk. Laws designed to prevent persons from being misled in respect to the weight, measurement, quality or ingredients of an article of general consumption are a common exercise of the police power. The legislature defines the standard article or fixes some of its characteristics; and it may conclude that fraud or mistake can be effectively prevented only by prohibiting the sale of the article under the usual trade name, if it fails to meet the requirements of the standard set. Laws prohibiting the sale of milk or cream containing less than fixed percentages of butter-fat present a familiar instance of such legislation. Cases in the state courts upholding laws of this character are referred to in the margin.¹ This court has repeatedly sustained the validity of similar prohibitions. Schmidinger v. Chicago, 226 U. S. 578, Ann. Cas. 1914B 284, 33 S. Ct. 182, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 364; Armour v. North Dakota, 240 U. S. 510, Ann. Cas. 1916D 548, 36 S. Ct. 440, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 771.

It is specially urged that the statutes are unconstitutional because they do not merely define the term ice cream; but arbitrarily prohibit the sale of a large variety of wholesome compounds theretofore included under the name ice cream. The acts appear to us merely to prohibit the sale of such compounds as ice cream. Such is the construction given to the act by the Supreme Court of Iowa. [160] State v. Hutchinson Ice Cream Co. 169 Ia. 1, 15, 147 N. W. 195, which is of course binding on us. We cannot assume, in the absence of a definite and authoritative ruling, that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania would construe the law of that State otherwise. The conviction here under review was for selling the "compound" as ice cream, so that we are not called upon to determine whether the State may in the exercise of its police power prohibit the sale even of a wholesome product, if the public welfare appear to require such action—and if, as here, interstate commerce is not involved. See Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 685, 8 S. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 253; Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, 15, 18 S. Ct. 757, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 49.

In view of the conclusion stated above, it is unnecessary to consider whether the statutes are or are not sustainable as health measures; and upon this we express no opinion.

The judgment in each case is Affirmed.

State or Municipal Regulation of Ice Cream.

Introductory, 645.
State Regulation, 646.
Municipal Regulation, 647.

Introductory.

Although the cases involving state or municipal regulation of milk and cream are numerous, few cases are to be found on the regulation of ice cream. There have been many statutes enacted in recent years, however, prescribing a standard percentage of butter fat for ice cream. These are substantially similar to the statutes fixing the same kind of standard for milk and cream, which have received frequent judicial interpretation. In State v. Hutchinson Ice Cream Co. 168 Ia. 1, ¹ State v. Schlenker, 112 Ia. 642, 84 N. W. 698, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 51 L.R.A. 347; State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 13 Atl. 585, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419; People v. Bowen, 182 N. Y. 1, 74 N. v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 164, 30 Atl. 648, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339, 26 L.R.A. 541; Com. v. Wheeler, 205 Mass. 384, 18 Ann. Cas. 319, 91 N. E. 415, 137 Am. St. Rep. 456; St. Louis v. Grafeman Dairy Co. 190 Mo. 507, 89 S. W. 627, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 926; State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344.

147 N. W. 195, it appeared in evidence that in 1914 no less than twenty-seven states had enacted regulations prescribing a minimum percentage of butter fat in ice cream sold or offered for sale.

State Regulation.

The legislature may, under its police power, enact laws for the purpose of preventing fraud in the sale of ice cream. Therefore a statute establishing a reasonable standard percentage of butter fat which shall be contained in any article sold as ice cream, the statute not being a health measure to maintain the purity of the product, but being merely an exercise of the police power to prevent fraud and deception, is within the police power of the state and offenses against neither state nor federal constitutions. State v. Hutchinson Ice Cream Co 168 Ia. 1, 147 N. W. 195; Com. v. Crowl, 245 Pa. St. 554, 91 Atl. 922, affirming 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 539. And see the reported case, wherein the United States Supreme Court sustains the two foregoing decisions, and holds that the statutes of Iowa and of Pennsylvania involved therein are constitutional, not taking property without due process of law, and not denying the equal protection of the law.

The case of State v. Hutchinson Ice Cream Co. supra, involved the validity of a state statute defining ice cream, fruit ice cream, and nut ice cream, and forbidding the sale of any product as ice cream if it contained less than twelve per cent butter fat, and of any product as fruit or as nut ice cream if it contained less than ten per cent butter fat. It was agreed that the fixing of that standard was not a health regulation, and the only question involved in the case was whether the statute could be supported as a valid police power regulation to prevent fraud in the sale of food. Holding that it was reasonable and a valid regulation, the court, after a full review of the evidence, said: "Notwithstanding these conflicting opinions, it was a question for the legislature to say whether this legislation was called for. The legislature was not compelled to take the view of either those who favor or oppose a standard. Taking one view of it, conditions were such as to clearly sustain the action of the legislature. We are not entirely satisfied that this would not be so if conditions were as claimed by the defendants. We are not to say, and do not, of course, determine that these defendants, or the association appearing in argument, or any particular person is or has been guilty of any fraud or deception. The question is whether, without a standard, dishonest or unscrupulous manufacturers may do so. It is not practicable by any ordinary inspection for the purchaser to distinguish cheaper, low grade ice cream from the better quality. Because of this, it is apparent from the matters which we have detailed that an opportunity is afforded for deception by selling an inferior quality of ice cream at the price of a better or more expensive grade. This was the case in the sale of oleomargarin. State v. Armour Packing Co. 124 Ia. 323, 2 Ann. Cas. 448, 100 N. W. 59. In this respect, it differs from the case of Frost v. Chicago, 178 Ill. 250, 52 N. E. 869, 69 Am. St. Rep. 301, 49 L.R.A. 657, where it was held that a person who is ordinarily careful and intelligent could not be deceived by a netting covering for baskets of fruit. In such case, the purchaser could still see and know what he was buying. The purpose of the act in question was to prevent just such deception and fraud as would be possible without a standard, and it seems to us it cannot be seriously claimed that the statute will not accomplish the end sought. It is said by defendants that they are deprived of the right to sell their product if it contains a less per cent of butter fat than that prescribed by the statute and that the sale of such is entirely prohibited. This, we think, is an assumption not warranted. They may sell it for what it really is. Possibly it would sell as readily if it is named and sold as frozen skim milk, if not, this would be an additional argument for prohibiting the sale of so-called ice cream made from evaporated skim milk as ice cream."

In Com. v. Crowl, 245 Pa. St. 554, 91 Atl. 922, affirming 52 Pa. Super. Ct. 539, it was held that a statute was valid which prescribed that "no ice cream shall be sold within the state containing less than eight per centum of butter fat, except where fruits or nuts are used for the purpose of flavoring, when it shall not contain less than six per centum of butter fat." The court said: "We are only concerned . . . with the inquiry whether a statute which fixes a standard of quality for ice cream is within the police power. The purpose of the act was to suppress false pretenses and to secure honest dealing in the sale of an article of food. That ice cream is in general use is admitted; that it is largely composed of milk and cream is shown by the evidence in the case. Its name implies the use of cream in its composition, and all of the authorities to which the learned counsel for the appellant refer show that milk and cream are constituents in its composition. It enters so largely into the food supply of the public as to have become a proper subject of legislation, especially in view of the opportunities which its manufacture affords to practice imposition. In the popular understanding it is largely composed of milk of which butter fat is an important constituent. If by the exercise of ingenuity and by the practice of unwarranted thrift a product can be put on the market having the name and appearance of ice cream but lacking the chief element which gives it value as an article of food, a large opportunity would be afforded to dealers in that article to profit by deception and it is the opportunity for such deceit of which the police power takes notice and seeks to take away. It is not necessary that injury has been done or a wrong perpetrated. The possibility that such results may take place warrants legislative intervention under the police power. We are not concerned with the wisdom of legislation under this power. Our only inquiry is whether the power exists. . . . It is not a successful denial of the exercise of these powers to say that the prohibited article is wholesome and not injurious to the consumer. The wholesomeness of the prohibited thing will not render the act unconstitutional. The temptation to fraud and adulteration may be a consideration leading to regulative or prohibitive legislation. If it were not so courts would become the triers of the expediency of such legislation and the authority which the people committed to the legislature would be transferred by judicial action to the courts. Where a statute is clearly and palpably violative of the constitution it is the duty of the courts to declare it invalid in the respects in which it is repugnant to this supreme law, but the presumptions are all in favor of the validity of legislative enactments and the burden is on him who asserts the contrary to make it clear beyond doubt that the constitutional power has been exceeded. It has been the policy of this state to legislate on the subject of milk and milk products, and statutes have been enacted which made it unlawful for any person to sell milk which contained less than a fixed percentage of butter fat and less than a fixed percentage of milk solids; making it unlawful to sell cream which contained less than a fixed percentage of butter fat; which classified cheese and fixed the percentage of butter fat which the various classes of cheese should contain; and similar legislation has been enacted in other states. State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 13 Atl. 585, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419; Com. v. Waite, 11 Allen (Mass.) 264, 87 Am. Dec. 711; State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344. Legislation of a like character is found in the Act of May 21, 1901, P. L. 275, forbidding the sale of vinegar which contains less than four per cent of absolute acetic acid. If the sale of pure milk containing less than three and one-fourth per cent of butter fat may be prohibited it is not apparent why the same principle does not apply to ice cream. . . . The integrity of the act is not affected by the provision that where fruits and nuts are used for flavoring, six per cent of butter fat shall be required in ice cream.

It is obvious that the addition of fruits and nuts to a given quantity of ice cream would diminish the percentage of butter fat, and it was apparently a consideration of this fact which caused the distinction between ice cream flavored with extracts and that to which nuts or fruits were added. No discrimination is made between individuals or preference given to particular manufacturers by this legislation and no substantial reason is advanced which would make such a regulation destructive of the whole statute."

Municipal Regulation.

The regulation of ice cream as a foodstuff, and of the sale thereof, so far as is necessary for the prevention of adulteration and the presence of impurities or other things likely to affect the health of those using it, is within the police power of a municipality, without a grant by the state of specific authority to make that regulation. Where an ordinance making that manner of regulation is passed without express authority of the legislature, however, the courts may inquire into its reasonableness, and to that end may hear testimony. Therefore, in a prosecution under an ordinance requiring a certain standard in ice cream offered for sale, evidence that ice cream which falls below the required standard is equally wholesome, and just as good, from a sanitary standpoint, as that which complies with the requirement, is admissible on the question of the reasonableness of the regulation. Rigbers v. Atlanta, 7 Ga. App. 411, 66 S. E. 991, wherein the court said: "The complaint against the defendant's ice cream was not that it was impure or that it contained deleterious substances, or that it was likely to affect the public health, but that it was not rich enough in butter fats. The defendant, for the purpose of showing the invalidity of the ordinance as a health measure, offered to prove that the presence of this amount of butter fats was not essential to the ice cream's being healthful—that the ice cream he was selling was just as good, from a sanitary standpoint, as ice cream of the character prescribed by the ordinance would be. This evidence was admissible. The rule is that where an ordinance is not passed by express authority of the legislature, the courts may inquire into its reasonableness, and to that end may hear testimony."

A municipal regulation prescribing that ice cream sold or kept for sale must contain at least ten per cent of butter fat for plain ice cream is unreasonable and void, since it is not directed to the wholesomeness of the ice cream, but only to its richness, and absolutely prohibits the sale of a product of less than the prescribed richness, without any reference to whether it is wholesome, and since it does not merely prohibit the sale of ice cream as ice cream when below the standard, but prohibits its sale entirely under any name or designation. Rigbers v. Atlanta, supra, wherein it was said: "It will be noticed that under this ordinance the prohibition is not against selling ice cream of less than the prescribed percentage, as ice cream, but against selling it at all. Though the seller distinctly informs the purchaser that the ice cream contains less butter fats than ten per cent, the sale is unlawful, according to the ordinance. Even if the city has the power to prescribe that no ice cream of less than a certain percentage of richness in butter fats shall be sold as standard ice cream, it still would not have the power to say that ice cream below that standard should not be sold at all. For instance, it might be permissible to say that the term 'ice cream,' or 'standard ice cream,' or 'first-class ice cream,' should relate only to ice cream of a certain prescribed richness, and that whoever sold ice cream of poorer quality should either by calling it under some other name, or by indicating on the vessel in which it is delivered, or otherwise, disclose the inferiority of its quality. But under the ordinance before us, if a physician desired that a patient should have ice cream, but did not deem it safe for him to take the richer ice cream it would be illegal for anyone to furnish the grade of ice cream actually suited to the sick man's physical condition. The court is willing to give every encouragement within legitimate bounds to the public authorities in their laudable effort to protect the public not only against unsanitary food products, but also against adulteration, frauds, and impositions in the sale of food products, and where the question is doubtful, the doubt will be solved in favor of the regulation; but to say that in a city the size of Atlanta no one shall under any circumstances, or for any purpose, sell any ice cream containing less than ten per cent butter fats is so unreasonable that the ordinance cannot be upheld, where the city's power to pass it rests solely upon the authority of the general welfare clause of its charter."

In Syracuse Ice Cream Co. v. Cortland, 153 App. Div. 456, 138 N. Y. S. 338, there was involved a city ordinance providing as follows: "No person who is the owner, lessee, or occupant of any restaurant, saloon, hotel, boarding house, cafe, ice cream rooms, or of any store or place whatsoever, who shall purchase milk or cream from any person or corporation that has not obtained a license as hereinafter provided, shall use, sell, or dispose of any milk, cream, or ice cream, unless and until such owner, lessee, or occupant shall first have obtained a license or permission so to do from this board, as hereinafter provided." It was held that the ordinance did not require a license to sell ice cream unless it was made from milk or cream purchased from local dealers, and that it therefore required no license to sell ice cream manufactured in another city. The court said: "The plaintiff manufactures ice cream at Syracuse, and seeks to sell the same in Cortland without a license from the board of health of the city of Cortland. It is the contention of the city authorities that under the provision of the sanitary code cited this cannot be done by a local dealer in the city of Cortland without himself obtaining a license therefor, inasmuch as plaintiff is without a license. As I read the provision of the code cited the case in question is not intended to be included therein. While ice cream is mostly milk or cream, nevertheless it is in fact a manufactured article, with other ingredients, as sugar and flavoring. Section 33 of the sanitary code, above quoted, requires the local dealer to have a license to sell 'milk, cream, or ice cream' only in case he buys 'milk or cream' from some unlicensed dealer. Within the section itself, therefore, would seem to be an indication that the board of health did not consider ice cream as included within the terms 'milk or cream.' From the milk or cream that they should buy they could not make ice cream and sell it unless the persons from whom the milk or cream was furnished were duly licensed to sell. No provision seems to have been made for a license to sell ice cream, except where such ice cream be made from milk or cream purchased by the local dealer. That this was so understood by the board of health itself would seem to be indicated by the fact that of the blanks furnished for obtaining licenses, no blank was furnished appropriate for obtaining a license by an ice cream manufacturer. By section 34 of the sanitary code an application for a license is required to be made upon a blank furnished by the city clerk. It is significant that upon an application to the city clerk the only blank that he had was a blank appropriate to one selling milk and cream only from his own dairy, or purchased from other dairies. If section 33 of the sanitary code were originally intended to require a license from one selling ice cream, appropriate blanks would undoubtedly have been supplied to the city clerk, upon which the application for such license could be made."

FRANKLIN FARMERS' CO-OPERATIVE TELEPHONE COMPANY ET AL.

Maine Supreme Judicial Court—February
12, 1915.

113 Me. 46; 92 Atl. 934.

Telegraphs and Telephones — Crossing Public Highway — Necessity of Permit.

Rev. St. c. 55, § 17, providing that corporations or individuals engaged in operating telephones shall not construct lines "upon and along" highways and public roads without permission from the selectmen of towns, etc., forbids the placing of telephone wires across the highways, etc., by persons not so authorized, since the word "across" is synonymous with the words "upon and along."

Statutes — Construction of Adopted Statute.

Where the legislature adopts a provision from the statutes of another state, it must be assumed that it was familiar with its interpretation there and adopted it with the statute.

[See note at end of this case.]

Nuisance — What Constitutes — Telephone Wires Erected over Highway without Permission.

Under Rev. St. c. 55, § 17, providing that telephone lines shall not be constructed upon or along highways or public roads without written permission from the selectmen of towns, etc., specifying the method of locating the wires, and declaring wires so erected to be legal structures, but not declaring those otherwise maintained to be nuisances, the wires of an unauthorized company and of private individuals maintaining lines to connect therewith, running eighteen to twenty-two feet above the ground, and not interfering with public travel, do not constitute a nuisance, and will not be enjoined.

On report from Supreme Judicial Court,
Kennebec county.

Action by Mount Vernon Telephone Company, plaintiff, against Franklin Farmers' Co-operative Telephone Company et al., defendants. Case reported to Law Court on agreed statement of facts. The facts are stated in the opinion. DISMISSED.

Williamson, Burleigh & McLean for complainants.

W. R. Pattangall for defendants.

[47] PHILBROOK, J.—This is a proceeding in equity. Among the defendants named in 113 Me. 46.

the bill is the Kennebec Farm and City Telephone Company, but by agreement of parties the bill has been dismissed without costs as to that company, thus leaving as defendants the Franklin Farmers' Co-Operative Company and certain individuals all of whom are residents of Vienna in the County of Kennebec.

The plaintiff company, admittedly, has conducted and is conducting a telephone business in the towns of Vienna and Mount Vernon, and in other towns in said Kennebec County, and has the right to erect poles and wires, and construct its lines, under written permits from the Selectmen of Vienna, upon, along, over and across the various highways and public roads in said town of Vienna.

The plaintiff avers that neither the defendant company nor the individual defendants, have any lawful authority to erect telephone lines or to set poles, or string wires upon, along, over, under, or across any of the highways and public roads in said town of Vienna, but that notwithstanding such lack of authority the defendants have set poles, strung wires and constructed telephone lines upon, along, over and across the highways and public roads of the said town of Vienna, and intend to further extend said telephone lines upon, along, over and across the highways and public roads of said town of Vienna. The plaintiff avers that the poles and wires thus erected by the defendants are upon private lands, and follow the highways of Vienna for the most part, but say that at certain points these wires are strung from poles on private land on one side of the highway, to poles on private land on the other side, and are thus strung "across" the highways. It is also averred that the wires of the defendants cross those of the plaintiff at certain places and thereby seriously damage and interfere with them.

The defendants do not deny the erection of poles and wires as alleged by the plaintiff but say they are acting within their legal rights, since they are on private land, and further say that they are [48] not inhibited by law from stretching wires "across" a public highway from pole to pole standing on such private lands on opposite sides of the highway.

The plaintiff asks this court by injunction to prevent the defendants from conducting a telephone business over any lines where any part of them "are constructed upon, along, over, under or across any of the highways and public roads of said town of Vienna;" also to prevent the defendants "from erecting any posts, or poles, or stringing any wires, or constructing telephone lines upon, along, over, under or across any of the highways and public roads of said town of Vienna."

The case comes to us on report for decision upon the bill, answer, and the following agreed statement of facts:

"It is admitted that A. W. Hall, Frank French, Ernest French, Samuel Gordon, Corry Dunn, R. E. Swift, William Richards, L. L. Riggs, Abbie Hall and Frank Roberts have partially erected and propose to complete and maintain a private telephone line in the town of Vienna connecting their several homes each with the other, the poles being set on private land and the wires running from pole to pole over private land except that at certain points said wires connecting poles across the highways at points from twenty to twenty-three feet above the surface thereof. The above named defendants are also connected by contract with the said Franklin Farmers' Co-Operative Telephone Company and thence with the outside world.

It is agreed that if the erection and maintenance of said wires by the above named defendants in the manner above described is illegal or constitutes a nuisance, this bill shall be sustained against these defendants, nominal damages shall be assessed by the court and an injunction issued against them as prayed for, otherwise the bill to be dismissed as to said above defendants.

It is admitted that the Franklin Farmers' Co-Operative Telephone Company has erected and now maintains and proposes to maintain a telephone line in the town of Vienna, the poles being set on private land and the wires running from pole to pole over private land except that at certain points said wires connecting said poles cross the highways at points from eighteen to twenty-two feet above the surface thereof, and it is agreed that if the erection and maintenance of said wires in the manner above described is illegal and constitutes a nuisance this bill shall be sustained against said Franklin Farmers' [49] Co-Operative Telephone Company nominal damages to be assessed by the court and an injunction issued against them as prayed for, otherwise this bill to be dismissed as to said company.

If the court find the wires as erected and maintained and proposed to be erected and maintained constitute a nuisance, it is agreed that the plaintiff has suffered special damage because of said wires, but if the court find that said wires do not constitute a nuisance the plaintiff makes no claim of special damage."

As a fundamental proposition on which to base this proceeding the plaintiff calls our attention to R. S. Chap. 55, Sec. 17, which forbids not only corporations engaged in the telephone business, but also individuals engaged in such business, from constructing lines "upon and along" highways and public roads without permission in writing from mayor and aldermen, in case of cities, from selectmen, in case of towns, or from county commissioners, in case of plantations and unorganized townships, specifying the kinds of poles to be used, where and how they are to be located and set, and the height of the wire above the ground. The defendants reply as already suggested that their wires are "across" the highways and public roads, and that the words "upon and along" are not synonymous with or equivalent to the word "across." With reference to the meaning of these terms in this particular statute it is significant to note that we borrowed the same from the statutes of Massachusetts in the year eighteen hundred eighty-five. Only a year before that time the Supreme Court of that State in Banks v. Highland Street R. Co. 136 Mass. 485, said "In this statute, the word 'upon' includes crossing a way by the wires." We must assume that our legislature was familiar with this interpretative ruling and adopted it when the statute in question was passed. We also adopt it and declare that in the statute, under consideration the word "upon" includes crossing a way by the wires. This disposes of one contention of the defendants, for we have no hesitation in saying that the erection and maintenance of the defendants' wires across the highways and public ways, in the manner admitted, were contrary to law.

Conceding this illegal erection and maintenance of defendant's wires, can the plaintiff prevail in this cause. In other words has this court jurisdiction in equity upon motion of this plaintiff to enjoin such maintenance or to forbid future action of the same kind.

[50] The plaintiff claims that these wires constitute a nuisance and assigns this claim as the chief ground of equity jurisdiction in its behalf as evidenced by the agreed statement. Wires thus erected and maintained are not declared by statute to be nuisances. Wires and poles erected and maintained in accordance with statute provisions are declared by R. S. Chap. 55, Sec. 17, to be deemed legal structures, and the plaintiff urges that we should hold by inference that those not erected and maintained in accordance with statute provisions are nuisances. But the statute is in derogation of the common law and must be construed strictly; it cannot be enlarged by implication. Houlton v. Titcomb, 102 Me. 272, 66 Atl. 733, 120 Am. St. Rep. 492, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580. The plaintiff relies upon the last named case in support of its contention as to nuisance but in doing so overlooks the fact that the statute in that case had expressly declared buildings, erected contrary to an ordinance then under consideration, to be nuisances. The application made by the plaintiff to this case, where the wires have not been declared, by law to be nuisances, obviously fails. The case of Lang v. Merwin, 99 Me. 487, 50 Atl. 1021, 105 Am. St. Rep. 293, cited by plaintiff, it is also in-applicable for the same reason. In that case injunction was sought to restrain the use of a gambling machine, a thing declared by statute to be a nuisance. In support of its claim that wires erected and maintained, as in this case, are nuisances, the plaintiff also cites Banks v. Highland Street R. Co. supra, claiming that case to hold "that a wire across a street, being erected contra to the provision of a statute similar to ours, was a nuisance;" but a more careful examination shows that an employee was carrying the wire, looped across the street, and the court said "the wire, at least while looped across the street, so that it might be hit by passing carriages, was a nuisance, which any person lawfully traveling on the way, and incommoded by it, might remove." A state of affairs so materially different from the case at bar cannot be said to throw light on this discussion.

The wires of the Franklin Company, one of the defendants, appear to have been in use for eight years, at a height of from eighteen to twenty-two feet from the surface of the ground, and nothing has been introduced in the record to show that they have in any way interfered with or obstructed public travel. The wires erected, and proposed to be erected, by the individual defendants, are from twenty to twenty-three feet from the ground. We cannot say as matter of law that these wires of either the Franklin Company or the individual [51] defendants constitute a nuisance, nor has the plaintiff satisfied us that they have been declared so by any statute, city ordinance or town by-law.

Failing to find that these wires constitute a nuisance, as erected and maintained, we must dismiss the bill in accordance with the stipulation of the parties in the agreed statement. Since the erection and maintenance of the wires across highways and public ways are in violation of law we think the defendants should not recover costs.

Bill dismissed as to all defendants.

1. RULE STATED.

While the construction given to an adopted statute in the state of its origin is not conclusive in another jurisdiction (Ancient Order of Hibernians v. Sparrow, 29 Mont. 132, 1 Ann. Cas. 144) it has long been a settled rule of statutory construction that where a statute has been adopted from another state or country, it will be presumed that the legislature of the adopting state intended the adopted statute to receive the same construction which had already been given to it in the state or country from which it was adopted. A large number of recent cases uphold that rule.

Thus in Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Pew, 109 Va. 288, 64 S. E. 35, the court said: "It is a familiar rule in the interpretation of statutes, that where a foreign statute, which has received the construction of the courts of the state from which it comes, has been incorporated into the statute law of this state, it will be presumed that the legislature likewise adopted the construction placed upon the statute by the courts of the foreign state." And to the same effect, see State v. Kennedy, 60 Ore. 232, 118 Pac. 1023, wherein the court said: "The rule is well settled that when a statute of another state has been adopted in Oregon the construction placed upon the act by the court of last resort of the state from which the law was borrowed, made prior to the enactment in this state, controls the interpretation herein."

It has been said that the prior construction in the originating state is binding on the courts of the adopting state. Le Bosquet v. Myers, 7 Indian Terr. 75, 103 S. W. 770; J. B. Bostic Co. v. Eggleston, 7 Indian Terr. 134, 104 S. W. 566. However, in other jurisdictions, it has been held that while the decisions in the originating state are entitled to great weight, Fertig v. State, 14 Ariz. 540, 133 Pac. 99; Devine v. Healy, 141 Ill. App. 290; In re McNicol, 215 Mass. 497, 102 N. E. 697, L.R.A. 1916A 306; Clay v. Edwards, 84 N. J. 221, 86 Atl. 548; State v. Fulk, 96 Ark. 316, 131 S. W. 694; Russell v. Jordan, 58 Colo. 445, Ann. Cas. 1916C 760, 147 Pac. 693; In re Hunnewell, 220 Mass. 351, 107 N. E. 934; Preston Nat. Bank v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 142 Mich. 272, 105 N. W. 757; State v. Carter, 257 Mo. 52, 165 S. W. 773; Joplin Supply Co. v. Smith, 182 Mo. App. 212, 167 S. W. 649; State v. Meath, 884 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11; and ordinarily should be followed, State v. Martin, 87 Neb. 529, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1125, 127 N. W. 896; Rose v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 1, 83 S. E. 85, L.R.A. 1915B 358; yet, the courts of the state wherein a foreign statute has been adopted, are not bound to follow the construction placed on the statute by the courts of the originating state or country, Luken v. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. 248 Ill. 377, 21 Ann. Cas. 82, 94 N. E. 175, 140 Am. St. Rep. 220; State v. Campbell, 73 Kan. 688, 9 Ann. Cas. 1203, 85 Pac. 784, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 533; Preston Nat. Bank v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 142 Mich. 272, 105 N. W. 757; Ex p. Bowes, 8 Okla. Crim. 201, 127 Pac. 20; In re McKennan, 25 S. D. 369, 126 N. W. 611, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 606; Pierson v. Minnehaha County, 26 S. D. 462, Ann. Cas. 1913B 386, 128 N. W. 616; State v. Rimmer, 131 Tenn. 316, 174 S. W. 1134. Thus in the case last cited the court said: "We prefer our interpretation of this statute to that of the Kentucky courts, though it be admitted the act was taken from the Kentucky law, which is not entirely apparent. And conceding that the interpretation by the courts of the state from which our act is taken is entitled to great consideration, there is no binding effect to it." And in State v. Meath, 84 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11, it was said: "We have treated the question as original or of first instance in this court, fully mindful of the rule that when one state adopted the laws or constitutional provisions of another state, it is generally held that constructions of the adopted law go along with it. This is an accepted rule and is supported by many cases and text writers, but no cases go so far as to hold that such rule is imperative or binding. Such constructions are persuasive but not conclusive."

In Bliss v. Caille Bros Co. 149 Mich. 601, 12 Ann. Cas. 513, 113 N. W. 317, it was held that the rule that the adoption of a foreign statute carried with it the prior foreign construction, could not take away from the courts of the adopting state the power to determine a particular rule of common law in force in the adopting state. The court said: "It is true our statute was adopted from the state of New York, and that when adopted here it had received judicial interpretation by the courts of that state. . . . But the judicial interpretation which can be said to be binding upon the courts of this state extended only to the point of determining that the statute must be aided by the common law. The particular rule of common law adopted and in force in this state is not to be determined authoritatively by courts of another state."

The construction by the courts of the originating state need not necessarily be a pronouncement by the highest court of the originating state. Clay v. Edwards, 84 N. J. L. 221, 86 Atl. 548, wherein it appeared that a New York statute relating to collateral inheritance taxation was adopted in New Jersey, and that it had previously been construed by a New York surrogate's court. The court stated the reason for its holding as follows: "Although the decisions referred to are not the pronouncements of the highest court of the state, the fact that surrogates deal largely and exclusively with matter relating to the estates of deceased persons qualifies them with expert knowledge of the subject, and coupled with the further facts that no appeal was taken from either decision, and that the construction placed on the words 'husband of a daughter,' as contained in the Act of 1885, by the surrogates, to the effect that they include the surviving husband of a deceased daughter and that the circumstance that the husband has remarried does not deprive him of this right to the exemption under the act, yet nevertheless the legislature of the state of New York, in view of all this, in enacting the tax law of 1909 made no change in that regard, but left the phrase 'husband of a daughter' undisturbed. The words 'husband of a daughter' having been thus judicially determined, as to their meaning, by the decisions referred to for more than twenty years prior to the passage of the Act of 1909, and so far as it appears (there being no decision to the contrary) acquiesced in by the bench and bar of that state, afford confirmatory and contemporaneous evidence of their meaning."

2. EXCEPTIONS TO RULE.

a. Meaning of Statute Clear and Obvious.

The rule that the adoption of a foreign statute carries with it the prior construction in the originating state, has been held to be applicable only where the terms of the statute are of doubtful import, so as to require construction. Territory v. Chong Chak Lai, 19 Hawaii 437; Public Service R. Co. v. Commissioner, 81 N. J. L. 363, 80 Atl. 27. Thus it has been held that the rule is not applicable where the meaning of the statute is too plain to make it necessary to seek the meaning placed on the statute by the courts of the originating state. Torrance v. Edwards (N. J.) 99 Atl. 136.

b. Variations between Statutes.

Where there is a material variance between the original and the adopted statute, the courts of the adopting state will not follow the construction of the courts in the originating state. Copper Queen Consol. Min. Co. v. Territorial Board of Equalization, 206 U. S. 474, 27 S. Ct. 695, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 1143; People v. Godding, 55 Colo. 579, 136 Pac. 1011; Public Service R. Co. v. Board of Public Utility, 81 N. J. L. 363, 80 Atl. 27. In the case last cited, the court said: "To adopt the construction given by an extra-territorial court to an act subsequently adopted in another state, so that the construction thus given may be read into the act as part of it, the statute must appear to be the same in its entirety."

However it has been held that it is not essential that the adopted statute shall be a literal copy of the one from the foreign state; but it is necessary to bring it within the rule, only that the substance of a statute or some controlling word had been borrowed from a foreign state. State v. Miles, 210 Mo. 127, 109 S. W. 595.

c. Variations between Constitutions.

The rule that the adoption of a foreign statute carries with it the prior construction in the originating state is not applicable where the foreign construction is not in harmony with the constitution of the adopting state. Hutchinson v. Krueger, 34 Okla. 23, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 98, 124 Pac. 591, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315; Western Terra Cotta Co. v. Board of Education, 39 Okla. 716, 136 Pac. 595; Boyd v. C. L. Ritter Lumber Co. (Va.) 89 S. E. 273. In the case last cited the court said: "It is insisted here for the defendant in error that when a constitutional provision is ordained, or a statute enacted by another state, and it is ingrafted into the constitution or statutes of this state, and prior thereto such constitutional provision or statute had received judicial construction by the courts of such other state, then it is to be presumed that the lawmaking power of this state intended that the constitutional provision or statute should be given the same construction in this state that it was given in the state from which it was taken. This principle of construction, however, applies only to the construction of constitutional provisions and statutes, and has no relation, as the authorities hold, to the question of whether or not a statute is constitutional and valid. In other words, the legislature, by enacting a statute which has been held constitutional and valid by the courts of another state, cannot deprive the courts of this state of the right to determine for themselves the question of the constitutionality of such statute."

Likewise when the constitutional reasons which governed the decision in the originating state are lacking in the adopting state, the construction will not be followed. Copper Queen Consol. Min. Co. v. Territorial Board of Equalization, 206 U. S. 474, 27 S. Ct. 695, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 1143.

d. Amendment before Adoption.

In Hutchinson v. Krueger, 34 Okla. 23, Ann. Cas. 1914C 98, 124 Pac. 591, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315, it was held that a prior construction by the courts of the originating state, would not be followed by the courts of the adopting state, where the statute had been materially changed by amendment, after the decisions construing it and before adoption. And in Slaughter v. Moore, 9 Del. Ch. 350, 82 Atl. 963, it was held that the rule that if one state adopts a statute theretofore enacted in another state it adopts also the judicial construction put thereon by the courts of the latter state did not apply where, previous to the adoption, the legislature of the originating state had passed a supplemental law which did not show whether it was a change of legislative purpose or an interpretation of that purpose.

e. Doubtful Origin of Statute.

It would seem that the rule that the adoption of a foreign statute carries with it the prior construction in the originating state is not applicable when the origin of the statute is doubtful. See Torrance v. Edwards (N. J.) 99 Atl. 136.

f. Erroneous Construction.

A construction of a statute by the courts of the originating state will not be followed by the courts of the adopting state if they are clearly of the opinion that it is erroneous. State v. Campbell, 73 Kan. 688, 9 Ann. Cas. 1203, 85 Pac. 784, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 533; Torrance v. Edwards (N. J.) 99 Atl. 136; Dow v. Simpson, 17 N. M. 357, 132 Pac. 568; Ex parte Baines, 8 Okla. Crim. 201, 127 Pac. 20; Pierson v. Minnehaha County, 26 S. D. 462, Ann. Cas. 1913B 386, 128 N. W. 616; State v. Meath, 84 Wash. 302, 147 Pac. 11. See also Deer Lodge County v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. 42 Mont. 315, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1010, 112 Pac. 1060. In Pierson v. Minnehaha County, supra, the court said: "This court should not, under any circumstances, be bound or required to follow what it deems to be an erroneous construction placed upon a foreign statute by a foreign court, any more than we should be required to follow an erroneous decision of our own court."

g. Contrary Construction in Other States.

The construction placed on an adopted statute by the courts of the state from which it is adopted will not be followed by the courts of the adopting state, where the adopted statute exists in other states and the construction by the courts of the originating state is contrary to the weight of authority in such other states. People v. Godding, 55 Colo. 579, 136 Pac. 1011; Sutton v. Heinze, 85 Kan. 332, 116 Pac. 614, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 239; Hutchinson v. Krueger, 34 Okla. 23, Ann. Cas. 1914C 98, 124 Pac. 591, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315; Western Terra Cotta Co. v. Board of Education, 39 Okla. 716, 136 Pac. 595; Ex parte Bowes, 8 Okla. Crim. 201, 127 Pac. 20. In Sutton v. Heinze, supra, the court said: "The rule as to the binding effect of a decision rendered prior to the adoption of a statute is not absolute. It does not apply 'where other jurisdictions having the identical or substantially the same provision has given the language a different construction prior to the adoption in question.' . . . This must be especially true where the court of the adopting state itself had already rendered a contrary decision under a statute essentially similar."

h. Denial of Substantial Right.

It would seem that the construction by the courts of the originating state will not be followed by the courts of the adopting state, if the application of the decision would lead to a denial of a substantial right. See Deer Lodge County v. U. S. Fidelity, etc. Co. 42 Mont. 315, Ann. Cas. 1912A 1010, 112 Pac. 1060.

i. Construction Contrary to Policy of Adopting State.

The construction placed on an adopted statute by the courts of the state wherein it originated will not be followed when that construction is contrary to the spirit and policy of the jurisprudence of the adopting state. Penn Bridge Co. v. New Orleans, 222 Fed. 737, 138 C. C. A. 191; Great Western Sugar Co. v. F. H. Gilcrest Lumber Co. 25 Colo. 1, 136 Pac. 553; Rhoads v. Chicago, etc. Co. 227 Ill. 328, 10 Ann. Cas. 111, 81 N. E. 371, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 623; People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313; State v. Campbell, 73 Kan. 688, 9 Ann. Cas. 1203, 85 Pac. 784, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 533; Moore v. O'Leary, 180 Mich. 261, Ann. Cas. 1916A 373, 146 N. W. 661; Hutchinson v. Krueger, 34 Okla. 23, Ann. Cas. 1914C 98, 124 Pac. 591, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315; Western Terra Cotta Co. v. Board of Education, 39 Okla. 716, 136 Pac. 595; Ex parte Bowes, 8 Okla. Crim. 201, 127 Pac. 20; Smith v. Dayton Coal, etc. Co. 115 Tenn. 543, 92 S. W. 62, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1180; State v. Rinmer, 131 Tenn. 316, 174 S. W. 1134. See St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Freeman (Ark.) 179 S. W. 648. See also Suburban Ice Co. v. Industrial Board, 274 Ill. 630, 113 N. E. 979; Clay v. Edwards, 84 N. J. L. 221, 86 Atl. 548. In Smith v. Dayton Coal, etc. Co. 115 Tenn. 543, 92 S. W. 62, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1180, the court said: "It may be stated as a general rule that, when a statute of another state is adopted, the judicial construction and interpretation of that statute in the state of its origin is also imported and written in the statute by the adopting state. This rule, however, is subject to the important qualification that the judicial construction of said statute by the state of its origin does not contravene the well-established policy prevailing on said subject in the adopting state."

II. Subsequent Construction in Originating State.

Where the construction of a statute in the originating state does not take place until after the statute has been adopted in another state, the courts of the adopting state are not bound to follow that construction. Cordova v. Folgueras y Rijos, 227 U. S. 375, 33 S. Ct. 350, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 556; Poe v. Poe (Ark.) 188 S. W. 1190; Rhoads v. Chicago, etc. Co. 227 Ill. 328, 10 Ann. Cas. 111, 81 N. E. 371, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 623; Goodell v. Yezeriski, 170 Mich. 578, 136 N. W. 451, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 516; Wyoming Coal Min. Co. v. State, 15 Wyo. 106, 87 Pac. 337, 984, 123 Am. St. Rep. 1014. In Goodell v. Yezeriski, 170 Mich. 578, 136 N. W. 451, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 516, the court said: "It is an established rule of construction that the adoption of a statute of a sister state is presumed to have been had with reference to the previous construction given to such statute by the courts of such state" [citing cases]. This rule is not absolutely imperative. Stellwagen v. Wayne Probate Judge, 130 Mich. 166 (89 N. W. 728). The rule, however, can have no application in the instant case, because the statute under consideration did not receive judicial construction in Massachusetts until long after its adoption by this state. The decision in that state should receive just that consideration as authority to which it would be entitled under ordinary circumstances."

However, it has been said that subsequent decisions are entitled to great consideration, Cordova v. Folgueras y Rijos, 227 U. S. 375, 33 S. Ct. 350, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 556. See also Lerch v. Missoula Brick, etc. Co. 45 Mont. 314, Ann. Cas. 1914A 346, 123 Pac. 23; and are very persuasive, Poe v. Poe (Ark.) 188 S. W. 1190; Wyoming Coal Min. Co. v. State, 15 Wyo. 97, 87 Pac. 337, 984, 123 Am. St. Rep. 1014. But see Marx v. Hefner (Okla.) the case reported immediately following, wherein it is held that a subsequent construction in the originating state, in direct conflict with the settled law of the adopting state, is not even persuasive authority.

MARX ET AL.

v.

HEFNER.

Oklahoma Supreme Court—May 18, 1915.

46 Okla. 453; 149 Pac. 207.

Foreign Laws — Pleading and Proof.

Where a contract is made in a foreign state, and the laws of such foreign state are relied upon for a recovery, such laws of the foreign state must be pleaded and proved.

[See 113 Am. St. Rep. 870.]

Conflict of Laws — Legality of Contract.

Where a contract in a foreign state is sought to be enforced in another state, the lex loci contractus controls the question of the legality of the contract, unless otherwise provided in the contract, and the laws of the state where the contract was made will be observed, in determining the rights and obligations of the parties, and effect given thereto, unless such foreign laws are irreconcilable with the local laws, or in conflict with the established policy of the enforcing state, provided that such laws of the foreign state are pleaded and proved.

[See 5 R. C. L. tit. Conflict of Laws, p. 931.]

Statutes — Construction of Adopted Statute — Construction Subsequent to Adoption.

A decision of the supreme court of Arkansas, rendered since the laws of Arkansas were extended over the Indian Territory, where in direct conflict with the settled law of this state, "is not even persuasive."

[See note at end of this case.]

Foreign Laws — Presumption.

Where a contract, made in a foreign state, is sought to be enforced in this state, unless the laws of the foreign state be pleaded and proved, it will be presumed that the laws governing the rights of the parties under such contract are the same as the laws of this state.

[See 1 Ann. Cas. 459, 113 Am. St. Rep. 880.]

Territories — Effect of Territorial Laws after Statehood — Prior Contracts.

The laws of Arkansas, which were extended over the Indian Territory, are in force in this state as to rights arising under contracts entered into in the Indian Territory prior to statehood, and said laws of Arkansas need not be pleaded or proved.

Infants — Actions — Necessity for Guardian.

Neither under an action upon an express contract, nor upon a quantum meruit, can a recovery be had against a minor in an action at law for an attorney's fee for legal services rendered in behalf of a minor in relation to his property, without the intervention of a legal guardian, as such legal services cannot be classed as a "necessary," under the meaning of section 886, Rev. Laws 1910.

Legal Services as Necessaries.

A petition which seeks a recovery against a minor for legal services rendered in regard to his estate upon an express contract, or upon a quantum meruit, based upon a contract made in a foreign state, which does not plead the lex loci contractus of the contract, showing such services are classed as a "necessary," does not state a cause of action.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to District Court, Carter county: RUSSELL, Judge.

Action by R. A. Hefner, plaintiff, against Moses Marx et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. REVERSED.

[454] This is an action, brought by defendant in error, hereinafter called "plaintiff," against plaintiffs in error, hereinafter called "defendants," to recover for legal services rendered in securing the enrollment of defendants as minor Mississippi Choctaw Indians. The contract for said services was entered into and the services rendered prior to statehood. This action was instituted August 30, 1910, tried to a jury, resulting in a verdict against each of said minor defendants in the sum of $1,000. Motion for new trial was filed within the time prescribed by law, overruled, and judgment entered in accordance with said verdict. From this judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The first amended petition in this case upon which the same was tried, omitted the caption and signatures, is as follows:

"Come now Oswald S. Parker and H. A. Hefner, plaintiffs herein, and complaining of Moses Marx, Mariam Marx, Phillip Aaron Marx, Susan Burton Marx, and Ruby Marx, and Frank McPhail, guardian of Moses Marx, Mariam Marx, Phillip Aaron Marx, Susan Burton Marx, and Ruby Marx, defendants, and for cause of action say:

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—42.

"(1) That the plaintiffs are regularly licensed attorneys at law, and were at all the dates and times hereinafter mentioned engaged in the practice of law before the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, the Department at [455] Washington, D. C., and before various courts of the United States.

"(2) That said defendants and each of them were on the 18th day of July, 1906, and at the dates and times herein mentioned have been and are now, and were born citizens of the United States. That said defendants and each of them were claimants and applicants for enrollment as allottees of certain lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, as Mississippi Choctaws, having from one sixteenth to one sixty-fourth degree of Indian blood, under certain acts of the Congress of the United States relative thereto.

"(3) That on the 18th day of July, 1906, the said defendants and each of them executed and delivered to these plaintiffs their certain contracts in writing, whereby they employed the plaintiffs as their attorneys to represent them before the proper tribunals and officers and to secure their enrollment as such Mississippi Choctaws, and enforce their rights as such. That by the terms of said written instrument the said defendants and each of them jointly and severally bound and obligated themselves to pay to these plaintiffs for their services as attorneys, in cash, a sum of money equal to the market value of one-third of the land allotted to them, and each of them, and one-half of the money or other property received or to be received by them and each of them in the event of the successful termination of their application for enrollment as Mississippi Choctaws.

"(4) That pursuant to the terms of said written instrument these plaintiffs represented the said persons and each of them before the said tribunals and officers, and procured the enrollment of each and all of said persons as Mississippi Choctaws, and procured to be allotted to each and every one of said persons an allotment of lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of equal governmental appraised value with that of members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and that said enrollment carried with it the right of said persons to participate in the division and partition of the unallotted lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and of the monies and other property of said Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations.

"(5) That pursuant to the terms of said written instrument these plaintiffs procured to be allotted to Moses Marx the lands described in Exhibit A; to Mariam Marx, the lands described [456] in Exhibit B; to Phillip Aaron Marx, the lands described in Exhibit D; to Ruby Marx, the lands described in Exhibit E—as their allotted and proportionate share of the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, as enrolled Mississippi Choctaws.

“(6) That each of said persons have refused to make any conveyance of any portion of the lands allotted to them to these plaintiffs, although they, under the law, could do so if they would, and each of them has refused to pay to these plaintiffs the proportion of money received by them that is now due these plaintiffs, and each of them has been duly enrolled and identified as Mississippi Choctaws.

“(7) That the reasonable market value of the lands allotted to each of the said persons is $5,000, and there is now due and owing to these plaintiffs from each of these persons the sum of $1,000; the same being one-third of the value of the lands allotted to each of them. That due demands have been made for said sums, and that the persons and each of them have failed and neglected to pay any part thereof, and plaintiffs have performed their portion of the contract in every particular; a copy of the same being attached hereto and marked ‘Exhibit F.’

“(8) That each of said defendants are minors under the age of 14 years and had no legal guardian at the time the service hereinbefore alleged was performed and at the time the agreement was made for said services, but since said time Frank McPhail, of Ardmore, Okla., has been appointed the legal guardian for each of said minors by the honorable probate court of Carter county, Okla.

“(9) That each of said defendants had valuable rights involved as Mississippi Choctaws, and the plaintiffs espoused the cause of each of them and defended their rights to the protection of their property of each of them in said litigation, and as a result of the litigation an estate has been secured to each of them as hereinbefore alleged, and that the compensation provided for as hereinbefore alleged is a just and reasonable fee, and was necessary for the protection of the valuable rights of each of the said defendants; each of them residing at the time in the state of Mississippi and never moved to the Indian Territory, now Oklahoma, until after these plaintiffs had procured, through their efforts, the enrollment of each of them as Mississippi Choctaws, and the services [457] of the said plaintiffs were for the manifest benefit of each of said infants, and, had it not been for the efforts of these plaintiffs, the defendants would never have received the valuable estates that they have received as hereinbefore alleged.

“Wherefore, the plaintiffs pray judgment against each of said defendants in the sum of $1,000, making a total of $5,000, or such amount as may be found reasonable and just for the services herein performed under the said contract, and for their costs, for the appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent the said minors, and for such other relief which they may show themselves entitled to, either in law or equity.”

To said petition is attached a copy of the contract sued upon, and the terms stated in said contract support the averments of the petition as to said contract as pleaded. To said petition, the defendants, by their legal guardian, demurred, upon the ground:

“That the statements made in said petition are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendants.”

I. R. Mason for plaintiffs in error.

Samuel W. Hayes, C. B. Kendrick, S. M. Davis and R. A. Hefner for defendant in error.

COLLIER, C. (after stating the facts).—Motion is made by plaintiff to dismiss this cause, upon the ground:

“That defendants’ brief does not contain an abstract, setting forth the material parts of the pleadings, facts, and documents upon which the case was tried, sufficient to authorize the court to decide this case without reference to the case-made.”

This motion has received at our hands the most careful consideration; but, under the liberal construction as to procedure in this state, we feel that the benefit of any doubt as to the sufficiency of the presentation of the assignments of error should be given to defendant, said motion overruled, and the cause considered upon its merits.

It is averred in the petition that, when the contract sued [458] upon was entered into, plaintiffs were residents of the state of Texas, and that defendants were residents of the state of Mississippi. A copy of the contract, attached to the petition as an exhibit, purports that said contract was executed in Texas, but neither the laws of Mississippi nor the laws of Texas are pleaded in the petition to show that a recovery can be had against a minor for attorney’s fees, for service rendered in behalf of a minor in relation to his property, without the intervention of a guardian. Of course, if the laws of Arkansas, which were extended over the Indian Territory, authorized a recovery against a minor for attorney’s fees for services rendered him in relation to his property, upon a legal contract entered into prior to statehood, it would not be necessary to plead such laws of Arkansas, if the contract sued upon was an Indian Territory contract, as the laws of Arkansas were extended over the Indian Territory.

Section 1 of the Schedule of the Constitution provides that:

“No existing rights, actions, suits, proceedings, contracts, or claims shall be affected by the change in the forms of government, but all shall continue as if no change in the forms of government had taken place."

The purpose of this section of the Schedule is to preserve all rights already accrued, either in action, or capable of being enforced by the ordinary remedies provided for this purpose, as effectively as if the Constitution had not been adopted. But we do not find any allegation in the petition authorizing us to hold that the contract sued upon in this action was an Indian Territory contract. However, if the petition in this case does contain any averments from which it could be held that the contract sued upon is an Indian Territory contract, we, after diligent search, have been unable to find any law of Arkansas which was extended over the Indian Territory that classed attorney's fees as necessities, for which a minor child legally contract.

The case of Owens v. Gunther, 75 Ark. 37, 86 S. W. 851, 5 Ann. Cas. 130, upon which defendants rely to support their contention [459] that, if this contract is an Indian Territory contract, attorney's fees can be recovered for services rendered a minor in relation to his estate, not having been decided until after the laws of Arkansas were extended over the territory, is not even persuasive that the laws of Arkansas, which were extended over the Indian Territory, authorized a recovery upon a contract, or upon a quantum meruit, for services rendered a minor by an attorney, without the intervention of a legal guardian, in relation to his estate. If the written contract averred in the petition alone is counted upon by defendants, the petition averring that said minors were, at the time of the execution of the contract sued upon, under 14 years of age, of course the petition does not state a cause of action; but there may be sufficient allegations in the petition, if the contract sued upon be ignored, to authorize a recovery upon a quantum meruit, provided a recovery can be had for the services alleged to have been performed by plaintiff for said minors. As a count upon an express contract and a count upon a quantum meruit may be joined in the same action, where the pleader is in doubt as to under which cause of action his relief sought lies, and the action upon the express contract and upon the quantum meruit, is stated in one count, there being no motion, as in the case here, to require the said two causes of action to be separately counted upon, such petition is not demurrable. Mellon v. Fulton, 22 Okla. 636, 98 Pac. 911, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 960; King v. Stephenson, 29 Okla. 29, 116 Pac. 183; Hawley v. Wilkinson, 18 Minn. 525; Wagner v. Nagel, 33 Minn. 348, 23 N. W. 308; Plummer v. Mold, 22 Minn. 15; Manders v. Craft, 3 Colo. App. 236, 32 Pac. 836. Hence we will consider, for the purpose of testing said demurrer, that the petition in this case is a good petition upon the express contract, and upon a quantum meruit, notwithstanding the better practice would be to count separately upon the express contract and the quantum meruit.

The petition fails to state where the contract was made, and fails to plead the laws of the foreign state in which said contract [460] was made; and it will be presumed that the laws of the state in which the contract was made are the same as the laws of the forum, controlling the trial under which the rights of the parties are to be determined.

In the case of Hays v. King, 44 Okla. 180, 143 Pac. 1142, Judge Brewer, speaking for the court, says:

"Where a contract made in a foreign state is sought to be enforced in another state, the lex loci contractus controls the construction of the contract, except where it provides otherwise, and the laws of the state where the contract was made will be observed, of course being pleaded when necessary, in determining the rights and obligations of the parties, and effect given thereto, unless such foreign laws are irreconcilable with the local laws, or conflict with the established policy of the enforcing state."

As the petition fails to plead where the contract was made, and the laws of such state, as to the legality of the contract, not having been specially pleaded, in the absence of such special pleas, it will be presumed that the laws of the state in which the contract was made are the same as the laws of the forum, controlling the trial under which the rights of the parties are to be determined. Hoshaw v. Lines, 30 Okla. 67, 120 Pac. 583; Greenville Nat. Bank v. Evans-Snyder-Buel Co. 9 Okla. 353, 60 Pac. 249.

Where a contract, made in a foreign state, is sought to be enforced in another state, it is necessary, in order that the laws of the foreign state may prevail as to the construction of the contract, that the same be pleaded and proved. In the absence of pleading that the contract sued upon was made in a foreign state, and the laws of the foreign state, the laws of the forum must prevail. In other words, the presumption is that the laws of the foreign state are the same as those of the state of Oklahoma.

Under the laws of this state, a recovery cannot be had against a minor for attorney's fees for legal services rendered.

[461] In Grissom v. Beidleman, 35 Okla. 343, 129 Pac. 853, Ann. Cas. 1914D 599, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 411, Justice Williams, speaking for the court, said:

"We believe that the rule in New Hampshire, followed in Massachusetts and other states, should prevail here. That is, where the services pertain to the defense of the liberty or person of a minor, or the prosecution of action for an injury thereto, that the same should be classed as a 'necessary,' and an action lie against the minor for a reasonable recovery for attorney's fees; but, where the legal services are rendered in behalf of the . . . legal guardian, no recovery for such services should be had in an action at law."

As a recovery, neither upon the express contract sued upon, nor upon a quantum meruit, can be had under the petition in this case against said minor, the petition upon which this cause was tried does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and the court committed reversible error in overruling the demurrer directed against said petition.

Inasmuch as the error in overruling said demurrer to the petition must result in reversing and remanding this case, we do not deem it necessary to consider the other questions presented by this appeal.

It follows that this cause should be reversed and remanded.

BY THE COURT.—It is so ordered.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that where a statute is not construed until after it has been adopted in another state, the courts of the adopting state will not consider such a construction even persuasive authority, where it is in direct conflict with the settled law of the adopting state. The construction of a statute in its originating state, subsequent to its adoption in another state, has generally been held to be persuasive authority in the adopting state, as is shown in the note to Mt. Vernon Telephone Co. v. Franklin Farmers' Co-op. Tel. Co. reported ante, this volume at page 649, wherein the cases dealing with the construction of an adopted statute are fully discussed.

HANEY

v.

COFRAN ET AL.

Kansas Supreme Court—March 6, 1915.

94 Kan. 332; 146 Pac. 1027.

Policemen — Status as Public Officers.

A policeman holds an office within the meaning of section 2, of art. 15, of the state constitution.

[See note at end of this case.]

Civil Service — Scope — Application to Policemen.

The civil service provisions of section 1238 of the Gen. Stat. of 1909, relating to commission government in cities of the first class, must be restricted to the employment of subordinates and employees, and cannot apply to officers within the contemplation of section 2, of art. 15, of the state constitution.

Policemen — Tenure of Office.

Under chapter 114 of the Laws of 1907, and amendments thereto, in cities governed by the commission form of government, the terms of police officers should be definitely fixed by city ordinance, and the terms of such officers should expire with the term of office of the board appointing them.

Same.

An appointment of a policeman during good behavior under civil service regulations violates the constitutional provision that the legislature shall not create any office the tenure of which shall be longer than four years.

Appeal from District Court, Shawnee county: WHITCOMB, Judge.

Action by O. F. Haney, plaintiff, against R. L. Cofran, Mayor of city of Topeka et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

T. D. Humphreys, Arthur J. Bolinger and A. E. Crane for appellant.

W. C. Ralston and J. J. Schenck for appellees.

Richard J. Higgins, as amicus curiae.

[332] DAWSON, J.—The appellant, O. F. Haney, was a policeman of the city of Topeka until the change of administration following the city election in April, 1912, when he was summarily discharged by the mayor and chief of police. Invoking the provisions of the [333] civil-service law relating to cities of the first class, Haney appealed to the civil-service commissioners, who, upon hearing, revoked his discharge and ordered him restored to his position. (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1238.) The appellees ignored the order of the civil-service commissioners, and appellant applied for and obtained from the district court an alternative writ of mandamus directing his reinstatement. The mayor and chief of police filed a motion to quash the alternative writ, which motion was sustained.

So much of the civil-service act as we need to consider reads:

"The provisions of this section shall apply to all appointive officers and employees of said city, except city attorney, the members of the fire department where they have already adopted the civil-service plan, city clerk, city treasurer, city auditor, city engineer, superintendent of streets, superintendent of waterworks, secretary of waterworks, chief of police, city physician, judge of police court, superintendent of public parks, city assessor, commissioners of any kind (laborers whose occupation requires no special skill or fitness), election officials and mayor's secretary and assistant attorney, where such officers are appointed. All officers and employees in any such city shall be elected or appointed with reference to their qualifications and fitness and for the good of the public service, and without reference to their political faith or party affiliations. Any violations of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor and be a ground for removal from office." (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1238, subdiv. f.)

The appellees contend that a policeman is a public officer within the meaning of section 2 of article 15 of the state constitution. That section reads:

"The tenure of any office not herein provided for may be declared by law; when not so declared such office shall be held during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment, but the legislature shall not create any office the tenure of which shall be longer than four years."

[334] Does a policeman hold an office created by law? The legislature has not actually descended into such details, but it has created municipalities and defined their powers, and in general terms has authorized the creation of the position of a policeman in the cities of this state. (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1238, subdiv. c; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1304.)

In many respects a policeman is a municipal officer, but in other and important respects the legislature and the courts have raised him out of the class of a mere subordinate or employee like a field man of a local department of health (Jagger v. Green, 90 Kan. 153, 133 Pac. 174), or a cell-house man at the penitentiary (Jones v. Botkin, 92 Kan. 242, 139 Pac. 1198).

A policeman is a conservator of the peace and exercises many of the functions of sovereignty, and important duties are imposed upon him by the legislature. (See Gen. Stat. 1909, §§ 982, 2832, 2881, 2882, 2894, 3684, 4368, 5077, 5111, 5139 and 5140.)

This court has frequently recognized police officers as exercising the functions of sovereignty; and being clothed with such extensive powers they must be considered public officers. (State v. Hunter 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177; Peters v. Lindsborg, 40 Kan. 654, 656, 20 Pac. 490; Topeka v. Kersch, 70 Kan. 840, 79 Pac. 681, 80 Pac. 29; Claffin v. Wyandotte County, 81 Kan. 57, 19 Ann. Cas. 168, 105 Pac. 19; Anderson v. Shawnee County, 91 Kan. 362, 137 Pac. 799.)

There is no end of authority that a policeman is a public officer. (Jacksonville v. Allen, 25 Ill. App. 54; Brown v. Russell, 166 Mass. 14, 43 N. E. 1005, 55 Am. St. Rep. 357, 32 L.R.A. 253; State v. Schram, 82 Minn. 420, 85 N. W. 155; Dempsey v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 146 N. Y. 290, 40 N. E. 867; State v. Painesville, 32 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 123; Penal Code, Tex. 1895, art. 243; Proctor v. Blackburn, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 351, 67 S. W. 548.)

[335] In Peters v. Lindsborg, 40 Kan. 654, 20 Pac. 490, it was said:

"The police officers of a city are not regarded as the servants or agents of the city; their duties are of a public nature; their appointment is made by the city as a convenient mode of exercising a function of government; their duties are to preserve the good order and provide for the safety of the people of the city, and in these duties they act as the public servants of the state under the law, and not as mere agents of the city." (p. 656.)

A diligent search of the authorities discloses only one case under a constitutional provision like our own which is held not to apply to a policeman of a city. That case is Roth v. State, 158 Ind. 242, 63 N. E. 460, where one section of the syllabus reads:

"The provisions of sec. 2, art. 15, of the constitution that 'the General Assembly shall not create any office, the tenure of which shall be longer than four years,' does not apply to the office or position held by a policeman of a city."

The opinion of the Indiana supreme court has much to commend it; but we are impelled to a different conclusion by our own decisions distinguishing between officers and employees and the classes of public servants which may properly be placed under civil-service (Jagger v. Green, 90 Kan. 153, 133 Pac. 174; Jones v. Botkin, 92 Kan. 242, 139 Pac. 1198), and those which may not (Wulf v. Kansas City, 77 Kan. 358, 94 Pac. 207). Moreover, we must admit that the weight of authority supports the contention of appellees.

In Monette v. State, 91 Miss. 662, 44 So. 989, 124 Am. St. Rep. 715, it was said:

"Constitution 1890, § 20, providing that no person shall be elected or appointed to office in this state for life or good behavior, but the term of all offices shall be for some specified period, applies to municipal as well as to state and county officers and a municipal ordinance purporting to authorize the appointment of policemen during good behavior is unconstitutional and void." (Syl. ¶ 1.)

[336] In Houston v. Estes, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 99, 79 S. W. 848, it was said:

"Sections 26 and 26a of the charter of the city of Houston, placing the employees of the police, fire and health departments under civil service regulation and providing that they can only be discharged upon complaint for cause made to a board established for this purpose, appeal lying to the city council, held unconstitutional in so far as they fix the tenure at life upon good behavior. The constitutional term of two years will govern, subject to such regulation." (Syl. ¶ 1.)

Houston v. Estes, supra, is specially followed in Houston v. Smith, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 43, 80 S. W. 1144, and Houston v. Mahoney, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 45, 80 S. W. 1142. Earlier Texas supreme court cases: State v. Catlin, 84 Tex. 48, 19 S. W. 302; San Antonio v. Micklejohn, 89 Tex. 79, 33 S. W. 735; Kimbrough v. Barnett, 93 Tex. 301, 55 S. W. 120.

In Callaghan v. McGown (Tex. 1905) 90 S. W. 319, the Texas court of civil appeals slightly alters its position, and holds that the civil-service law does cover policemen, but only for the term of two years, which is the constitutional maximum term for any office which may be created by law.

The same conclusion is reached by noting particularly one clause of our own constitution in the section under consideration:

"When [the tenure of any office] not so declared such office shall be held during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment."

If a policeman's tenure of office is not fixed by the legislature, and it is not so fixed unless controlled by the civil-service law, then he holds "during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment." There is nothing doubtful about that language. It is clear, imperative and to the point. So a policeman, being a public officer with no term fixed, holds his office at the pleasure of the authority appointing him. We confess our disappointment at the result thus reached, and have [337] sought with care to find a different result. If the legislature had said that police officers should be under civil-service regulations for terms of four years there would be no difficulty. The Texas court of civil appeals, in Callaghan v. McGown, supra, have apparently thought it is possible to read the constitutional provision into the Texas civil-service law, thus modifying their earlier interpretations; but it is more in harmony with our view of the subject that the legislature should make its own interpolations.

There is an additional difficulty under our statute in reaching that conclusion. The act relating to commission government of cities of the first class (Laws 1907, ch. 114, and amendments) contains two sections which we cannot ignore:

"Art. V, sec. 27. The board of commissioners . . . shall have power . . .

"Sec. 48. To provide for the removal of any elective or appointive city officer for misconduct in office.

"Art. VII, sec. 90. The board of commissioners shall have power to remove the city attorney, city clerk, city treasurer or city auditor for incompetency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, upon charges preferred, after due notice in writing and opportunity to be heard in their defense. When such charges are sustained, any such officer shall be removed by resolution of the board of commissioners, passed by a vote of at least four of the members of said board, declaring that the charges preferred have been proven and that such office is vacant. But said board may in their discretion, by a majority vote of all the members thereof, remove with or without cause the incumbent of any other appointive city office or employment whatever, and may by ordinance prescribe, limit or change the compensation of such officers and employees, except that the salaries of all appointive officers shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which they are appointed." (Gen. Stat. 1909, §§ 1243, 1264, 1306.)

The civil-service provisions were inserted in this act by the legislature of 1909 (Laws 1909, ch. 74, § 4, Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1238), but they are in pari materia and [338] must be considered in harmony with the other statutes dealing with this subject. (Wren v. Nemaha County, 24 Kan. 301.)

"The general rule in the construction of a statute is that force and effect must be given to all sections of a statute, if the same can be done without destroying the effect, intent and object with which it was enacted; and all sections of the same act must be construed in harmony with each other, so that no part shall be held as superfluous." (Wenger v. Taylor, 39 Kan. 754, syl. ¶ 1, 18 Pac. 911.)

In the state of New York, where civil-service has reached its highest development, there is a provision in the New York constitution, adopted in 1894, giving positive sanction to civil-service laws. It reads:

"Appointments and promotions in the civil service of the state, and of all the civil divisions thereof, including cities and villages, shall be made according to merit and fitness to be ascertained, so far as practicable, by examinations, which, so far as practicable, shall be competitive; provided, however, that honorably discharged soldiers and sailors from the army and navy of the United States in the late civil war, who are citizens and residents of this state, shall be entitled to preference in appointment and promotion without regard to their standing on any list from which such appointment or promotion may be made. Laws shall be made to provide for the enforcement of this section." (Constitution of New York, art. 5, § 9.)

It needs no comment to point out the wide difference between the Kansas and New York constitutions on the questions under consideration.

From this it follows that a policeman is an officer, and not within the scope of the civil-service regulations, and as his term is not fixed, he holds, in conformity with the constitution, "during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment."

The judgment is affirmed.

BURCH, J. (dissenting).—I am not convinced that an amendment to the constitution of this state is necessary before policemen can be placed under civil-service regulations. Therefore, I dissent.

[339] ON REHEARING.

95 Kan. 335; 148 Pac. 640.

DAWSON, J.—We have before us a petition for a rehearing filed by an amicus curiae who calls our attention to section 88 of chapter 114 of the Laws of 1907 (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1304) with the suggestion that this section fixes or provides for the fixing of official terms of police officers. The section reads:

"The board of commissioners may appoint, by a majority vote of all the members thereof, the following officers, to wit: A city attorney, a city clerk, a city treasurer, a city auditor, a city engineer, a superintendent of streets, a superintendent of waterworks, a secretary of waterworks, a fire marshal, a chief of police, a city physician, a judge of the police court, a superintendent of public parks, a city assessor, and such assistants and other officers and servants as they may deem necessary for the best interests of the city; but no such officer shall be appointed until his term and salary shall have been fixed by ordinance. The terms of all appointive officers shall expire with the term of office of the board appointing them, Provided, That they shall hold their respective offices until their successors are appointed and qualified; Provided, That in case of appointment to fill a vacancy, such appointee shall only serve for the remainder of the term for which his predecessor was appointed."

The clause, "the terms of all appointive officers shall expire with the term of office of the board appointing them," gives another reason for affirming the judgment of the district court; but it does necessitate a modification of what was said in our first opinion (Haney v. Cofran, 94 Kan. 332, 146 Pac. 1027). We must now hold that by city ordinance in cities of the first class governed by the commission act (Laws 1907, ch. 114, and amendments), the terms of police officers [340] are or should be definitely fixed, and the terms of such officers expire with the term of office of the board appointing them. The duration of the official terms of such police officers may not be indefinitely extended under the civil-service act in the same sense and in the same manner that the duration of a city employee's service may be extended, but we see no reason why the civil-service regulations for the determination of the qualifications of police officers should not apply. These observations, however, take nothing from the correctness of the judgment of the district court in refusing mandamus to require the mayor and chief of police to restore the plaintiff to his position as a policeman. The plaintiff's term had expired under the statute (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1304) and under the ordinance which we are bound to assume was promulgated in compliance with that statute.

NOTE.

Policeman as Public Officer.

Scope of Note, 663.

General Rule, 664.

Application of Rule, 666.

Scope of Note.

It is the purpose in the present note to discuss the cases passing on the question whether a policeman is a public officer. The status of a police officer with respect to whether he is a municipal officer is considered and the authorities thereon are collated in the note to Lambert v. Barrett, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1226.

The question of the status of a policeman has most frequently arisen in cases wherein an attempt has been made to hold a municipality liable for his illegal or negligent acts in enforcing its regulations. In those cases, it has generally been held that a police officer of a city, performing the duties with which he is charged, is not acting as an agent or servant of the municipality, but is acting as a peace or public officer appointed by the city on the authority of the legislature, and that, as he is acting for the general public, or in furtherance of the public policy of the state, the city is not liable. See the notes to Gillmor v. Salt Lake City, 13 Ann. Cas. 1016, and Dube v. Montreal, Ann. Cas. 1913A 468.

General Rule.

It has been held that a policeman occupies a dual position; that he is, strictly speaking, neither a state officer, acting as such, nor an officer acting in a purely local capacity, as the mere servant or employee of a city; that he may be said to be sui generis, occupying a unique place of his own; and that in the use of the term "state officer," by the courts, they intend simply to hold that a policeman is a public officer in the sense that he has certain public duties to perform other than those strictly pertaining to the government of the municipality. State v. Edwards, 38 Mont. 250, 99 Pac. 940, wherein the court said: "Policemen are certainly not state officers in the same sense that the attorney general or the state treasurer are state officers. The lay mind would rebel at such a conclusion, and no refinement of reasoning could make it logical. We think the courts whose decisions we have just referred to were unfortunate in the use of the term 'state officer,' and that they intended simply to hold that a policeman is a public officer, in the sense that he has certain public duties to perform other than those strictly pertaining to the government of the municipality. With this latter determination we agree. If a policeman is strictly a state officer, the only way in which he could be removed would be by impeachment in accordance with the provisions of section 17 of article V of the constitution, and chapter 1 of title III of the Penal Code. . . . Policemen in this state all hold their places under city or town governments. We find no mention of the office in the constitution. We have no state police as such. Respondent contends that a policeman is strictly a municipal officer, within the meaning of section 6, article XVI, of the constitution, supra; or, at any rate, that the office of policeman falls within the provisions of that section. There can be no doubt that a policeman is an 'officer' not only within the ordinary meaning of the term in the street, but strictly and technically speaking also. Being attached to the municipality it is within common knowledge that he has certain local duties to perform under the ordinances of all cities. A reference to any book of city ordinances will disclose the nature of such duties. But, in addition to these purely local duties, he has others, and these others are of a public and general nature pertaining to the observance and enforcement of the general laws of the state, principally the penal and criminal laws. . . . Many other provisions might be cited showing that policemen in this state are charged with general duties under the state laws in addition to their local duties. What, then, is the result? It appears that a policeman occupies a sort of dual position. He is, strictly speaking, neither a state officer, as such, nor an officer acting in a purely local capacity. He may be said to be sui generis, occupying a unique place of his own, and so we are inclined to regard him. . . . Perhaps it is not out of place to notice at this time the argument of the appellant that policemen are mere employees or servants of the city. We cannot agree with this contention. To so hold would strip them as officers of all protection under the laws, and a result so grave should be avoided, if possible."

It has, however, been said in a great number of cases that policemen, or police officers (the terms being used interchangeably), are charged with the exercise of the police power of the state, and therefore are public or state functionaries, as distinguished from corporate, municipal, or private officers, their principal duty being to assist in the preservation of the public peace.

In Burch v. Hardwicke, 30 Grat. (Va.) 24, 32 Am. Rep. 640, the court, after reviewing a number of the authorities to the effect that a policeman is a public or state officer, said: "The distinction recognized in all of them is between officers whose duties are exclusively of a local nature and officers appointed for a particular locality, but yet whose duties are of a public or general nature. When they are of the latter character they are state officers, whether the legislature itself makes the appointment or delegates its authority to the municipality. The state, as a political society, is interested in the suppression of crime and in the preservation of peace and good order, and in protecting the rights of persons and property. No duty is more general and all-pervading than this. It extends alike to towns and cities as to the country. It looks to the preservation of order and security in the state, at elections, and at all public places; the protection of citizens, strangers, travelers at railway stations, at steamboat landings; the enforcement of the laws against intemperance, gambling, lotteries, violations of the Sabbath, and, in fine, the suppression of all those disorders which affect the peace and dignity of the state and the security of the citizen. The instrumentalities by which these objects are effected, however appointed, by whatever name called, are agencies of the state, and not of the municipalities for which they are appointed or elected. The whole machinery of civil and criminal justice, says a learned judge, has been so generally confided to local agencies, it is not strange if it has sometimes been considered as of local concern. But there is a clear distinction in principle between what concerns the state and that which does not concern more than one locality."

It has been said that police officers are to be regarded as public officers holding their office as a trust from the state. Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191; Blynn v. Pontiac, 185 Mich. 35, 151 N. W. 681. Thus, in the case first cited, the court said: "A policeman of the city of Bridgeport is an arm of the law; he holds an office as a trust from the state; he is a preserver of the public peace; he is not the hired servant of a master; no contract relation exists between him and the city by which he is bound to its service; he can lay down his trust at any time according to his pleasure without exposing himself to an action for damages for breach of contract."

Likewise, it has been held that policemen must be considered as public officers where they have been recognized as exercising some of the functions of sovereignty. Brown v. Russell, 166 Mass. 14, 43 N. E. 1005, 55 Am. St. Rep. 357, 32 L.R.A. 253. And see the reported case.

In a number of cases constitutional and statutory provisions with respect to public offices or officers have been construed as applicable to policemen, thus impliedly treating them as public officers. Johnson v. State, 132 Ala. 43, 31 So. 493; Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 266, 22 Pac. 176; Sullivan v. Bridgeport, 81 Conn. 660, 71 Atl. 906; Claffin v. Wyandotte County, 81 Kan. 57, 19 Ann. Cas. 168, 105 Pac. 19; Monette v. State, 91 Miss. 662, 44 So. 989, 134 Am. St. Rep. 715; Healy v. Hillsboro County, 70 N. H. 588, 49 Atl.

89; Mangam v. Brooklyn, 98 N. Y. 585, 50 Am. Rep. 705; Cleveland v. Payne, 72 Ohio St. 347, 74 N. E. 177, 70 L.R.A. 841; State v. Saillard, 22 Wash. 267, 60 Pac. 651.

In actions brought under the rule that where a public officer has a legal right to his office, this right carries with it, as incident thereto, the salary of the office, the courts have impliedly recognized police officers as public officers. Larson v. St. Paul, 83 Minn. 473, 86 N. W. 459; State v. Wallridge, 153 Mo. 194, 54 S. W. 447; People v. French, 91 N. Y. 265; Wilkes-Barre v. Meyers, 113 Pa. St. 395, 6 Atl. 10; Pratt v. Swan, 16 Utah 483, 52 Pac. 1092. See also Reising v. Portland, Ann. Cas. 1912D 895, and note. And policemen have been referred to in general terms as public officers, in applying the rule that it is against public policy to permit a public officer to recover a reward for doing his duty as such officer. See the notes to Somerset Bank v. Edmund, 10 Ann. Cas. 726, and Buek v. Nance, Ann. Cas. 1912C 1293.

Application of Rule.

In Brown v. Russell, 166 Mass. 17, 43 N. E. 1005, 55 Am. St. Rep. 357, 32 L.R.A. 253, it was held that the persons appointed to the elective department of the district police force of Massachusetts, under the statute (Pub. St. c. 103) and amendments thereof, were public officers and not merely employees of the commonwealth. The court said: "They are appointed by the governor for the term of three years, subject to removal by the governor, and they 'have and exercise throughout the commonwealth all the powers of constables (except the service of civil process), police officers, and watchmen, and may be transferred from one district to another; and the governor may at any time command their services in suppressing riots and in preserving the peace.' Pub. Sts. c. 103, § 2. They give bonds to the treasurer of the commonwealth and receive a stated salary from the treasury of the commonwealth. They have and exercise some of the powers of government."

It has been held that the words "police-man" and "patrolman" are used synonymously. State v. Edwards, 40 Mont. 287, 20 Ann. Cas. 239, 106 Pac. 695. And likewise, it has been held that a police captain is a policeman, State v. Edwards, 40 Mont. 313, 106 Pac. 703; and that the chief of police occupies the same relation to the public and the city as does an ordinary policeman, State v. Quinn, 40 Mont. 472, 107 Pac. 506.

A railroad policeman who is appointed by the governor, who is required to take the constitutional oath, and who is by virtue of his appointment authorized to perform the duties of a peace officer or policeman in protecting the property of a railroad company and of the general public in the custody of the railroad company, is a police officer by reason of the manner of his appointment and the character of his duties, within a constitutional provision (Const. N. Y. art. 13, § 5) prohibiting a public officer from receiving, for his use or benefit, a free pass from any corporation. Dempsey v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 146 N. Y. 290, 40 N. E. 687. Compare Hamlin v. Berk County, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 462. The question whether a special policeman employed and paid by a railroad or other corporation, or by a private individual, to protect and preserve the property and maintain order on the premises of the employer, is a public officer, is discussed in the notes to Sharp v. Erie R. Co. 6 Ann. Cas. 250; McKain v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 17 Ann. Cas. 634, and Buman v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1913D 107. See also Thomas v. Canadian Pac. R. Co. 8 Ann. Cas. 324. In Kimball v. Boston, 1 Allen (Mass.) 417, it was held that a special police officer in the employment of a city was not its servant or agent in any such sense as to take away his right of action for an injury sustained by him by reason of a defective highway.

In Cullinan v. Furthman, 187 N. Y. 160, 79 N. E. 989, it was held that a special agent employed to investigate violations of the liquor tax law under the direction of the state commissioner of excise, was, in a sense, a public and official detective as distinguished from a private detective. And in McDonald v. McCaskill, 5 Que. Pr. 266, it was held that a chief government detective for the province of Quebec, appointed under an order in council, was a public officer fulfilling a public duty within the meaning of the statutes. (R. S. Q. art. 2594; C. P. art. 88.)

In Blynn v. Pontiac, 185 Mich. 35, 151 N. W. 681, it was held that the word "employee" as used in a workman's compensation act did not include policemen.

The police commissioners of a city are state or public agents and officers, engaged in performing public and governmental duties, and are not private agents or servants of the city, nor are they engaged in any matter of corporate or proprietary concern. Perkins v. New Haven, 53 Conn. 214, 1 Atl. 825; Americus v. Perry, 114 Ga. 871, 40 So. 1004, 57 L.R.A. 230; State v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177; State v. Flower, 49 La. Ann. 1199, 22 So. 623; Baltimore v. Howard, 20 Md. 335; Altwater v. Baltimore, 31 Md. 462; Sinclair v. Baltimore, 59 Md. 597; Upshur v. Baltimore, 94 Md. 752, 51 Atl. 953; McEvoy v. Baltimore, 126 Md. 111, 94 Atl. 543; People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Gibbs v. Manchester, 73 N. H. 265, 61 Atl. 128; Gilbert v. Berlin, 76 N. H. 470,

I. 196, 47 Atl. 312, 50 L.R.A. 330; Opinion to Governor, 22 R. I. 654, 49 Atl. 38. See also State v. Kolsem, 130 Ind. 434, 29 N. E. 595, 14 L.R.A. 566; Baltimore v. State, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572; People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103; State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102. In Perkins v. New Haven, supra, wherein it appeared that the legislature had imposed the duty on the police commissioners, as public agents, of selecting and providing voting places in the city for all but school elections, the court said: "It is difficult to conceive a duty more plainly and exclusively public and governmental than that of regulating state and national elections, and the police commissioners in the discharge of their duty in providing voting places for such elections are public agents, and not the agents of the city, and therefore can create no contract relation between the city and third persons in this respect."

A chief of police has been held to be a public or state officer. Ellis v. Lennon, 86 Mich. 468, 49 N. W. 308; State v. Quinn, 40 Mont. 472, 107 Pac. 506; Burch v. Hardwicke, 30 Grat. (Va.) 24, 32 Am. Rep. 640. In Ellis v. Lennon, supra, it was held that the chief of police was a public officer, and that his office was one which was properly the subject of a proceeding by an information in the nature of a quo warranto filed under the statute (How. St. 8635) authorizing such a proceeding "when any person shall usurp, intrude into, or unlawfully hold or exercise any public office, civil or military, or any franchise within this state, or any office in any corporation created by the authority of this state." The court said: "The incumbent of a municipal office created by the statute, who is elected or appointed in the manner thereby prescribed, having a definite term fixed by statute, and who exercises functions which are derived from the charter in addition to those derived from the by-laws of the municipality, must be deemed a public officer, within the meaning of this statute. Such an officer is a constituent part of the machinery of government, exercising functions prescribed by sovereign authority, and which are independent of local control. The chief of police of West Bay City is a public officer. The office is created by statute, and his powers and duties are prescribed by the charter."

It has been held that it is the duty of the chief of police of a city, who is in a sense a state officer, in addition to his duties under the city ordinances, to enforce the general laws of the state within the city, and in the event of his failure or neglect so to do, he is subject to removal under the general laws of the state. State v. Linn (Okla.) 153 Pac. 826.

However, under a constitutional provision [Const. Ark. 1874, art. 19, § 6] declaring that no person shall hold or perform the duties of more than one office in the same department of the government at the same time, except as expressly directed or permitted by the constitution, it has been held that the provision referred to state officers only, and that the chief of police of a city of the first class was not a state officer, and that there was no incompatibility between that office and the office of sheriff. Peterson v. Culpepper, 72 Ark. 230, 2 Ann. Cas. 378, 79 S. W. 783.

PLANTERS FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF LITTLE ROCK ET AL.

STEELE ET AL.

Arkansas Supreme Court—July 12, 1915.

119 Ark. 597; 178 S. W. 910.

Fire Insurance — Change in Occupancy — Premises Vacant at Time of Fire.

A fire policy was issued on an application containing a statement that the building was occupied as a private dwelling, and the policy provided that, if the building should become vacant or unoccupied, or any change should take place in the title, occupancy, or possession, it should become null and void. After issuance of the policy insured ceased to occupy the premises as a private dwelling, and leased them to tenants. It is held that there was such a change in the occupancy as to avoid the policy, notwithstanding that at the time of a fire the premises were vacant, and insured was intending to reoccupy them within a few days.

Vacancy Clause — Leased Premises — Period between Successive Occupancies.

A fire policy contained a stipulation that, if the building should become vacant or unoccupied, it should be null and void. The policy was issued on an application stating that the premises were used as a private dwelling, but after issuance the owner began to rent them. Upon the tenant removing from the dwelling the owner secured a vacancy permit, and about the time of its expiration the tenant returned. After expiration of the vacancy permit the tenant again removed from the premises, though he left a stove and a few other articles which the owner intended to appropriate for rent. Before the premises were reoccupied by the owner they were burned. It is held that, though the owner intended and would have in less than a week reoccupied the premises, no recovery could be had on the policy; this not being a case of a policy issued upon rented property, where short vacancies are to be anticipated.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nevada county: HAYNIE, Judge.

Action by L. C. Steele et al., plaintiffs, against Planters Fire Insurance Company of Little Rock et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

J. W. & J. W. House, Jr., for appellants.
C. C. Hamby for appellees.

[600] McCULLOCH, C. J.—This is an action on a fire insurance policy issued by appellant company on a house owned by appellee Steele in Prescott, Arkansas. The policy was issued on November 8, 1912, and covered a period of three years. The fire occurred on July 15, 1914. The application was taken by a soliciting agent and contained a statement that the building was occupied as a private dwelling, and the answers in the application were warranted to be true. The applicant did in fact occupy the premises as a private dwelling house, but thereafter removed from the place and rented it to a tenant. The first tenant moved out and subsequently it was rented to another tenant named Taylor. Taylor vacated the premises in April, 1914, and the house remained vacant for three weeks or a month, when Taylor rented it again from Steele, the owner, and reoccupied it. He remained in the house until July 11, when he again moved out, and it was not again occupied by any one.

The proof shows that Mr. Steele, the assured, intended to move into the house on July 16, and reoccupy it as his dwelling. He was making preparations to move when the fire occurred. There is also testimony to the effect that when Taylor moved out he left a cooking stove and a table, and that the owner claimed the property as compensation for balance of rent which Taylor owed him. After Taylor moved out in April, the assured applied to the company for a vacancy permit, and the permit was issued to him for a period of thirty days from date. There is some controversy in the testimony as to the precise dates when Taylor moved out of the house and moved back into it, and also as to the date of the permit. Mr. Steele, the owner, testified that Taylor moved out in April and moved back in May, and that the permit was dated in April, and that the period of the permit had expired [601] when Taylor moved back into the house. A copy of the permit was introduced in evidence by the company, and showed that it was dated May 8, and was for a period of thirty days. The conflict with respect to those matters is not material, for it is undisputed that the vacancy permit had expired before Taylor moved out of the house the last time. The policy contains a stipulation that "if said building . . . shall become vacant or unoccupied, . . . or any change takes place in the title, occupancy or possession thereof whatever, then and in every such case this contract shall be absolutely null and void." Appellant pleaded, among other defenses, that there was a violation of each of those conditions of the policy.

The case was submitted to a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of appellees for the sum of $500, the amount of the policy. The sureties on the bond of the company were joined as defendants, and they have appealed, as well as the company itself. A receiver has been appointed for the company and has been substituted here as appellant.

(1) We are of the opinion that according to the undisputed testimony in the case, the verdict was without evidence to support it, and that the judgment for that reason must be reversed. This conclusion rests on two grounds, namely, that the house was unoccupied within the meaning of that term mentioned in the policy, and also that there was such a change in the occupancy as invalidated the policy. Upon the last point the case is ruled by Planters' Mut. Ins. Assoc. v. Dewberry, 69 Ark. 295, 62 S. W. 1047, 86 Am. St. Rep. 195. The policy in that case contained a clause identical with the one in question, and we held that where the house was occupied by the applicant as a dwelling at the time of the issuance of the policy, and that a subsequent change was made by the owner's removal and a tenant taking possession, that operated as a change of occupancy within the meaning of the policy. The only difference between the two cases is that in the Dewberry case the house was occupied by a tenant at the time the fire occurred, whereas in the present case the tenant had moved out three days before the fire occurred. [602] That difference, however, is not controlling, for it is the change of occupancy which operated as a breach of the conditions of the policy; and even if it were held that the return of the owner to the property reinstated the status so as to come within the terms of the policy, that would not occur until there had been an actual reoccupancy by the owner. In this case the premises had not been occupied by the owner for a considerable length of time. There was, according to the proof, an intention on the part of the owner to reoccupy the premises, but he had not actually done so.

We are therefore of the opinion that the policy was rendered void, and that there can be no recovery thereon. The policy is void also by reason of the fact that the premises were vacant and unoccupied at the time of the fire. There is some discussion in the authorities as to the distinction between the terms "vacant" and "unoccupied," and "vacant and unoccupied," and "vacant or unoccupied," but a discussion of that distinction is without importance here, for the language here is that the policy shall be void if the premises become "vacant or unoccupied." Limburg v. German F. Ins. Co. 90 Ia. 709, 57 N. W. 626, 48 Am. St. Rep. 468, 23 L.R.A. 99.

The court, over objections of appellant, gave the following instruction, which we think was erroneous: "If the jury believe that Taylor went out on Saturday, and that plaintiff immediately began preparation to move in, and if the fire had not occurred, he would have moved in on Thursday morning, then the policy would not be void if the jury believe from Saturday till Thursday would be a reasonable length of time for plaintiff to get ready to move."

(2-3) There are authorities to the effect that where the insured property is occupied by a tenant, it is impliedly contemplated by the parties to the contract of insurance that "any temporary vacancy caused by or incident to such change is not within the purview of the vacancy clause." 2 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, 1675. That principle does not apply, however, in this case for the reason that the property was occupied as a dwelling, and it was contrary to the terms of the policy to change [603] the character of the occupancy. Planters Mut. Ins. Assoc. v. Dewberry, supra. Therefore, there could be no presumption that a temporary vacancy or period of unoccupancy was within the contemplation of the parties. That point is emphasized in the case of Barry v. Prescott Ins. Co. 35 Hun (N. Y.) 601. The facts of that case are quite similar to the facts of this case, except that the period of unoccupancy was longer. The stipulation of the present policy was unconditionally to the effect that if the building become "vacant or unoccupied," the policy should be void, and it cannot be said that there was any period of time contemplated at all for unoccupancy, for the reason that the policy also provides that any change of occupancy should also operate as an avoidance of the policy. No presumption could be indulged in the face of that express stipulation. The fact that Taylor left a stove and table, which the assured expected to appropriate as compensation for balance of rent due, does not prevent this clause attaching. In order that such state of facts may constitute an occupancy, there must be a substantial quantity of furniture, evincing an actual and personal occupancy. 2 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, 1659, 1667; Weidert v. State Ins. Co. 19 Ore. 261, 24 Pac. 242, 20 Am. St. Rep. 809; Corrigan v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 122 Mass. 299; Cook v. Continental Ins. Co. 70 Mo. 610, 35 Am. Rep. 438; Continental Ins. Co. v. Kyle, 124 Ind. 132, 24 N. E. 727, 19 Am. St. Rep. 77, 9 L.R.A. 81; Feshe v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co. 74 Ia. 676, 39 N. W. 87.

The policy is therefore void on both the grounds stated.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

NOTE.

Construction of Vacancy Clause in Fire Insurance Policy Issued upon Rented Property.

The purpose of the present note is to review the few recent cases which have passed on the question whether, under a clause in the policy providing for forfeiture in case the premises are vacated, a contract of fire insurance is avoided by a temporary vacancy of the premises caused by the outgoing of a tenant. The earlier cases on this subject are collated in the notes to Ohio Farmers Ins. Co. v. Vogel, 9 Ann. Cas. 91, and Moore v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 10 Am. St. Rep. 384.

The reported case holds that the rule that where the insured property is occupied by a tenant, it is impliedly contemplated by the parties to the contract of insurance that any temporary vacancy caused by or incident to a change of tenants is not within the purview of the vacancy clause, is not applicable where the premises at the time the policy is issued are occupied by the owner thereof as a dwelling.

That rule is applicable, however, in case the premises are occupied by a tenant at the time the policy is issued. Farmers' Mut. Equity Ins. Soc. v. Smith, 158 Ky. 459, 165 S. W. 675, L.R.A.1915B 844; Tracy v. Queen City F. Ins. Co. 132 La. 610, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1145, 61 So. 687. See also Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, 1 Ga. App. 492, 57 S. E. 1013. Thus in Farmers' Mut. Equity Ins. Soc. v. Smith, supra, the court said: "Where the property is occupied by a tenant, it must necessarily be within the contemplation of the parties to the contract that occasionally it will be vacant for a short and reasonable interval of time between the outgoing of one tenant and the incoming of another." And in Athens Mut. Ins. Co. v. Toney, supra, it was said: "Another reason why we do not think that the company intended that a vacancy existing for a reasonable time beyond the ten days should work a forfeiture of the insurance is found in the custom of the country.

The house was insured as a house occupied by a tenant. The custom of tenants in the country changing their homes at the end of the year must have been well known; indeed we think that the company was chargeable with notice of such custom; and the condition in the policy should be construed, therefore, on the question of vacancy, so as to allow reasonable intervals between the outgoing and incoming of tenants. That the word 'vacancy' in such contracts should be so construed has been frequently ruled. Mr. Cooley, in his Briefs on the Law of Insurance, citing many authorities, says: 'It is a well-settled rule that when the premises are described in a policy as occupied by a tenant, change of tenants was contemplated by the parties, and therefore any temporary vacancy caused by or incident to such change is not within the purview of the vacancy clause.' See also Tracy v. Queen City F. Ins. Co. 132 La. 610, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1145, 61 So. 687, wherein the court said obiter: "Where buildings intended for rental are insured, the insurer must be aware that an occasional vacancy will be necessary incident to such use." But in Payson v. Equity F. Ins. Co. 38 N. Bruns. 436, it was held that where rented property is insured, there is no vacancy within the meaning of the policy, where one tenant moves out and another promptly moves in, since there must be time to make the change, but that where the tenant moves out and there is no other tenant to come in, the building is vacant within the meaning of the policy, and it matters not if the vacancy is only for a few days, if it is within the knowledge of the insured, since he must, under the conditions, give notice to the insurer, so that the insurer may decide whether to cancel the policy.

COMPANY OF ILLINOIS

v.

LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—October 27, 1915

270 Ill. 399; 110 N. E. 583.

Eminent Domain — Nature of Right.

"Eminent domain" is a right inherent in all sovereignties; it is the right of a nation or the state, or of those to whom the power has been fully delegated, to condemn private property for public use and to appropriate the ownership or possession of such property.

for such use upon paying due compensation to be ascertained according to law.

[See 102 Am. St. Rep. 811.]

Rights of Telegraph Company — Condemnation of Railroad Right of Way.

A petition for condemnation filed by a telegraph company to condemn an easement for its lines along the right of way of a railway company under Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 134, §§ 1-3 (Rev. St. 1874, c. 134, §§ 1-3), conferring the right of eminent domain upon telegraph companies, is not in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, § 1 (9 Fed. St. Ann. 416), and amendment 5 (9 Fed. St. Ann. 305), or to Const. art. 2, § 2, prohibiting the taking or damaging of private property without just compensation, since the object of the condemnation proceedings was to ascertain legally the compensation to which the railroad company would be entitled.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A telegraph company lawfully organized within the state is not prevented from condemning an easement for its lines over a right of way of a railroad company organized within the state, leased to another railroad company engaged in interstate commerce, by Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8 (8 Fed. St. Ann. 363), giving Congress power to regulate commerce among the states.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Act Cong. July 24, 1866, c. 230, §§ 1, 4, 14 Stat. 221 (7 Fed. St. Ann. 205), giving telegraph companies a right to construct lines over the public domain and across navigable streams upon filing their written acceptance of the act with the postmaster general, does not constitute such an assumption by Congress of all power over telegraph lines engaged in interstate commerce as to prevent condemnation under state law by a telegraph company of an easement for its lines over the right of way of a railroad company.

[See note at end of this case.]

States — River as Boundary.

By Act Cong. April 18, 1818, c. 67, 3 Stat. 428, making the Wabash river part of the boundary line between the states of Indiana and Illinois, the middle of the current becomes the boundary line, and the condemnation of a right of way for a telegraph company to the boundary line is subject to the control of the United States over the Wabash river.

[See generally 16 Ann. Cas. 1115; Ann. Cas. 1914D 190.]

Same.

The phrases "middle of the river" and "middle of the main channel" are equivalent expressions, and both mean the main line of the channel or the middle thread of the current.

Eminent Domain — Condemnation by Telegraph Company — Sufficiency of Petition.

A telegraph company's petition to condemn an easement for its lines over a railway right of way is sufficient although each pole is not located by individual description.

Failure to Agree on Compensation — Showing Sufficient.

In a proceeding by a telegraph company to condemn an easement for its lines over a railway right of way, an offer by the telegraph company for the use of the right of way and its refusal by the railway company was a sufficient showing of the failure to agree on the compensation.

Right to Condemn — De Facto Corporation.

That a telegraph company has been organized in an unlawful manner or for an unlawful purpose cannot be considered in a proceeding by it to condemn land for a right of way.

[See 9 Ann. Cas. 594; Ann. Cas. 1913C 271.]

Condemnation by Telegraph Company — Taking Railroad Right of Way.

In a proceeding by a telegraph company to condemn an easement for its lines over a railway right of way, the evidence is held not to show that the construction and operation of the telegraph lines would interfere with the public use of the railroad.

[See note at end of this case.]

Rights of Telegraph Company under Lease.

In a proceeding by a telegraph company to condemn an easement for its lines over the right of way of a railway company after the termination of a lease therefor, a finding that one of the wires strung during the life of the lease was the property of the railway company, and that therefore the railway operated a line in the identical place sought to be condemned, was erroneous, where under a contract between the telegraph company and the railway company the former strung the wire and the latter paid a certain price for its use.

Eminent Domain — Conflicting Locations — Priority.

In condemnation proceedings where a telegraph company and a railway company sought to locate a line over the same ground, the one who first located the line had the preference.

Amendment of Petition.

A petition by a telegraph company for the condemnation of an easement for its lines over the right of way of a railway company may properly be amended by a stipulation that the telegraph company will not incommode the railway company in the operation of its line.

Property Subject to Condemnation — Prior Public Use.

In a proceeding by a telegraph company to condemn an easement for its lines along the right of way of a railroad company, under Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 134, conferring the right of eminent domain upon telegraph companies, the railroad company cannot contend that petitioner is seeking to condemn property already occupied and subjected to the same use, where the only prior use for telegraph purposes consisted of a single wire strung on poles not owned by the railroad company and supplied by current not furnished by it; the space occupied by the wire not being involved.

Appeal from County Court, St. Clair county: DEWEY, Judge.

Action by Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois, plaintiff, against Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

West & Eckhart and Percy B. Eckhart for appellant.

H. L. Stone, J. M. Hamill and C. P. Hamill for appellees.

[400] CRAIG, J.—This is an appeal by the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois, an Illinois corporation, from an order of the county court of St. Clair county dismissing a petition for condemnation filed by the appellant on February 3, 1912, seeking to condemn an easement in the right of way of the [401] Southeast and St. Louis Railway Company, leased to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company.

The condemnation petition, as finally amended, sets up, in substance, that the petitioner is a corporation duly organized as a telegraph company under the laws of the State of Illinois for the purpose of owning, constructing, maintaining and operating lines of telegraph in the State of Illinois; that under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Illinois it is empowered to exercise the right of eminent domain and to construct lines of telegraph along and upon any railroad within the State in such manner and at such points as not to incommode the public use of said railroad; that the Southeast and St. Louis Railway Company, one of the defendants, is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Illinois, and is the owner of a railroad having a right of way varying from twenty-five feet to two hundred feet in width, extending easterly out of the city of East St. Louis through a portion of the counties of St. Clair, Clinton, Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton and White, to the center thread of the permanent stream of the Wabash river, in said White county, and that said railroad company is also the owner of two certain branches of railroad also located within the State of Illinois; that said railroad and its said two branches extend in all a distance of about 179 miles; that the Southeast and St. Louis Railway Company, on January 27, 1881, leased to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, would constitute a joint line of poles and wires, which would result in constant conflict of authority and responsibility, and the court has no authority to impose a joint arrangement upon the defendants. The objections sustained by the court were: That the petitioner cannot acquire a right of way by a stipulation not agreed to by the railroad companies; that petitioner has no power to bind a railroad as to how it shall use its own right of way; that the defendant the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company is entitled to use its right of way free from interference, joint possession, ownership or partnership of a pole line with the petitioner; that petitioner cannot gain the benefits and advantages of the stipulation without a written contract, and defendants decline to enter into a written contract with petitioner; that the right of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to maintain and operate an existing telegraph line owned by it and devoted to public service, and to erect and maintain additional telegraph and telephone wires, is necessary to efficiently carry on its railroad business, and its right to enjoy the free and separate use and possession of said property independently of other control or ownership is of great value, of which it cannot be deprived in the proceedings without violating the fourteenth amendment of the Federal constitution, or interfering with the transaction of its interstate and intrastate business, in violation of the act of Congress approved July 24, 1866.

From the order sustaining these objections and dismissing the petition the petitioner prayed an appeal to this court, and assigns as error the action of the county court in sustaining the objections and dismissing the petition to condemn. Appellees have assigned as cross-errors the action [408] of the county court in overruling the other objections to the petition.

It was assumed by the court and the parties that the objections and the motion to dismiss the petition put in issue the sufficiency of the petition and the petitioner's right to condemn, and upon this issue evidence was taken, without objection, by both parties as to the status of the parties to the suit, their previous business relations and dealings, and other matters leading up to the filing of the petition to condemn. These facts, so far as material, are as follows:

On June 18, 1884, the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, entered into a written contract whereby the railroad company granted to the telegraph company for a term of twenty-five years from July 1, 1884, the exclusive right to construct and maintain telegraph lines upon the rights of way owned or controlled by the railroad company during the existence of the contract. It was further provided that after the expiration of twenty-five years the contract should continue in force until the expiration of one year after written notice should be given by one of the parties to the other of an intention to terminate the same. The telegraph company, among other things, agreed to set apart one wire for the preferential use of the railroad company, and further agreed that if the railroad company should at any time require greater wire facilities on any portion of its road the telegraph company would furnish an additional wire for the railroad company at the cost price thereof upon its poles, or the railroad company might at its own cost string such additional wire upon the telegraph company's poles in such manner and position as the telegraph company might direct. In 1901 the telegraph company, at the request of the railroad company, strung an additional wire for the railroad company upon its poles, and the cost thereof, amounting to $3,820.61, was paid by the [409] railroad company. This wire has ever since remained upon the poles of the telegraph company and has been used exclusively by the railroad company. In 1902 the Western Union rebuilt its system along the railroad company's right of way and placed the poles in new places on the south side of the right of way and about five feet laterally from the old poles. The wires used by the railroad company were moved to other places on the cross-arms and poles selected by the telegraph company, and the telegraph company continued to maintain, repair and furnish current for these wires so used by the railroad company to the date of filing this petition. On August 17, 1911, the telegraph company served notice upon the railroad company that it would on August 17, 1912, terminate the contract above mentioned. On October 5, 1911, the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois was organized under the laws of this State with a capital stock of $25,000, for the purpose of owning, constructing, maintaining and operating lines of magnetic telegraph in the State of Illinois. The subscribers to the capital stock were all officers or employees of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and their subscriptions to the capital stock were paid by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. The directors and officers of the Illinois corporation were elected from among the stockholders. It also appears that the organization of the Illinois corporation was brought about by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York for the purpose of condemning the right of way sought in the petition subsequently filed. In November, 1911, the charter of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company was amended, and the railroad company, in addition to the powers conferred upon it by its original charter, was thereby authorized to construct and operate telegraph and telephone lines, not only for use in operating its railroad, but also for the purpose of serving the public as a common carrier of messages. On January 12, 1912, the president of [410] the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois directed the district foreman of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York to locate a telegraph-pole line for the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois along the right of way of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company in Illinois, and to locate such line practically on the same line then occupied by the poles and wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. These instructions were carried out, and the line was located on the south side of the railroad right of way and followed the line then occupied by the poles and wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. On January 31, 1912, the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois made a formal offer to the railroad company of five dollars per mile for an easement for a pole line upon the railroad right of way. This offer was refused, and the railroad company refused to submit a counter-offer or state what it was willing to do. On February 3, 1912, the petitioner filed its original petition to condemn the right of way described in said petition, in the county court of St. Clair county. On February 9, 1912, the board of directors of the petitioning company, by resolution, determined to accept, and did by appropriate action accept, the obligations and restrictions of the act of Congress approved July 24, 1866. On February 12, 1912, the Post-master General of the United States acknowledged the receipt and filing in the post-office department at Washington of said acceptance of the act of Congress. On the 27th day of February, 1912, employees of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, acting under oral instructions from its chief engineer, laid out and located a proposed telegraph-pole line for said railroad company upon the southerly side of its right of way in Illinois, selecting practically the same location as that described by petitioner in its letter of January 12, 1912, and in its original and amended condemnation petitions filed on February 3 and February 16, 1912, respectively, and practically [411] identical with the proposed pole line theretofore located by employees of the petitioning company on the railroad company's right of way in Illinois between the 16th and 22d days of January, 1912. Instructions for this work were given February 1 and afterwards commenced on the line of the road in Tennessee, but the locating was not commenced in Illinois, as shown by the evidence, until February 27, 1912. On August 5, 1912, the railroad company gave written notice to the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York requiring the latter to commence immediately after August 17, 1912, to remove from the railroad right of way and premises all the poles, wires, batteries, instruments, appliances and other fixtures comprising the telegraph line, and to complete such removal previous to December 1, 1912. The telegraph company was further notified that in default of its compliance with such requirement of removal previous to the prescribed date, the railroad company would take possession of, appropriate and use, after that date, all the telegraph company's poles, cross-arms, wires, batteries, instruments, appliances and other fixtures remaining at that time on the railroad company's right of way or premises, and would hold or otherwise dispose of the same as its own property and refuse to longer permit the telegraph company to use the same for any purpose. The railroad company further gave notice that it would be compelled to make use of the telegraph company's poles and wires for telegraph business in conducting the railroad's business until the removal of the telegraph company's lines, because of the inability of the railroad company meanwhile to erect its own telegraph or telephone poles. On October 14, 1912, the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York filed its bill of complaint in the district court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky to enjoin the threatened action by the railroad company until the termination of various condemnation proceedings pending in the various States, among others by petitioner in Illinois. [412] Thereafter an injunction issued and the status quo of the property has since been thereby preserved, the order of the court issuing the injunction having been affirmed by the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit. (Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 207 Fed. 1, 124 C. C. A. 573.) On the 14th of November, 1912, the board of directors of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company adopted a resolution which recited that in October, 1912, the president had given instructions to the fourth and first vice-presidents to proceed to assemble the materials and to construct a pole line in Illinois for carrying telephone wires thereon, and in locating the poles to consult the signal engineer so as to facilitate the attachment of electric automatic block signals, and it was resolved that the acts of the first and fourth vice-presidents, and the location and selection of the company's right of way by the engineer's department (in Illinois on February 27, 1912), be ratified, approved and confirmed. On the 18th day of November, 1912, the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York entered into a written agreement with the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois, petitioner herein, whereby the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York agreed to sell and convey to the former all the telegraph lines and telegraph property belonging to it and theretofore used by it in connection with the operation of its lines of telegraph along the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company within the State of Illinois. The conveyance was to be made upon the acquisition by the petitioner, the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois, of the right to construct, maintain and operate lines of telegraph along the right of way of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company within the State of Illinois and upon the payment of $25,000.

The main question to be determined at the present stage of the litigation between the parties hereto is the right of the appellant company to bring the condemnation suit in [413] question under the Eminent Domain law of this State. All the reasons urged against the right of appellant to maintain its action, as embraced in the objections filed to the petition, may be divided into two general classes: (1) Those going to the validity of the law under which the suit is brought, as to one of the defendants; (2) those concerning the effect the condemnation would have on the public use of the railroad whose right of way is sought.

As to the first contention, the law allowing telegraph companies to exercise the right of eminent domain was enacted in 1874. (Hurd's Stat. 1913, p. 2419.) The first three sections of the law are as follows:

"Sec. 1. That every company heretofore incorporated under any general or special law, or which may be incorporated under any general law of this State for the construction or operation of any telegraph line through or in this State, shall possess the powers and privileges and be subject to the duties, restrictions and liabilities prescribed in this act.

"Sec. 2. Every such company may enter upon any lands for the purpose of making surveys and examinations with a view to the erection of any telegraph line, and take and damage private property for the erection and maintenance of such lines, and may, subject to the provisions contained in this act, construct lines of telegraph along and upon any railroad, road, highway, street or alley, along or across any of the waters or lands within this State, and may erect poles, posts, piers or abutments for supporting the insulators, wires and other necessary fixtures of their lines, in such manner and at such points as not to incommode the public use of the railroad, highway, street or alley, or interrupt the navigation of such waters.

of telegraph, to take or damage any property, the same may be done and the compensation therefor ascertained and made in the manner [414] which may be at that time provided by law for the exercise of the right of eminent domain."

It is not pointed out in the able and exhaustive brief of counsel for appellees in what respect this law is contrary to the constitution of this State. The law has been in force many years and has received the consideration of this court. (St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. 173 Ill. 508, 51 N. E. 382.) Similar laws have been enacted by several States of the Union, and these laws have been construed and passed upon many times, not only by the courts of last resort of those States but by the Federal courts, and the right of the law-making power of a sovereign State to enact such laws cannot be questioned. As recognized by all authorities, eminent domain is a right inherent in all sovereignties, and is defined as the right of the nation or the State, or of those to whom the power has been lawfully delegated, to condemn private property for public use, and to appropriate the ownership or possession of such property for such use upon paying the owner due compensation, to be ascertained according to law. (15 Cyc. 557.) It would seem that the above law was enacted in view of the commercial necessities of the times. The telegraph is a very important aid to business and to the welfare of the people generally. In enacting the law the legislature recognized the fact that telegraph lines would ordinarily follow the shortest routes between the centers of population,—the towns and cities,—and that such routes as were most available were at that time, and would be in the future, to some extent occupied by public roads and by railroads, and for that reason it included the provisions of the second section of the act, which permits telegraph companies to construct lines along and upon any railroad, road, highway, street, etc., in such manner and at such points as not to incommode the public use of such railroad, highway or street. Since the enactment of the law of 1874 telephones have been invented and come into general use. In 1903 the law [415] was amended so as to apply to telephone lines and exchanges. We must decline to consider the constitutionality of this law at this time. The State, in its exercise of the powers of sovereignty, having full right to enact such laws, the only possible constitutional objection that could be urged would be that in regard to taking or damaging private property for public use without just compensation, and that is not sought to be done by the petition in question. On the contrary, the object of the proceeding is to ascertain, by means of a court and jury, in the manner provided by law, the compensation to which the defendants to the petition shall be entitled by reason of the occupancy of the railroad right of way, and we think that this sufficiently disposes of the objection made by appellees that the proceeding is contrary to the fifth amendment and to section 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States and to section 2 of article 2 of the constitution of Illinois, which constitutional enactments prohibit the taking or damaging of private property without just compensation.

It is also urged that one of the defendant companies, the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, is an interstate carrier engaged in the operation of a railroad in interstate commerce, and is not subject, because of section 8 of article 1 of the constitution of the United States (giving Congress power to regulate commerce among the States), and laws enacted by Congress in pursuance of such constitutional provision, to condemnation proceedings in a State court. The petition for condemnation avers, and the evidence sufficiently shows, that the owner of the fee in the right of way sought to be condemned is the Southeast and St. Louis Railway Company, which is an Illinois corporation. The proceeding, therefore, is one by the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois, an Illinois corporation, against the Southeast and St. Louis Railway Company, also an Illinois corporation, as owner of the right of way, and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, [416] as lessee thereof. No Federal law has been cited, and we are aware of none, which specifically prevents the exercise of the right of eminent domain under the sovereign powers of a State by a corporation lawfully organized and doing business under the laws of that State, against the property within that State of another corporation also organized and doing business under the laws of that State, leased to a corporation engaged in interstate commerce. If the contention of appellees in this respect is correct, then it would be impossible for a railroad or telegraph line, or any other corporation which would otherwise have the right of eminent domain, to condemn a right of way over or across the right of way of another railroad which might be engaged in interstate commerce. As there is hardly any railroad at the present day but that is engaged, to a greater or lesser extent, in interstate commerce, the State law of eminent domain would be a nullity. The right to so condemn in such a case has been upheld by this court in many cases and has never been questioned, so far as we are advised. Neither the Interstate Commerce law nor any other law which has been enacted by Congress pursuant to section 8 of article 1 of the constitution of the United States, which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the different States, has ever been held to give Congress the exclusive jurisdiction in such matters nor to deprive the State of the power to enact suitable legislation in regard to intrastate commerce on railroads, even though such railroads may also be engaged in interstate commerce. In the Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U. S. 352, Ann. Cas. 1916A 18, 33 S. Ct. 729, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1511, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151, known as the Minnesota Rate cases, it held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the States continue to possess the right to prescribe reasonable regulations for the exclusively internal traffic on interstate carriers after the passage of the Interstate Commerce act of 1887 (3 Fed. St. Ann. 816) and the amendment of June 29, 1906 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 254) although it may be that by reason of [417] the interblending of the interstate and intrastate operations of such carriers adequate regulation of interstate rates cannot be maintained without imposing requirements with respect to their intrastate rates which substantially affect the former, and, as stated in the opinion in the Simpson case, quoting from Escanaba, etc. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678, 2 S. Ct. 185, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 442: "But the States have full power to regulate, within their limits, matters of internal police, including in that general designation whatever will promote the peace, comfort, convenience and prosperity of their people. This power embraces the construction of roads, canals and bridges and the establishment of ferries, and it can generally be exercised more wisely by the States than by a distant authority. . . . When its [the State's] power is exercised so as to unnecessarily obstruct the navigation of the river or its branches, Congress may interfere and remove the obstruction, . . . but until Congress acts on the subject the power of the State over bridges across its navigable streams is plenary."

It is claimed, however, that by the passage of the Federal law of July 24, 1866, Congress has assumed all power over telegraph lines engaged in interstate commerce. The first and fourth sections of said act (U. S. Rev. Stat. 1901, sec. 3964) are as follows:

"Sec. 1. That any telegraph company now organized or which may hereafter be organized under the laws of any State in this Union, shall have the right to construct, maintain and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post-roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States: Provided, that such lines of telegraph shall be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post-roads. [418] And any of said companies shall have the right to take and use from such public lands the necessary stone, timber and other materials for its posts, piers, stations, and other needful uses in the construction, maintenance and operation of said lines of telegraph, and may pre-empt and use such portion of the unoccupied public lands subject to pre-emption through which its said lines of telegraph may be located, as may be necessary for its stations, not exceeding forty acres for each station; but such stations shall not be within fifteen miles of each other.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, that before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by this act, such company shall file their written acceptance with the Post-master General, of the restrictions and obligations required by this act." (7 Fed. St. Ann. 205, 212.)

Counsel for appellees cite the case of Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 U. S. 540, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 312, 1 Ann. Cas. 533, as sustaining the contention that under the Federal law above set out the petitioner cannot condemn a right of way for its telegraph line. But such is not the holding in that case. On the contrary, the decision in that case seems to hold that such right, if exercised at all, must be under a State statute. The main holding in that case is, that under the congressional enactment of July 24, 1866, a telegraph company does not possess, by virtue of that law, alone, the power to condemn a right of way for its telegraph line on the right of way of a railroad. In the opinion the earlier case of Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 708, is referred to and explained. In the latter case it was held that a telegraph company organized under the laws of the State of Florida and having by its charter the exclusive right to construct and operate a telegraph line in certain counties in that State, could not prevent, by injunction, an interstate telegraph company from erecting and maintaining its line along the line of a railroad running through the [419] counties in question when the interstate telegraph company had by private agreement been granted that right by the railroad company. The holding was, in brief, that the law of 1866 in effect amounts to prohibiting all State monopolies in commercial intercourse by telegraph. In the Pennsylvania Railroad case, which arose in the United States circuit court for the district of New Jersey, the Supreme Court, in deciding, as aforesaid, that the telegraph company had no right, under the Federal law, to exercise the right of eminent domain expressly commented upon the fact that the statute of New Jersey did not make the railroad right of way public property, so as to subject it to occupation by the telegraph company under the provisions of the Federal law of 1866, and further commented upon the fact that the statute of New Jersey did not confer the right of eminent domain upon the telegraph company. In the opinion of the court occurs the following language: "In Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 104 Fed. 623, and Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 114 Fed. 787, there were views expressed favorable to the contentions made in the case at bar by the telegraph company, but the judgments in both cases were ultimately rested upon the local statutes,—Idaho and Montana,—which granted the right of eminent domain to telegraph companies. We may also observe that the first case went to the circuit court of appeals of the ninth circuit. That court sustained the judgment of the circuit court upon the statute of Idaho and upon general legal principles. It did not refer to the act of 1866. (49 C. C. A. 663; 111 Fed. 843.) In Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Southern R. Co. 89 Fed. 190, and Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 94 Fed. 234, the act of 1866 was more directly passed on. Both cases were proceedings in eminent domain,—one brought in the courts of North Carolina and removed to the circuit court of the [420] United States, the other brought in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio. In passing on the sufficiency of the petition in the first case, Judge Simonton said that the right of petitioner to construct its lines along the right of way of post-roads of the United States was given under the act of Congress of 1866, but, he observed, the mode or method of exercising the right conferred was fixed by the laws of the several States, and it was exclusive in its character in ascertaining the amount of compensation to be allowed. The right of the telegraph company was therefore considered and adjudged under the North Carolina statutes. In the second case a motion was made to dismiss on the ground that the power of eminent domain was not conferred by any law of the United States or the State of Ohio. The motion was sustained." In the same case (Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co.) there was a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan, in which he holds that the telegraph company has, by implication, the right to exercise the right of eminent domain under the congressional enactment of 1866, but it is nowhere intimated, either in the opinion of the court or in the dissenting opinion, that such companies do not have the right to exercise the right of eminent domain under State laws granting that right. On the contrary, as the excerpt from the opinion which we have set out above shows, such right seems to be fully recognized and acquiesced in. A review of the decisions in other Federal cases cited in the opinion will show that such rights have been recognized and passed on by such courts under the eminent domain laws of the States of Idaho, Montana, North Carolina and Ohio, and similar State statutes involving the right of a telegraph company to condemn a railroad right of way under eminent domain have been involved in the following cases, and in each case, although the railroad opposed the right of the telegraph company to condemn, the telegraph company was successful and in none of them was [421] the question of the unconstitutionality of the State law intimated: St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. supra; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106; Savannah, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 112 Ga. 941, 38 S. E. 353; Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 120 Ala. 21, 24 So. 408; Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Tel. Co. 101 Tenn. 62, 46 S. W. 571; Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 76 Miss. 731, 26 So. 370, 45 L.R.A. 223; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Morgan's Louisiana, etc. R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 58, 21 So. 183; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Louisiana Western R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 1270, 22 So. 219; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Southern R. Co. supra; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. supra; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. supra; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. supra.

In the recent case of Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. supra, decided by the United States circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit, which was a suit to enjoin a condemnation suit instituted by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York against the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company under a statute of the State of Kentucky which allows foreign telegraph companies to exercise the right of eminent domain, the court expressly held that the Kentucky statute was not invalid as attempting to regulate interstate commerce. The Illinois statute, when properly enforced in such cases, would not conflict with the Interstate Commerce law, as the right of telegraph companies to condemn is subject to the provision that such condemnation shall not incommode the public use of the railroad, and when the condemnation is made in such manner the railroad will not be incommoded in its public use as an interstate carrier [422] or otherwise. In Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 225, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that a telegraph line so constructed and maintained as not to interfere with the transportation of passengers and goods beyond the State is not a burden on interstate commerce.

There is another point that remains to be considered in connection with the possible conflict that may arise between State and Federal jurisdiction by permitting the petitioner to condemn the right of way to the center thread of the permanent stream of the Wabash river. By the act of Congress of April 18, 1818, enabling the People of Illinois to form a constitution and State government and fixing the boundaries of the State, the southeastern boundary was fixed as beginning at the mouth of the Wabash river, thence up the same, etc. It was further provided in that act that the State of Illinois should have concurrent jurisdiction with the State of Indiana on the Wabash river so far as said river shall form a common boundary to both, and also concurrent jurisdiction on the Mississippi river with any State or States to be formed west thereof, so far as said river shall form a common boundary to both. The constitutions of Illinois of 1818, 1848 and 1870 have followed the enabling act of Congress in establishing these boundaries, and it has been held that when the middle of a navigable river becomes the boundary line between two States, the middle of the current or channel of commerce will be regarded as the boundary line. (Keokuk, etc. Bridge Co. v. People, 145 Ill. 596, 34 N. E. 482; Iowa v. Illinois, 147 U. S. 1, 13 S. Ct. 239, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 55.) The phrases "middle of the river" and "middle of the main channel" are equivalent expressions and both mean the main line of the channel, or, as it is frequently expressed, the middle thread of the current. (Buttenuth v. St. Louis Bridge Co. 123 Ill. 535, 17 N. E. 439, 5 Am. St. Rep. 545.) There is no doubt that the Wabash river is a navigable river, and as such it is under the control of the United States, and [423] it is not within the power of a State to interfere with such control or navigability. The congressional enactment of 1866 regarding telegraph lines, which we have heretofore set out, expressly gives telegraph lines the right to cross navigable rivers in the United States in such way as shall not interfere with the navigability thereof, and it appears from the evidence in this case that the petitioning telegraph company has accepted the provisions of that act and such acceptance has been approved by the Post-master General of the United States. Petitioner only seeks to construct the proposed telegraph line across any lands or waters within this State in accordance with the laws of this State and in such manner as will not interrupt the navigation of such waters. All that petitioner seeks to do by its petition is to condemn a right of way within the regular boundaries of the State of Illinois, which it has full right to do if it has any right to condemn at all, and if granted that right by the courts of this State it will only be such right as the State could give, and would be no protection to the petitioner in anything it might do which would involve conflict with the authority of the Federal government over the Wabash river. For these reasons we do not think the objection well taken.

There were other objections which are the subject of cross-errors of the appellee companies, as to the sufficiency of the petition, the description of the portion of the right of way sought to be condemned, and the failure to agree on compensation. These questions have received the consideration of this court in the case of St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. supra, in which it was held that the petition there considered, which was very similar to the petition in the case at bar, was sufficient. As is stated in the opinion: "To locate each pole by an individual description, so as to designate by metes and bounds the exact spot of earth occupied by each, would require the insertion in the petition of 4500 separate descriptions. The [424] very statement of such a proposition shows its unreasonableness." It was also held in that case that it was not necessary to file a plat of the location of the proposed line of telegraph. The court further held that where an offer has been made by the telegraph company for the use of the right of way, and the owner, as was shown by the petition in this case, refuses to sell, there is sufficient showing of a failure to agree on the compensation.

It is further objected that the petitioning company is neither a de jure nor de facto corporation, and that it is acting collusively and fraudulently with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. The incorporation proceedings are regular on their face and the petitioner is regularly organized and in a position to transact the business and exercise the powers for which it was organized. If it has been organized in an unlawful manner or for an unlawful purpose, even if there were evidence to that effect, it could not be considered in a collateral proceeding. Brown v. Calumet River R. Co. 125 Ill. 600, 18 N. E. 283, and cases cited.

It remains to consider the second series of objections to the petition which were sustained by the court below, that the construction and operation of the telegraph line would incommode the public use of the railroad, that appellees had the preferential right to the construction of a telegraph line in the interest of the public, and that property already devoted to public use cannot be condemned for another public use.

The appellees introduced a large amount of evidence as tending to show that a telegraph line along the right of way of a railroad company is a serious detriment to the operation of the railroad, and there was a large amount of evidence offered on behalf of appellant to the effect that a telegraph line would not interfere with or incommode the public use of the railroad. It appears from the notice served upon the Western Union Telegraph Company of [425] New York by appellee the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to remove the poles and wires already there, that the railroad company attempted to reserve the right to use such poles for its own telegraph signal purposes until it could erect its own line of poles on the right of way. We can only infer from the evidence that a telegraph system built in substantially the same manner as the system proposed to be erected by appellant has been and is now, and will be for many years, in use on the right of way in question. In fact, it appears from the evidence that a telegraph line has been on the right of way for some forty years, and it is in keeping with our common observation and knowledge of such matters that a telegraph line is necessary to the proper operation of any railroad system and that such telegraph line on the right of way does not incommode the public use of a railroad. In St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. supra, it was held that two telegraph lines would not incommode the public use of a railroad with a right of way similar to the one in this case. At the present time the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York has strung on its poles and has devoted to the use of the railroad company two wires, which are apparently sufficient for its needs. By an amendment to its petition the petitioning company has offered as follows: "That petitioner does not seek hereby to acquire the space occupied, at the time of the filing of the petition herein, by any wire or wires on the said railroad right of way which the said defendant railroad company at such time may have owned or operated; and petitioner represents, offers, stipulates and agrees that it will accommodate, carry and support upon petitioner's said proposed telegraph-pole line such wire or wires as the said railroad company, at the time of the filing of the petition herein, owned or operated upon said railroad right of way and such additional telegraph or telephone wires as may thereafter be needed by said railroad company in the conduct of [426] its business, and afford to said railroad company like benefits and advantages, in respect to position and operation of all of said wires, as said railroad company enjoyed at the time of the filing of the petition herein." The petitioner had a right to amend its petition and thereby limit the character of the easement sought to be condemned. The reason for making the amendment was, that it developed on the trial that the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company had, by permission or license from the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, strung a telephone wire and some signal wires for short distances at certain places on the poles of the telegraph company, which were in use in operating the road. The court below had also announced its finding that one of the wires of the Western Union system was the property of the railroad company, and it was therefore considered that the telegraph line was jointly owned and operated by both the railroad and telegraph companies, and the railroad company had in use and operation a telegraph line necessary for its own use along the right of way in the identical place sought to be condemned by the petitioner. We think the holding of the trial court as to the ownership of the wire in question was erroneous. It appears from the evidence that in 1884 the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York had installed and was the owner of a complete telegraph system along the line of the Louisville and Nashville railroad. That year a contract was made whereby the Western Union set apart one of the wires of the system so installed and owned by it, for the use of the railroad company. It was provided in the contract "that if the railroad company shall at any time require greater wire facilities on any portion of its road than herein provided, the telegraph company will furnish an additional wire at the cost price thereof upon its poles, or the railroad company may at its own cost string said additional wire upon the telegraph company's poles in such manner and position as it may direct." The contract [427] further provided that the telegraph lines and wires covered by the contract shall form part of the general system of the telegraph company. Had the railroad company exercised its right, under the contract, to "at its own cost string said additional wire upon the telegraph company's poles in such manner and position as it may direct," there would be some reason for holding that such wire belonged to the railroad company. The evidence shows that when the railroad company desired another wire it requested the telegraph company to furnish and string the wire. Such wire was only a part of the accommodation furnished. The telegraph company furnished with it support from its poles and cross-arms, electric current from its batteries and the necessary connections, and other things which made the wire part of the entire system and which were much greater than the cost of the wire when placed on the company's poles. The effect of the contract and the transaction consummated pursuant thereto was, that the telegraph company added an additional wire to its system and the railroad company paid a certain price for its use. At the time of filing the suit the contract between the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company had been terminated by notice duly given as provided, and subsequently the railroad company gave the Western Union notice to remove all its poles, wires and other property from the railroad right of way, and they have only been kept there since by the injunction of the United States district court. It is doubtless true that the railroad company has a right to construct a telegraph line as a necessary part of the equipment with which to operate its road. It is also true that if the railroad company had constructed such line the petitioner could not, by condemnation, take the identical location occupied by the railroad company, to the injury of the latter. This it is not seeking to do. The statute gives the petitioner the right to condemn along and upon the right of way of the appellees. [428] There is a difference between damaging the railroad and incommoding the public use of the road. The statute giving the right to condemn assumes that there will be damage suffered by the railroad company whose property is taken, and provides how such damage may be ascertained and compensation allowed by a jury. The only difference between railroads and public roads and other premises in condemnation proceedings is, that the telegraph company shall erect its poles, posts, etc., "in such manner and at such points as not to incommode the public use of the railroad, highway, street," etc. The petition sufficiently avers that the proposed system shall be constructed in such manner as not to incommode the public use of the railroad. The public use of the railroad means the ordinary use to which the railroad is put, as a common carrier, in transporting passengers and freight. Such use requires two lines of telegraph wire along the road and some few telephone and signal wires at some points. The petitioning company agrees to so install and construct its system that all these appliances necessary for the railroad in its public use shall not be interfered with, or, in other words, in such manner that the railroad shall not be incommoded in its public use. With the wisdom of the law which gives telegraph companies the right to condemn we have nothing to do. It is only within the power of the courts to say whether or not the petitioner has brought itself within the law so that it is entitled to condemn. South Park Com'rs v. Ward, 248 Ill. 299, 21 Ann. Cas. 127, 93 N. E. 910; Chicago Rock Island, etc. R. Co. v. Lake, 71 Ill. 333.

So far as the railroad company seeks to retain the present location of the telegraph line for its own telegraph line for commercial purposes it cannot claim a preferential right. In such case it is the same as any other company and can claim no preferential right, and the preference is to be given, in condemnation proceedings, to the one who first locates the line which is in dispute. (Golconda Northern [429] Ry. v. Gulf Lines Connecting R. Co. 265 Ill. 194, Ann. Cas. 1916A 833, 106 N. E. 818, and cases there cited.) The evidence in this case shows that the line of the petitioning company was located January 12, 1912. The same line was not located by the railroad company until February 27, 1912. Under the circumstances, therefore, if the railroad company refuses to accept such stipulation or opposes the condemnation on the terms offered by the petitioner, which it has full right to do, it will be in no position to complain that it is incommoded in the business use of its road, where such incommoding is caused by its own acts. By the petition as amended the petitioner offers, as a condition to being granted the right to condemn, to do certain things. If these things are done the road will not be incommoded in its public use. The amendment to the petition was more than an offer or stipulation that had to be accepted by the appellees to become of binding force and effect. It limited the character and nature of the easement sought. It is the same as if a railroad company sought to condemn a right of way over the right of way of another railroad. If a petitioning company offered to construct an overhead or an underground crossing so as not to interfere with the operation of another road, it would be so limited in the judgment of the court and damages would be recoverable on that basis. It would not be allowed a judgment for a grade crossing. In St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. supra, this court held that allegations in the petition as to the offer of the petitioning company to move its poles in case the railroad company should in the future lay down another track or erect certain structures on the right of way were valid and binding, citing Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Joliet, etc. R. Co. 105 Ill. 388, 44 Am. Rep. 799, and Peoria, etc. Union R. Co. v. Peoria, etc. R. Co. 105 Ill. 110. In Eldorado, etc. R. Co. v. Sims, 228 Ill. 9, 81 N. E. 782, this court said: "It is not uncommon, in condemnation [430] proceedings to acquire property for right of way purposes, to permit the party seeking to condemn, to stipulate as to the manner in which the land shall be used, or that the party seeking to condemn will perform certain things connected with or upon the land, such as fencing the right of way, erecting crossings, putting in culverts, underground passageways, etc. We think the right to make stipulations upon the part of the condemning party which do not affect the rights of the public by rendering the right of way sought to be acquired unsafe to the traveling public for use for railroad right of way purposes, and which tend to lessen the damages to the land owner, is in conflict with no rule of public policy." It is the nature of the easement which is sought to be condemned that distinguishes the case at bar from the case of Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 225, relied upon by appellees. In that case the Western Union Telegraph Company operated its telegraph system on two lines of poles,—one line on each side of the track of the railroad company. The telegraph company was operating its lines under a contract with the railroad company, which was apparently the same contract heretofore referred to, dated June 18, 1884, and which ran from July 1, 1884, and was to continue for twenty-five years, and thereafter until one year after notice by either party to terminate the contract. The telegraph company served notice on the railroad company of its intention to terminate the contract, and commenced proceedings, under the statute, to condemn a right of way for its line along the right of way of the railroad company on both sides of the railroad track and along the same location on one side of the track claimed by the railroad company as necessary to maintain a telegraph line for the operation of its road. The railroad company had at its own expense strung certain wires on the poles of the telegraph company for its exclusive use in operating its railroad and was using said wires at the time of the condemnation [431] proceeding. There was no limitation in the character of the easement sought to be condemned, as in the case at bar, and had the petition to condemn been granted, the railroad company would have been deprived of its telegraph lines as they were located and compelled to construct a telegraph system necessary to operate its road on some other part of its right of way and subject to the prior location of the telegraph company. Under these circumstances the court said in the opinion in that case: "These conflicting claims must be solved by the rule that property dedicated to one public use cannot be subjected to another public use except in cases where the latter use does not materially interfere with the former." The court further held that while the railroad company has a preferential selection of the portion of the right of way upon which to construct and operate its own telegraph line necessary for the proper operation of said road, a telegraph company may condemn a right of way on and along the right of way of a railroad company when the proposed line of telegraph will be so constructed as to produce no material interference with the railroad company's free exercise of its franchise or with the actual operation of the railroad. In that case the court also held that a railroad company cannot defeat the exercise of the right of eminent domain by a telegraph company in constructing a line of telegraph on a portion of its right of way, by the construction and maintenance of a line on both sides of its track when a line on one side of its track is ample to furnish it with necessary telegraph service. It was further held in that case that a telegraph company will not be permitted to condemn the right of way of a railroad company for the construction and maintenance of its line of telegraph in such a manner as to materially interfere with the railroad company in the operation of its trains and in the transportation of passengers and goods.

Another contention of appellees is that appellant is seeking to condemn for its purposes property already occupied [432] and subjected to the same use, and that it has a preferential right to construct a telegraph system where the present system of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York is now located. In the case at bar the most that appellees claim in the way of property subject to another use for telegraph purposes is one wire strung on poles not owned by appellees and supplied by an electric current not furnished by appellees. The space occupied by this wire, without the poles, cross-arms, insulators and other accessories of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, is all that can be claimed by appellees that will be taken, and that has been eliminated by the amendment to the petition to condemn. In all prior cases which have arisen in which was involved a condemnation of property already subjected to another public use, there has been some tangible, appreciable property involved. A condemnation proceeding under the Eminent Domain act is for the purpose of taking property. In this case appellees own no telegraph line or property of that nature that will be taken. It is necessary to keep in mind that the only questions in this case arise from the fact that appellant is a telegraph company seeking to condemn a portion of the right of way of appellees, which are railroad companies. It is true that the portion of the right of way sought to be condemned is occupied by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. That company is not a party to the suit, nor can it be said to be acting in collusion with appellant when appellant is doing exactly what the law authorizes it to do and the only thing it can do. There has been no attempt to conceal the facts or the relations between appellant and the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. The fact that appellant has made an arrangement with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York to buy its poles and wires, etc., furnishes no reason for saying that such acts are unlawful or in any way improper, nor can appellees truthfully claim that they have been in any way [433] hampered or prevented from exercising any rights which they may have exercised in the premises by reason of their contract with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. It is very plain from the record that from the time notice was first given to cancel the contract existing between the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and appellees, the latter, with full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances, have had full opportunity to take such action as their officers saw fit, and they did take all steps that they considered necessary. While it is true the petition to condemn was originally filed prior to the termination of the contract and after notice was given to terminate such contract, appellant has gained no advantage thereby. The injunction obtained from the Federal court by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, restraining appellees from removing the poles and wires of the New York company from the right of way of appellees, was not issued until November, 1912, while the contract was terminated pursuant to notice the preceding August.

For the reasons given, we think the case should have gone to a jury on the petition, as finally amended, to fix the damages.

The judgment of the county court of St. Clair county is affirmed in so far as it overruled the objections to the petition and amended petition and is reversed in so far as it sustained the objections to the petition and amended petition, and the cause will be remanded to that court, with directions to overrule all objections sustained, and for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed in part and remanded, with directions.

COOKE, J., FARMER, C. J., and DUNN, J. (dissenting).—In order to make our position clear we will restate the facts, so far as we consider them material to a decision of the case, as follows: In 1884 the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company and the Western Union Telegraph [434] Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, entered into a written contract whereby the railroad company granted to the telegraph company for a term of twenty-five years the exclusive right to construct and maintain telegraph lines upon the rights of way owned or controlled by the railroad company during the existence of the contract. It was further provided that after the expiration of twenty-five years the contract should continue in force until the expiration of one year after written notice should be given by one of the parties to the other of an intention to terminate the same. The telegraph company, among other things, agreed to set apart one wire for the preferential use of the railroad company, and further agreed that if the railroad company should at any time require greater wire facilities on any portion of its road the telegraph company would furnish an additional wire for the railroad company at the cost price thereof upon its poles, or the railroad company might at its own cost string such additional wire upon the telegraph company's poles in such manner and position as the telegraph company might direct. In 1901 the telegraph company, at the request of the railroad company, strung an additional wire for the railroad company upon its poles, and the cost thereof, amounting to $3,820.61, was paid by the railroad company. This wire has ever since remained upon the poles of the telegraph company and has been used exclusively by the railroad company.

On August 17, 1911, the telegraph company served notice upon the railroad company that it would on August 17, 1912, terminate the contract above mentioned. On October 5, 1911, the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois was organized under the laws of this State with a capital stock of $25,000, for the purpose of owning, constructing, maintaining and operating lines of magnetic telegraph in the State of Illinois. The subscribers to the capital stock were all officers or employees of the Western [435] Union Telegraph Company of New York, and their subscriptions to the capital stock were paid by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. These nominal stockholders of the Illinois corporation elected themselves directors, and chose one of their number, who was then superintendent and is now general manager in Chicago of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, as president of the new company. The post-office address of the business office of the new corporation was fixed at 111 West Jackson boulevard, in the city of Chicago, which is the Chicago address of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. It also appears from the record in this case that on October 11, 1911, the executive committee of the board of directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, the executive committee has heretofore authorized the termination of our contract with the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company and has authorized the condemnation of rights of way over the railway lines of the Louisville and Nashville railroad system; and whereas, in order to effect this object it may be desirable to acquire interests in the capital stock of other corporations organized for telegraph purposes; and whereas, under authority of the president $25,000 has been heretofore expended for that purpose in Illinois:

"Resolved, that such expenditures so made by authority of the president is hereby approved; and further, that the president is hereby authorized and empowered to make such other and further expenditures as in his judgment, from time to time, may be necessary in order to effect such condemnation of rights of way as aforesaid."

Thereafter, on December 13, 1911, the following proceedings were taken by the board of directors of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, as shown by the minutes of a meeting of the board: "President authorized to make such expenditures as in his judgment, from time to time, may be necessary to effect condemnation of rights of way along the Louisville and Nashville [436] system, including an initial expenditure of $25,000 for that purpose in Illinois."

In November, 1911, the charter of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company was amended, and the railroad company, in addition to the powers conferred upon it by its original charter, was thereby authorized to construct and operate telegraph and telephone lines, not only for use in operating its railroad, but also for the purpose of serving the public as a common carrier of messages.

On January 12, 1912, the president of the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois, who was also the general superintendent in Chicago of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, directed the district foreman of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York to locate a telegraph-pole line for the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois along the right of way of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company in Illinois, and to locate such line practically on the same line then occupied by the poles and wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. These instructions were carried out and the line was located on the south side of the railroad right of way and followed the line then occupied by the poles and wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York. On January 31, 1912, the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois made a formal offer to the railroad company of five dollars per mile for an easement for a pole line upon the railroad right of way. This offer was refused. On February 1, 1912, the railroad company began the location of proposed telegraph-pole lines along the rights of way embraced in its railroad system. This system extends through thirteen States and includes about 5000 miles of rights of way, of which only 179 miles are within this State. The work of locating the telegraph lines was begun at Union, Tennessee, and was continued; without interruption, until and including February 27, 1912, on which date the location of the line upon [437] the right of way in Illinois was completed. In the meantime, on February 3, 1912, the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois filed its petition in the county court of St. Clair county, as hereinbefore stated, to condemn a right of way for a telegraph-pole line upon and along all the right of way of the railroad company in this State. The petition, as finally amended, alleged that the petitioner had located its proposed telegraph line upon the right of way of the railroad company; that the line would be constructed of the best material and upon the most approved plans, on the southerly side of the railroad right of way, not less than seven feet from the nearest rail of the main line of the railroad, and that the poles would be so erected and the line so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct or interfere with the business or use of the railroad. It was further alleged that the petitioner does not seek to acquire the space occupied, at the time of the filing of the petition, by any wire or wires on the right of way which the railroad company at such time may have owned or operated, and the petitioner offered to accommodate, carry and support upon the proposed poles such wire or wires and such additional telegraph or telephone wires as might thereafter be needed by the railroad company in the conduct of its business. It also appeared upon the hearing below that the pole line now on the railroad right of way is located at the extreme outer edge of the right of way and as far from the railroad tracks as it is possible to construct a line on the right of way. The width of the right of way varies from 25 feet to 250 feet, the average width being a little less than 100 feet.

On August 5, 1912, the railroad company notified the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York that on and after August 17, 1912 (that being the date fixed by the notice from the telegraph company to the railroad company for the termination of the contract under which the telegraph company maintained its telegraph line upon the [438] railroad right of way) the use and occupation of the railroad right of way by the telegraph company would be without the permission or consent of the railroad company, and that unless the poles, wires and other property of the telegraph company were removed by December 1, 1912, the railroad company would take possession of all such property and use or dispose of the same as its own property. Thereupon the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York obtained an injunction in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky restraining the railroad company from taking action in accordance with its said notice until the termination of the condemnation proceedings then pending in various States, including Illinois. The evidence further discloses that on November 18, 1912, a contract was made between the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and the Western Union Telegraph Company of Illinois whereby the former company agreed to convey, transfer, assign and set over to the latter company all the telegraph lines and property belonging to it along and upon the right of way of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company within the State of Illinois, upon the acquisition by the Illinois corporation of the right to construct, maintain and operate telegraph lines along such right of way and upon the payment of $25,000 to the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York.

As we view the case it is necessary to consider but two of the grounds relied upon by appellees in support of the judgment in the county court: First, that the railroad company has a preferential right to locate a telegraph line upon and along its right of way; and second, that appellant is seeking to condemn property for a telegraph-pole line which is already devoted to the same public use.

The authority of a telegraph company to condemn a right of way for a telegraph line upon and along a railroad right of way is conferred upon domestic corporations [439] by an act entitled "An act to revise the law in relation to telegraph companies," approved March 24, 1874, in force July 1, 1874. (Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 134.) This statute does not confer upon a telegraph company the unlimited power to condemn a right of way for a telegraph line upon and along a railroad right of way, but it is only when the construction and maintenance of the proposed telegraph line will not "incommode the public use of the railroad" that such right of way can be obtained by condemnation. The statute thus clearly recognizes that the railroad company has a preferential right to the use of its right of way for railroad purposes, and only confers upon telegraph companies power to take a portion of the railroad right of way for the construction of a telegraph line when there is no reasonable necessity for the use of such portion by the railroad company in the operation of its railroad. The evidence in this case shows, and it is a matter of common knowledge, that a telegraph or telephone line is essential to the safe and proper operation of a railroad. The railroad company therefore has a right to use such portion of its right of way as may be necessary or suitable for the construction and maintenance of a telegraph or telephone line, and that it may construct its own pole line and refuse to accept an offer to string its wires upon the poles of another company is in our opinion too clear to admit of argument.

The only description in the petition of the right of way sought to be condemned is, that it is located on the southerly side of the railroad right of way and not less than seven feet from the nearest rail of the main line of the railroad. There is a further allegation in the petition that the time will be constructed "upon the most approved plans," and evidence was introduced by appellant tending to show that the words quoted are well understood in telegraph line construction as meaning, among other things, that the line is to be constructed as far as possible from [440] the nearest rail of the main line of the railroad. Such location would be the same as that now occupied by the line of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, and it is conceded by appellant that the portion of the railroad right of way which it seeks to condemn in this proceeding is practically identical with that upon which the line of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York is now located. The railroad company has also located the line which it proposes to construct, when the poles and wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York shall be removed, upon the same line. Appellant filed its petition for condemnation before the railroad company actually located its proposed line upon the right of way in controversy, and contends that it therefore has the prior right to take this portion of the railroad right of way for the construction of its telegraph line. The railroad company, however, had long prior to the filing of the petition herein acquired its right of way by contract with the Southeast and St. Louis Railway Company, and had a right, when the occasion arose, to construct and maintain a telegraph-pole line upon that right of way. Instead of exercising that right itself, it in 1884 contracted with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York to construct and maintain telegraph-pole lines upon its rights of way and to furnish it the telegraph service then considered necessary to operate the railroad, and by this contract obtained the further right, in case it should become necessary, to string an additional wire of its own upon the poles of the telegraph company. This arrangement obviated the necessity of the railroad company constructing its own pole line upon its right of way during the existence of this contract. On August 17, 1911, the telegraph company, in accordance with a provision of the contract, served notice upon the railroad company that the contract under which it was maintaining the telegraph line upon the railroad right of way and furnishing telegraph service to the railroad [441] company for the operation of its railroad would be terminated on August 17, 1912. Until the date fixed by the telegraph company for the termination of the contract no occasion would arise for the construction of a telegraph or telephone line by the railroad company upon its right of way or for the erection of poles to support its wires which were strung upon the poles of the telegraph company. Upon the termination of the contract the railroad company had a preferential right to the use of any particular portion of its right of way for a telegraph line, provided there was a bona fide intention on its part to construct such a line upon that particular portion of its right of way upon the termination of the contract or within a reasonable time thereafter. Appellant did not wait until the termination of the contract before filing its petition to condemn, but more than six months before the railroad company was under any obligation to begin the construction of its own line in order to preserve its preferential right to the use of that portion of its right of way for such purpose appellant sought to condemn that portion of the right of way which was most available for a telegraph-pole line and which was then being used by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and the railroad company, jointly, for a telegraph line. The evidence clearly shows that it was the bona fide intent of the railroad company to construct its own line upon this particular portion of its right of way when the poles of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York should be removed.

The fact that appellant located its line and filed its petition for condemnation before the railroad company actually located the line upon which it proposed to construct its own telegraph line upon the termination of the contract with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York does not give appellant the prior right to take that portion of the right of way which it seeks to condemn for a telegraph line. The mere filing of the petition by a company [442] seeking to condemn property for a public use does not give it priority over another corporation which has previously obtained by contract the same property for the same use. In Atlanta, etc. R. Co. v. Southern R. Co. 131 Fed. 657, 66 C. C. A. 601, it was said: "The only right which can be said to result from mere priority of time in the institution of such a proceeding is an equitable right of priority over a later effort to acquire the same property for a like purpose, whether by a like proceeding or contract with notice, actual or constructive. . . . Mere priority of right accorded to one petitioner over another upon the ground of priority in time should not have any retrospective operation, so as to give precedence over an earlier acquisition of the same right of way by contract."

In Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 225, the Supreme Court of Georgia, in considering the relative rights of the railroad company and the telegraph company where the latter had been occupying a portion of the railroad right of way under contract but had terminated the contract and was seeking to condemn a portion of the railroad right of way for telegraph lines, said: "The railroad company contends that it should have the right of prior selection in the location of a line of telegraph for railroad use, and that it intends to erect poles upon substantially the same location as at present occupied by those of the telegraph company. On the other hand, the telegraph company denies that the railroad company has any such right, but asserts that it has the right to select a route over the railroad company's right of way at any point which does not materially interfere with the railroad company in the conduct of its business. These conflicting claims must be solved by the application of the rule that property dedicated to one public use cannot be subjected to another public use, except in cases where the later use does not materially interfere with [443] the former. If the railroad company owned the existing line of telegraph and it was necessary to maintain and have it for the safe and convenient handling of its trains and cars, no one would seriously contend that the telegraph company could deprive the railroad company of its use by virtue of the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Assuming, of course, the necessity of a line of telegraph as auxiliary to the operation of a railroad company, the railroad company would have the same right in locating its telegraph lines as it would have in locating its railroad track or its depot and its warehouses on its own right of way. If a railroad company was originally constructing its track, could it be said that a telegraph company could arbitrarily select sites for its poles, so as to force the railroad company to build its tracks on a less desirable place on its right of way? Surely not. The fundamental basis of the principle of subjecting one public use to a second public use is that the first use must not be materially interfered with. It would, indeed, be a most unfair demand to make of the owner of property charged with the discharge of a public duty that he must make his property subservient to the convenience of the demandant, who desires it for another public use. The railroad company is held off, by its contract, from constructing its line of telegraph on that portion of its right of way which it prefers, and which it has selected, until the contract expires, and the telegraph company should not be given a preference because it is not fettered by the same contract in proceeding to condemn the same portions of the railroad right of way." This case is almost identical with the case at bar, and the reasoning of the Georgia court seems to us, upon legal principles, to be unanswerable. We do not agree with the majority that this case can be distinguished from the case at bar.

In our judgment the authorities upon this subject, as well as reason, support the contention that the railroad company in the case at bar has a preferential right to construct [444] its telegraph line upon that portion of its right of way which appellant seeks to condemn.

Another insuperable obstacle to granting the prayer of the petition for condemnation is, that at the time the petition was filed the property sought to be taken was devoted to the same public use for which appellant seeks to condemn it. This court has frequently held that property devoted to a public use cannot be condemned by another for the same public use. (Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 97 Ill. 506; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Belleville City R. Co. 158 Ill. 390, 41 N. E. 916; Suburban R. Co. v. Metropolitan West Side El. R. Co. 193 Ill. 217, 61 N. E. 1090.) As a result of the conclusion reached by the majority, appellant will obtain a judgment permitting it to enter upon the right of way, upon the payment of the compensation to be awarded the railroad company, and erect its poles at the identical places where the poles of the present line are located and string its wires in the same spaces that the present wires are strung. In fact, it appears to be the purpose of appellant to take over the poles, wires and fixtures of the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York on the railroad right of way instead of constructing a new line. It is true that the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York is not asserting its right, by reason of prior occupancy, to this portion of the railroad right of way until the termination of its contract, in opposition to appellant's petition to condemn. The reason why that company is not only not resisting the petition to condemn but has by contract since the filing of the petition herein shown its willingness to surrender its right of way to appellant is obvious. Appellant was organized by the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York for the express purpose of obtaining a right of way for a telegraph line upon the railroad right of way by condemnation, a foreign corporation having no power to obtain such right [445] of way by condemnation, and the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York is the beneficial owner of all of appellant's capital stock. The Western Union Telegraph Company of New York was not, however, at the time of the filing of the petition, the only party interested in the telegraph line located on the railroad right of way. The railroad company was also interested to the extent that it was, under its contract with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, entitled to demand that that company maintain its line of poles and wires on the railroad right of way until the termination of the contract, in order that it might be able to perform the duties and obligations owing by it to the railroad company under the terms of that contract. The Western Union Telegraph Company of New York should not be permitted to relieve itself from the performance of those duties and obligations nor deprive the railroad company of its preferential right to construct its own telegraph line upon the most desirable portion of its right of way upon the termination of the contract by consenting to the condemnation of the property upon which its line is located or by failing to object to such condemnation. Under such circumstances the railroad company has such an interest in the existing telegraph line as entitles it to urge as an objection to appellant's petition that the property sought to be taken was at the time of filing the petition, and is now, devoted to the same public use for which it is sought to be taken.

The majority opinion holds that the amendment to the petition merely limited the character of the easement sought to be condemned. This we consider to be manifestly erroneous. The evidence disclosed that the railroad company, at the time of the filing of the condemnation petition, was using the identical portion of the right of way for the same purpose for which it was sought to be condemned. That was fatal to appellant's petition, and in an attempt to obviate this objection it proposes the joint use of that portion [446] of the right of way by the railroad company and the telegraph company for the pole line; and the majority opinion holds that the railroad company must either accept this offer or remove its wires from that portion of its own right of way. In support of the proposition that this amendment was more than an offer or stipulation, in that it limited the character and nature of the easement sought, the majority opinion uses as an illustration the case of a railroad company seeking to condemn a right of way over the right of way of another railroad, and assumes a case in which the petitioning company offers to construct an overhead or underground crossing. This offer could only be for the purpose of reducing the amount of damages. An illustration more apt would be one where a railroad company should attempt to condemn the right of way of another railroad, and in order to obviate the objection that the property was already devoted to the same public use, would, in its petition, offer to permit the old company to use the right of way with it, jointly. It must be manifest that an offer of this kind would not entitle the petitioner to condemn. It should also be noted in this connection that the offer by the telegraph company does not state upon what terms it will permit the use of its poles, etc., by the railroad company. The only purpose that can be accomplished in any case by limiting the character of the easement sought to be condemned is to reduce the amount of the damages, and in no case can any such offer or provision in the petition operate to confer upon the petitioner a right to condemn which it otherwise would not have.

There is no basis for the statement in the majority opinion that this amendment was made because it had developed on the trial that the railroad company had, by permission of license from the telegraph company, strung a telephone wire and some signal wires for short distances at certain places on the poles of the telegraph company. We are unable to find any basis in the record for this statement, and [447] this is not the explanation given by the telegraph company of the reason for filing the amendment. It states in its brief and argument: "It may be argued that, regardless of the fact that the defendants had never located either a pole line of their own or any wire upon a pole line" of the telegraph company, "yet the mere fact that there existed one wire of the defendant carried on the poles of the New York Telegraph Company precludes any telegraph company . . . from condemning a right of way on the same side of the track or within a certain but undefined distance of that wire. It was to meet and overcome such an objection that petitioner added the amendment of January 12, 1914, to its condemnation petition."

The majority opinion also states in support of the conclusion that the wire claimed by the railroad company in fact belongs to the telegraph company, that this wire was only a part of the accommodation furnished; that the telegraph company furnished with it support for its poles and cross-arms, electric current from its batteries and necessary connections and other things which made the wire part of the entire system and which were much greater than the cost of the wire when placed on the company's poles. What is "much greater" the opinion does not point out. It does appear, however, from the record that the estimated cost of the wire, alone, and labor to put it up, was $2615.92. It also appears that in addition to stringing that wire the railroad company ordered that it be "cut into" certain stations and offices along the line, and that the final bill paid by the railroad company for "material used and labor, freight and other expenses," was $3820.61. It therefore appears that the railroad company paid all the cost connected with the installation of the wire ready for service; and so far as support of this wire by the poles and cross-arms of the telegraph company is concerned, that was part of the consideration for the use of the right of way by the telegraph company under its contract. The statement in the majority [448] opinion that "the effect of the contract, and the transaction consummated pursuant thereto, was that the telegraph company added an additional wire to its system and the railroad company paid a certain price for its use," is therefore not supported by the evidence.

The majority opinion also states: "At the time of filing the suit the contract between the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company had been terminated by notice duly given as provided." This is not an accurate statement and to us seems to be misleading. The contract was still in force when this suit was filed and the railroad company was still fettered by its contract with the New York Telegraph Company, the latter company having the right to continue the maintenance of its pole line on the railroad right of way to the exclusion of any such lines constructed by the railroad company. The petition herein was filed February 3, 1912, while the contract did not terminate until August 17, 1912, and for that reason the railroad company had had no opportunity to construct or begin the construction of its own line when the petition was filed. The majority opinion continues: "And subsequently the railroad company gave to the Western Union notice to remove all its poles, wires and other property from the railroad right of way." This notice was given on August 5,—twelve days before the time fixed by the telegraph company for terminating the contract,—and notified the telegraph company to begin such removal immediately after August 17. As between the railroad company and the New York Telegraph Company it was the duty of the latter company to comply with this notice.

The majority opinion assumes that the railroad company is bound to accept the offer of the telegraph company to permit it to string its wires on the poles of the telegraph company, and if it refuses to accept the offer it must construct its lines on some other part of its right of way, and [449] ignores the fact that the railroad company had, before the petition was filed, obtained by contract its right of way for a telegraph line. The case of Golconda Northern Ry. v. Gulf Lines Connecting R. Co. 265 Ill. 194, Ann. Cas. 1916A 833, 106 N. E. 818, is cited in the majority opinion as authority for the proposition that "preference is to be given in condemnation proceedings to the one who first locates the line which is in dispute." That is undoubtedly true where some third person owns the line

over which the right of way is located and condemnation proceedings are brought to secure this right of way. That case, however, was not a condemnation proceeding but was a bill in equity by one railroad company against another for an injunction to restrain the latter from interfering with, obstructing or hindering the plaintiff in the construction of its railroad through a certain narrow pass. The defendant was a grantee of another railroad company which had obtained deeds for its right of way through this pass from the owners of the land, such deeds containing conditions subsequent requiring the road to be constructed by a certain time. The complainant had subsequently obtained deeds from the same land owners for the same right of way through the pass, and claimed, among other things, that the former grants had become forfeited by the failure to construct the road within the time limits of the deeds, and therefore it held title to the right of way by virtue of subsequent deeds. The decision was against complainant, it being held that only the owners of the land, their heirs and devisees, could take advantage of a breach of a condition subsequent. Instead of being an authority in favor of the proposition announced in the majority opinion, it seems to us that this case recognizes the doctrine for which we contend, that one company may by deed or contract obtain the preferential right over another company seeking thereafter to obtain a right of way over the same premises for the same purpose. Moreover, there is a statute which applies to the location of rights of way by railroads [450] which requires a railroad company to file a plat showing the location of its railroad in the office of the recorder of deeds within six months after the railroad is located. (Hurd's Stat. 1913, chap. 109, sec. 9.)

The judgment of the county court should be affirmed.

In General.

It is well settled that property devoted to a public use may be condemned for another on the railroad right of way. The railroad company was also interested to the extent that it was, under its contract with the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York, entitled to demand that that company maintain its line of poles and wires on the railroad right of way until the termination of the contract, in order that it might be able to perform the duties and obligations owing by it to the railroad company under the terms of that contract. The Western Union Telegraph Company of New York should not be permitted to relieve itself from the performance of those duties and obligations nor deprive the railroad company of its preferential right to construct its own telegraph line upon the most desirable portion of its right of way upon the termination of the contract by consenting to the condemnation of the property upon which its line is located or by failing to object to such condemnation. Under such circumstances the railroad company has such an interest in the existing telegraph line as entitles it to urge as an objection to appellant's petition that the property sought to be taken was at the time of filing the petition, and is now, devoted to the same public use for which it is sought to be taken.

The majority opinion holds that the amendment to the petition merely limited the character of the easement sought to be condemned. This we consider to be manifestly erroneous. The evidence disclosed that the railroad company, at the time of the filing of the condemnation petition, was using the identical portion of the right of way for the same purpose for which it was sought to be condemned. That was fatal to appellant's petition, and in an attempt to obviate this objection it proposes the joint use of that portion [446] of the right of way by the railroad company and the telegraph company for the pole line; and the majority opinion holds that the railroad company must either accept this offer or remove its wires from that portion of its own right of way. In support of the proposition that this amendment was more than an offer or stipulation, in that it limited the character and nature of the easement sought, the majority opinion uses as an illustration the case of a railroad company seeking to condemn a right of way over the right of way of another railroad, and assumes a case in which the petitioning company offers to construct an overhead or underground crossing. This offer could only be for the purpose of reducing the amount of damages. An illustration more apt would be one where a railroad company should attempt to condemn the right of way of another railroad, and in order to obviate the objection that the property was already devoted to the same public use, would, in its petition, offer to permit the old company to use the right of way with it, jointly. It must be manifest that an offer of this kind would not entitle the petitioner to condemn. It should also be noted in this connection that the offer by the telegraph company does not state upon what terms it will permit the use of its poles, etc., by the railroad company. The only purpose that can be accomplished in any case by limiting the character of the easement sought to be condemned is to reduce the amount of the damages, and in no case can any such offer or provision in the petition operate to confer upon the petitioner a right to condemn which it otherwise would not have.

There is no basis for the statement in the majority opinion that this amendment was made because it had developed on the trial that the railroad company had, by permission of license from the telegraph company, strung a telephone wire and some signal wires for short distances at certain places on the poles of the telegraph company. We are unable to find any basis in the record for this statement, and [447] this is not the explanation given by the telegraph company of the reason for filing the amendment. It states in its brief and argument: "It may be argued that, regardless of the fact that the defendants had never located either a pole line of their own or any wire upon a pole line" of the telegraph company, "yet the mere fact that there existed one wire of the defendant carried on the poles of the New York Telegraph Company precludes any telegraph company . . . from condemning a right of way on the same side of the track or within a certain but undefined distance of that wire. It was to meet and overcome such an objection that petitioner added the amendment of January 12, 1914, to its condemnation petition."

The majority opinion also states in support of the conclusion that the wire claimed by the railroad company in fact belongs to the telegraph company, that this wire was only a part of the accommodation furnished; that the telegraph company furnished with it support for its poles and cross-arms, electric current from its batteries and necessary connections and other things which made the wire part of the entire system and which were much greater than the cost of the wire when placed on the company's poles. What is "much greater" the opinion does not point out. It does appear, however, from the record that the estimated cost of the wire, alone, and labor to put it up, was $2615.92. It also appears that in addition to stringing that wire the railroad company ordered that it be "cut into" certain stations and offices along the line, and that the final bill paid by the railroad company for "material used and labor, freight and other expenses," was $3820.61. It therefore appears that the railroad company paid all the cost connected with the installation of the wire ready for service; and so far as support of this wire by the poles and cross-arms of the telegraph company is concerned, that was part of the consideration for the use of the right of way by the telegraph company under its contract. The statement in the majority [448] opinion that "the effect of the contract, and the transaction consummated pursuant thereto, was that the telegraph company added an additional wire to its system and the railroad company paid a certain price for its use," is therefore not supported by the evidence.

The majority opinion also states: "At the time of filing the suit the contract between the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company had been terminated by notice duly given as provided." This is not an accurate statement and to us seems to be misleading. The contract was still in force when this suit was filed and the railroad company was still fettered by its contract with the New York Telegraph Company, the latter company having the right to continue the maintenance of its pole line on the railroad right of way to the exclusion of any such lines constructed by the railroad company. The petition herein was filed February 3, 1912, while the contract did not terminate until August 17, 1912, and for that reason the railroad company had had no opportunity to construct or begin the construction of its own line when the petition was filed. The majority opinion continues: "And subsequently the railroad company gave to the Western Union notice to remove all its poles, wires and other property from the railroad right of way." This notice was given on August 5,—twelve days before the time fixed by the telegraph company for terminating the contract,—and notified the telegraph company to begin such removal immediately after August 17. As between the railroad company and the New York Telegraph Company it was the duty of the latter company to comply with this notice.

The majority opinion assumes that the railroad company is bound to accept the offer of the telegraph company to permit it to string its wires on the poles of the telegraph company, and if it refuses to accept the offer it must construct its lines on some other part of its right of way, and [449] ignores the fact that the railroad company had, before the petition was filed, obtained by contract its right of way for a telegraph line. The case of Golconda Northern Ry. v. Gulf Lines Connecting R. Co. 265 Ill. 194, Ann. Cas. 1916A 833, 106 N. E. 818, is cited in the majority opinion as authority for the proposition that "preference is to be given in condemnation proceedings to the one who first locates the line which is in dispute." That is undoubtedly true where some third person owns the line

over which the right of way is located and condemnation proceedings are brought to secure this right of way. That case, however, was not a condemnation proceeding but was a bill in equity by one railroad company against another for an injunction to restrain the latter from interfering with, obstructing or hindering the plaintiff in the construction of its railroad through a certain narrow pass. The defendant was a grantee of another railroad company which had obtained deeds for its right of way through this pass from the owners of the land, such deeds containing conditions subsequent requiring the road to be constructed by a certain time. The complainant had subsequently obtained deeds from the same land owners for the same right of way through the pass, and claimed, among other things, that the former grants had become forfeited by the failure to construct the road within the time limits of the deeds, and therefore it held title to the right of way by virtue of subsequent deeds. The decision was against complainant, it being held that only the owners of the land, their heirs and devisees, could take advantage of a breach of a condition subsequent. Instead of being an authority in favor of the proposition announced in the majority opinion, it seems to us that this case recognizes the doctrine for which we contend, that one company may by deed or contract obtain the preferential right over another company seeking thereafter to obtain a right of way over the same premises for the same purpose. Moreover, there is a statute which applies to the location of rights of way by railroads [450] which requires a railroad company to file a plat showing the location of its railroad in the office of the recorder of deeds within six months after the railroad is located. (Hurd's Stat. 1913, chap. 109, sec. 9.)

The judgment of the county court should be affirmed.

Power of Telegraph or Telephone Company to Condemn Railroad Right of Way under State Statute.

In General, 689.

Grant of Right to Condemn:

In General, 692.

Validity of Grant, 692.

Sufficiency of Grant:

Express Statute, 694.

General Statute, 695.

In General.

It is well settled that property devoted to one public use may be condemned for another

which is of superior rank in respect to public necessity or which may be exercised consistently with the use first attaching. See 10 R. C. L. tit. Eminent Domain, pp. 182, 198. It is likewise settled that the construction of a telegraph or telephone line on a railroad right of way imposes an additional burden for which compensation must be made. See the notes to Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 1 Ann. Cas. 734, and Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Moosehead Telephone Co. 20 Ann. Cas. 721. See also 10 R. C. L. tit. Eminent Domain, p. 152. And since the use of land by a telegraph or telephone company is not superior in point of public utility to its use by a railroad company it is essential to the condemnation of the use of a right of way that it shall appear that the superimposed use will not interfere materially with that to which the property was previously devoted. Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. 120 Ala. 21, 24 So. 408; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 183 Ind. 258, 108 N. E. 951; Postal Tel. etc. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919; American Telephone, etc. Co. v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 202 Mo. 656, 101 S. W. 576. Whether such an interference will result is a question of fact, Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 225; as to which every case must be determined on its own facts, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 705. And the burden is on the telegraph company to show that its occupancy of the property is consistent with the proper performance by the railroad of its duties as a common carrier. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. v. Ohio Postal Tel. Co. 68 Ohio St. 306, 67 N. E. 890, 62 L.R.A. 941. It is, however, generally held that the presence of telegraph poles and wires on a railroad right of way does not materially interfere with the operation of the railroad. Thus in Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 120 Ala. 21, 24 So. 408, it was said: "It is proposed to so construct the line that it will not produce any material interference with the free exercise of the franchise of the railroad company, nor extend to that part of its right of way which is in actual use. Common knowledge teaches that there is ample space on the 100 feet of the railroad's right of way, for two or more telegraph lines, without obstructing the free and ample use for railroad purposes." So in Postal Tel. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919, the court said: "Under the general grant of authority to condemn, given to telegraph companies, such as is given in this state, the telegraph company may show the nature of the two uses, together with any facts which show that the two uses may coexist—the latter use without materially interfering with or impairing the first use—and if the court, upon all the facts, finds that the two uses can coexist, it is the duty of the court to hold that the condemnation may be had under the general grant for the purpose. And while we are not prepared to say that the court should take judicial knowledge of the fact, as a matter of common and general information, that the construction of a telegraph line upon the right of way of a railway company is not an interference or injury to the use to which the property is already devoted, yet, it is true that in most instances where the question has reached the courts it has been held that the two uses were not inconsistent, and the telegraph companies have been permitted to condemn and acquire an easement on and over the right of way of the railway company." In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106, it was said: "The legislature has vested corporations of the character of petitioner with discretion in locating their telegraph lines. Ordinarily, the courts cannot exercise supervision with respect to such matters. The discretion which the corporation may exercise in determining the route of its lines cannot be interfered with in the absence of a showing of bad faith, a malicious motive, or that the taking of a particular tract sought to be condemned would entail a great loss which might readily be avoided. In re New York, etc. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 546; California Cent. R. Co. v. Hooper, 76 Cal. 404; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wiltse, 116 Ill. 449; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 100 Ill. 110. There was no showing of this character on the part of the respondent. True, it did introduce evidence to the effect that the erection of a telegraph line along its right of way would cause some inconvenience, and might possibly increase the hazard of railroading, but in no greater degree in this particular instance than other railroads must suffer from the erection of telegraph lines adjacent to their railroad tracks—a condition which exists almost without exception along every line of railroad in the United States." So in Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705, it was said: "It is contended by appellant that the respondent had no power to locate its telegraph line longitudinally upon appellant's right of way, because, when the lands have been once taken, by virtue of the power of eminent domain or otherwise, and appropriated to a public use, as is the right of way in controversy, such land cannot again be subjected to another public use, unless such secondary appropriation be authorized by the legislature. The authorities, however, affirm that this rule only applies when the second public use, by reason of its nature or character necessarily supersedes or destroys the former use. Where, as in this case, the construction of the telegraph line will not materially interfere with the use of appellant's land for railroad purposes, it is clear that the rule does not apply."

In but two cases, based on the same state of facts, has it been held that the condemnation of a right of way by a telegraph company works a material interference with the operation of a railroad. See Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 705, followed in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. (Ind.) 111 N. E. 802, reversing on rehearing 110 N. E. 70 (see also 114 N. E. 406). In North Western Telephone Exch. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 76 Minn. 334, 79 N. W. 315, it was held that no necessity existed to warrant the condemnation by a telephone company of the right to run its line over a railroad right of way, it appearing that by a slightly more circuitous course the encroachment on the right of way could be avoided. In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 696, it was held, disapproving the decision to the contrary in Western Union Tel. Co. v. South, etc. Alabama R. Co. 184 Ala. 66, 62 So. 788, that actual necessity must exist to warrant the condemnation for telegraph purpose of an unused portion of a railroad right of way. On the other hand in Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705, it was said: "It is also argued that no necessity has been shown to exist for the taking of the right of way. But it is shown that the respondent made a bona fide effort to agree with the appellant upon terms for the taking of the land sought, and that the latter refused to consider respondent's proposition or to negotiate with it at all. The necessity, therefore, exists for the taking. It is not a question whether there is other land to be had that is equally available, but the question is whether the land sought is needed for the construction of the public work. The necessity is shown to exist when it appears that it is necessary to take the land by condemnation proceedings in order to effectuate the purposes of the corporation." See also Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. 111 Fed. 843, 49 C. C. A. 663, affirming 104 Fed. 623. While the question of necessity is usually considered in connection with that of the compatibility of the two uses, the cases holding that there is no incompatibility proceed on the theory stated in the case last quoted.

A contract between a telegraph company and a railroad company whereby the former is given exclusive rights on the right of way of the latter is void as against public policy, and presents no obstacle to the condemnation by another company of the use of the right of way. Western Union Tel. Co. v. American Union Tel. Co. 9 Biss. 72, 19 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 173, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,444; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Atlantic, etc. R. Co. 63 Fed. 513; *Georgia R. etc. Co. v. Atlantic Postal Tel. M. 327, 43 Pac. 701. And see Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 708; U. S. v. Union Pac. R. Co. 160 U. S. 1, 16 S. Ct. 190, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 319. Compare Western Union Tel. Co. v. Atlantic, etc. Tel. Co. 7 Biss. 367, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,445. In Western Union Tel. Co. v. American Union Tel. Co. 65 Ga. 160, 38 Am. Rep. 781, it was said: "It is well known that rapid inter-communication between different points by wire and rail has created a wonderful revolution in commercial operations. Producers, consumers, manufacturers, merchants, buyers, sellers, all are brought in close proximity, and daily intelligence is given of the world's transactions. Trade is encouraged, industrial enterprise stimulated, and business in all its various branches builds itself upon knowledge. In war the rapid communication of intelligence is almost incalculable; in peace, it is scarcely less so. Shall the means, then, by which it is transmitted, be monopolized by a contract between two artificial beings, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law? When such exclusive rights exist, or such monopolies are established, the same should be done by a legislative grant, and not by an individual contract. Our judgment therefore is, that these contracts are especially made and entered into to cripple and prevent competition, and that they thereby enable the plaintiff in error to fix its tariff of rates at a maximum, governed alone by the necessities of its patrons. Such contracts are not favored by the law; they are against the public policy, because they tend to create monopolies, and are in general restraint of trade. Code, § 2750; 40 Ga. 583; Oregon Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 20 Wall. 66, 68 [22 U. S. (L. ed.) 315]; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Atlantic, etc. Tel. Co. 5 Nev. 103."

In like manner the fact that one telegraph company operates a line along a railroad right of way does not show that there is no necessity for the construction of another line. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal

Grant of Right to Condemn.

IN GENERAL.

It is the policy of some of the jurisdictions to deny to foreign corporations the power to exercise the right of eminent domain. See the note to Northwestern Electric Co. v. Zimmerman, Ann. Cas. 1915C 927. In a jurisdiction wherein that doctrine prevails a foreign telegraph company cannot of course condemn land on a railroad right of way. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 94 Fed. 234 (Ohio statute); Cumberland, etc. Telephone, etc. Co. v. Yazoo, etc. R. Co. 90 Miss. 686, 44 So. 166, 169. But the fact that a domestic corporation seeking to exercise the right is subsidiary to a foreign corporation is immaterial. Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. 111 Fed. 842, 49 C. C. A. 663, affirming 104 Fed. 623; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106; Alabama, etc. R. Co. v. Cumberland Telephone, etc. Co. 88 Miss. 438, 41 So. 258; Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705. In Alabama, etc. R. Co. v. Cumberland Telephone, etc. Co. supra, it was said: "The sole objection to the exercise of that right by the Mississippi Telegraph Company set up in the pleadings is that it was but a dummy for the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company, had no capital stock, and was organized for the mere purpose of enabling the Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Company to do indirectly what it could not directly do, and that its organization and incorporation were consequently unlawful; but whether the Mississippi Telegraph Company is a properly organized company under the laws of this state is a question between it and the state, not to be inquired into in this proceeding by the appellant."

By the weight of authority a de facto corporate existence is sufficient to warrant the exercise of the right of eminent domain (see the note to Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Heidenreich, Ann. Cas. 1913C 266) and that rule has been applied to a telegraph company seeking to condemn the right to use a railroad right of way. Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. 114 Fed. 787.

A statute conferring on telegraph companies the right to condemn a right of way over railroad property is applicable to a telephone company. North Western Telephone Exch. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 76 Minn. 334, 79

W. 106. Compare Alabama, etc. R. Co. v. Cumberland Telephone Co. 88 Miss. 438, 41 So. 258. In North Western Telephone Exch. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. supra, it was said: "The rule is well established that in applying the principles of the common law or in construing statutes the telephone is to be considered a telegraph, unless express statutory provisions govern the case. So the courts have almost universally held that telephone companies are engaged in public business, have the same public duty of serving the community, and may, when establishing their lines, exercise the right of eminent domain under the constitution and the laws." The Act of Congress of July 24, 1866 (7 Fed. St. Ann. 205) discussed in the following subdivision of this note does not, however, apply to telephone companies. Richmond v. Southern Bell Telephone, etc. Co. 174 U. S. 761, 19 S. Ct. 778, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 1162; Cumberland Telephone Co. v. Evansville, 127 Fed. 188; Wichita v. Old Colony Trust Co. 132 Fed. 657, 66 C. C. A. 19; Sunset Telephone Co. v. Pomona, 164 Fed. 561.

VALIDITY OF GRANT.

In the main the validity of a state statute granting to a telegraph or telephone company the power to condemn a right of way over railroad property follows as a natural consequence of the undoubted propositions that a telegraph or telephone line is a public use (see 10 R. C. L. tit. Eminent Domain, p. 52) and that property already in public use can be condemned for an additional public use not inconsistent with that of the first taker. (See 10 R. C. L. tit. Eminent Domain, p. 198.)

But since most telegraph companies are instrumentalities of interstate commerce (see 5 R. C. L. tit. Commerce, p. 742) the states cannot encroach on a field which has been covered by an act of Congress. By the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866 (Rev. St. § 5263, 7 Fed. St. Ann. 205), it is provided that a telegraph company has the right to construct lines over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States. It is, however, held that the foregoing act is in no sense an eminent domain statute and gives no right to establish lines by compulsory proceedings. See the note to Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 1 Ann. Cas. 517. Accordingly it is held that the right of a telegraph company to occupy railroad lands must be acquired either by agreement or under a state statute, and the state statutes giving the right of eminent domain in such cases in no way conflict with the federal control over interstate commerce or with the exercise of the Congressional authority by the act heretofore referred to. See the reported case. And see, generally, the federal cases cited throughout this note. Thus in Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Southern R. Co. 89 Fed. 190, it was said: "The mode or method of exercising this right of eminent domain is fixed by the laws of the several states. Such mode or method is exclusive in its character in ascertaining the amount of the just compensation to be allowed. . . . This being the case, we must look to the statute law of North Carolina alone for the mode of proceeding in the condemnation of lands or right of way—for the conduct of the procedure, and for the steps by which the just compensation is reached. It is true that the purposes of the petitioner are greatly for the public benefit, that it is an important factor in interstate commerce, one of the agencies—and a most valuable agent—in interstate commerce, and that it is of most essential service to the citizen in time of peace and to the government in time of war. But the underlying proposition in our civilization and in Anglo-Saxon liberty is the protection of the citizen in the safety of his person and in the undisturbed enjoyment of his property. And when he is called upon to surrender that property against his will, for a public purpose, he is entitled to all the safeguards which the law has thrown around the exercise of the tremendous, though wholesome, right of eminent domain." In Western Union Tel. Co. v. South, etc. R. Co. 184 Ala. 66, 62 So. 788, the court said: "The federal Congress has not conferred jurisdiction upon federal courts to exercise, under a federal statute of eminent domain, the right of eminent domain in cases like the present, and there is nothing prohibiting states from doing so under statutes similar to our own. Under our statute, there can be no condemnation of any part of a right of way of a railroad company when such condemnation will result in material interference with the proper and orderly conduct by such railroad company of the business which, as a servant of the public, it has the right, under its charter, to perform. As this is true, no condemnation of any part of the right of way of a railroad company which is legally had under our constitution and statutes can in any way affect interstate commerce or a post road of the United States. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. Co.

201 Fed. 932. The Western Union Telegraph Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railway Company and its subsidiary lines are useful servants of the people of the state, and neither corporation can, through the courts of this state, be permitted by condemnation proceedings to materially interfere with the business of the other. Both are equally under the protection of the laws of the state; and, as we have already said, the language and purpose of the statute under which this condemnation proceeding was instituted are in perfect accord with the policy and the laws of the federal government touching the subject of interstate commerce and post roads." In Western Union Tel. Co. v. Nashville, etc. R. Co. 133 Tenn. 691, 182 S. W. 254, the court said: "The next assignment of error for consideration in logical order is that, since both the railway and the telegraph company are subject to the act of Congress regulating post roads, there is no power on the part of the state to authorize the condemnation sought in this case, for that it would be an invasion of the exclusive control by the federal government over the subject-matter. It is admitted, as it must be, that the act of Congress of 1866 (R. S. § 5263) does not confer upon the telegraph company the right to condemn an easement over a railway right of way. The purpose of that act was to deny to the states the power to prevent an occupation and use of such a right of way for telegraph purposes, and the power to condemn remains within state jurisdiction. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Richmond, 224 U. S. 160, 32 S. Ct. 449, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 710; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 U. S. 540, 25 S. Ct. 133, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 312, 1 Ann. Cas. 517; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 207 Fed. 1, 124 C. C. A. 573; Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 225 and note. No jurisdiction, therefore, is attempted to be asserted by the Congress, if it were competent for it to do so, over the particular matter of the power or mode of acquiring title that could be or become exclusive. The result of the railway's contention, if sustained, would be that there could be no condemnation by a telegraph company at all. There is no merit in the assignment of error." In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 143 Ga. 331, 85 S. E. 110, it was said: "The act of Congress approved July 24, 1866 (Rev. Stat. § 5263 et seq.) giving telegraph companies the right to construct and operate their lines through, along, and over the public domain, military or post roads, and navigable waters of the United States, was first up for consideration and construction by the Supreme Court of the United States in Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 96

U. S. 1, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 708. It was there held that the act did not confer upon telegraph companies the right to enter upon private property without the consent of the owner, or grant them the right of eminent domain. The opinion was by Chief Justice Waite, who, after adverting to the absence, in the act, of any attempt by Congress to provide for the appropriation of private property to the uses of the telegraph, said: 'The use of public property alone is granted. If private property is required, it must, so far as the present legislation is concerned, be obtained by private arrangement with the owner. No compulsory proceedings are authorized. State sovereignty under the constitution is not interfered with. Only national privileges are granted.' This construction of the statute has been steadfastly adhered to. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Ann. Arbor R. Co. 178 U. S. 239, 20 S. Ct. 867, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 1052; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 195 U. S. 540, 25 S. Ct. 133, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 312, 1 Ann. Cas. 517; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Richmond, 224 U. S. 160, 32 S. Ct. 449, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 710; Williams v. Talladega, 226 U. S. 404, 33 S. Ct. 116, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 275. In the City of Richmond case, supra, it was said that the act of Congress made the erection of telegraph lines free to all submitting to its conditions, as against an attempt by a state to exclude them because they were foreign corporations, or because of its wish to erect a monopoly of its own; but except in this negative sense the statute is only permissive, and not a source of positive rights. The condemnation statute of this state is in aid of a telegraph company acquiring an easement upon a railroad right of way, not inconsistent with the railroad company's use of its own right of way in the discharge of its proper functions and duties, where the telegraph company is unable to obtain such easement by contract. The state's right of eminent domain extends to property already dedicated to a public use, with the restriction that it cannot be subjected to an additional public use, if the second use either destroys or seriously impairs the first use. Atlanta, etc. R. Co. v. Atlanta, etc. R. Co. 124 Ga. 125, 52 S. E. 320. It follows, as Congress has not attempted by the Act of 1866 to interfere with the state's sovereignty or the exercise of the state's right of eminent domain, that the requested instruction was properly denied."

A telegraph company cannot without leave of the federal court institute proceedings under a state law to condemn a right of way over the lands of a railroad company which is in the possession of a receiver appointed by a federal court. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Atlantic, etc. Tel. Co. 7 Biss. 367, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,445, wherein the court said: "The property to be affected by these proceedings was in the possession of this court through its officers, the receivers, and that being so, no action could take place in the state court affecting it without the consent first obtained of this court. An application should have been made to the receivers, and they should have come to this court, or the application might have been made directly to this court by the Atlantic & Pacific Telegraph Company for leave to proceed in the state court, and it would then have been a question whether it was proper to grant that leave. No rights therefore have been acquired by the institution of these proceedings in the state court. They must be considered as invalid, the rule being well established in the federal courts that when property is in its possession through its receivers, all proceedings in the state court affecting it, without the authority of the federal court, are invalid."

SUFFICIENCY OF GRANT.

Express Statute.

In some jurisdictions the statutes conferring the power of eminent domain authorize in express terms the condemnation by a telegraph or telephone company of a right of way on railroad property. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Southwestern Telephone, etc. Co. 121 Fed. 276, 58 C. C. A. 198 (Arkansas statute); Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Northern American Tel. Co. 230 Fed. 347, 144 C. C. A. 489 (Minnesota statute); Savannah, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 112 Ga. 941, 38 S. E. 353; Savannah, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 113 Ga. 916, 39 S. E. 399; Savannah, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 115 Ga. 554, 42 S. E. 1; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 120 Ga. 268, 1 Ann. Cas. 734, 48 S. E. 15; Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 225; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Lang, 160 Ky. 702, 170 S. W. 2; South Carolina, etc. R. Co. v. American Telephone, etc. Co. 65 S. C. 459, 43 S. E. 970; Doty v. American Telephone, etc. Co. 123 Tenn. 329, Ann. Cas. 1912C 167, 130 S. W. 1053. And see Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 101 Tenn. 62, 46 S. W. 571, 41 L.R.A. 403.

Such a power is, it has been held, conferred by a statute authorizing the condemnation of land "along" a railroad, New Orleans, etc. R. Co. v. Southern, etc. Tel. Co. 53 Ala. 211; or "along and across" railroad tracks, Cumberland Telephone, etc. Co. v. Yazoo, etc. R. Co. 90 Miss. 686, 44 So. 166, 169.

So the power is held to result from authority to take land "along and upon" a railroad. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. 173 Ill. 508, 51 N. E. 382; Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Moosehead Telephone Co. 106 Me. 363,

20 Ann. Cas. 721, 76 Atl. 885, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 703. In the case first cited it was said: "The telegraph line may be built 'along and upon' the railroad. The word 'along' indicates that the construction is to be lengthwise, and the very fact that a construction upon the track cannot have been contemplated by the legislature, would lead to the conclusion that the construction is intended to be upon the right of way and along the same. Where the language of the statute is plain and free from ambiguity, and expresses a single, definite and sensible meaning, that meaning is conclusively presumed to be the meaning which the legislature intended to convey."

Similarly a grant of the power to condemn a location "along and parallel to" a railroad is sufficient to authorize the condemnation of a location on a railroad right of way. Southwestern Telephone Co. v. Kansas City, etc. R. Co. 109 La. 892, 33 So. 910; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Morgan's Louisiana, etc. R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 58, 21 So. 183; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Farmville, etc. R. Co. 96 Va. 661, 32 S. E. 468 (overruling 88 Va. 920, 14 S. E. 803). In the case last cited it was said: "It is claimed that this intention is to be found in the phrase 'along and parallel to,' and that by the use of the words 'parallel to,' the legislature intended to restrict the meaning theretofore and thereafter given to the word 'along,' and to confine the telegraph company to a line following the length of the railway's right of way, but never encroaching upon it. Or, in the language of the court in Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Norfolk, etc. R. Co. 88 Va. 920, 927, it is to run in the direction of the railroad line, 'alongside of and equidistant from it throughout all its parts, so that neither shall meet or touch; not in nor upon the railroad strip.' We are wholly unable to perceive, if this be the true construction, why the legislature found it necessary to say anything about the railroad. The right which a telegraph company is authorized to acquire would be a matter of indifference to railroad companies if the construction heretofore given by this court were correct, and the mention of them in the statute would be utterly irrelevant; but railroads are mentioned in the statute, and it is to be presumed for a necessary purpose, and we must find and give effect to the legislative intent by considering, not a part, but all of the language used, and are justified in rejecting any part of the statute as unnecessary and irrelevant only in the last resort when it has been found impossible to give effect to all the language used, and reach a rational conclusion. It is impossible to read the three sections under consideration without at once concluding that the regulation of the rights of telegraph companies in their relation to railroad companies in the matter of the construction, maintenance, and operation of their lines was one of the essential objects of the original statute, and the sections into which it has been divided as they now appear in the code. 'Parallel' as used in sec. 1287, does not have its primary and scientific meaning 'as lines extended in the same direction and in all parts equally distant.' That definition can in no case be applied to a line of railway, for no railway line is, we believe, mathematically straight. The legislature merely intended to say that the telegraph line should be 'along and parallel to,' in the sense of 'conforming to,' 'having the same direction of, tendency with' the railroad, in order to guard against any undue interference with or hinderance of the railroad company in the enjoyment of its property."

General Statute.

By the weight of authority a statute authorizing the exercise of the right of eminent domain by telegraph or telephone companies without express mention of lands in use for a railroad right of way gives the power to condemn such lands. Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 111 Fed. 843, 49 C. A. 663, affirming 104 Fed. 623; Postal Tel. Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 114 Fed. 787; Pacific Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon, etc. R. Co. 163 Fed. 967; Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 120 Ala. 21, 24 So. 408; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 183 Ind. 258, 108 N. E. 951; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919; American Telephone, etc. Co. v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 202 Mo. 656, 101 S. W. 576; San Antonio, etc. R. Co. v. Southwestern Tel. etc. Co. 93 Tex. 313, 55 S. W. 117, 77 Am. W. 270, 60 L.R.A. 145; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705. And see Northwestern Telephone Exch. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 76 Minn. 334, 79 N. W. 315 (condemnation denied for want of necessity). Compare Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Moosehead Telephone Co. 106 Me. 363, 20 Ann. Cas. 721, 76 Atl. 885, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 703; New York, etc. R. Co. v. Central Union Tel. Co. 21 Hun 261 (allowing construction along "public roads"). In Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 114 Fed. 787, it was said: "The state government, by a general law, has granted the power to exercise its eminent domain to certain corporations—among them, to telegraph companies. In this

The majority opinion holds that the amendment to the petition merely limited the character of the easement sought to be condemned. This we consider to be manifestly erroneous. The evidence disclosed that the railroad company, at the time of the filing of the condemnation petition, was using the identical portion of the right of way for the same purpose for which it was sought to be condemned. That was fatal to appellant's petition, and in an attempt to obviate this objection it proposes the joint use of that portion [446] of the right of way by the railroad company and the telegraph company for the pole line; and the majority opinion holds that the railroad company must either accept this offer or remove its wires from that portion of its own right of way. In support of the proposition that this amendment was more than an offer or stipulation, in that it limited the character and nature of the easement sought, the majority opinion uses an illustration the case of a railroad company seeking to condemn a right of way over the right of way of another railroad, and assumes a case in which the petitioning company offers to construct an overhead or underground crossing. This offer could only be for the purpose of reducing the amount of damages. An illustration more apt would be one where a railroad company should attempt to condemn the right of way of another railroad, and in order to obviate the objection that the property was already devoted to the same public use, would, in its petition, offer to permit the old company to use the right of way with it, jointly. It must be manifest that an offer of this kind would not entitle the petitioner to condemn. It should also be noted in this connection that the offer by the telegraph company does not state upon what terms it will permit the use of its poles, etc., by the railroad company. The only purpose that can be accomplished in any case by limiting the character of the easement sought to be condemned is to reduce the amount of the damages, and in no case can any such offer or provision in the petition operate to confer upon the petitioner a right to condemn which it otherwise would not have.

There is no basis for the statement in the majority opinion that this amendment was made because it had developed on the trial that the railroad company had, by permission of license from the telegraph company, strung a telephone wire and some signal wires for short distances at certain places on the poles of the telegraph company. We are unable to find any basis in the record for this statement, and [447] this is not the explanation given by the telegraph company of the reason for filing the amendment. It states in its brief and argument: "It may be argued that, regardless of the fact that the defendants had never located either a pole line of their own or any wire upon a pole line" of the telegraph company, "yet the mere fact that there existed one wire of the defendant carried on the poles of the New York Telegraph Company precludes any telegraph company from condemning a right of way on the same side of the track or within a certain but undefined distance of that wire. It was to meet and overcome such an objection that petitioner added the amendment of January 12, 1914, to its condemnation petition."

The majority opinion also states in support of the conclusion that the wire claimed by the railroad company in fact belongs to the telegraph company, that this wire was only a part of the accommodation furnished; that the telegraph company furnished with it support for its poles and cross-arms, electric current from its batteries and necessary connections and other things which made the wire part of the entire system and which were much greater than the cost of the wire when placed on the company's poles. What is "much greater" the opinion does not point out. It does appear, however, from the record that the estimated cost of the wire, alone, and labor to put it up, was $2615.92. It also appears that in addition to stringing that wire the railroad company ordered that it be "cut into" certain stations and offices along the line, and that the final bill paid by the railroad company for "material used and labor, freight and other expenses," was $3820.61. It therefore appears that the railroad company paid all the cost connected with the installation of the wire ready for service; and so far as support of this wire by the poles and cross-arms of the telegraph company is concerned, that was part of the consideration for the use of the right of way by the telegraph company under its contract. The statement in the majority [448] opinion that "the effect of the contract, and the transaction consummated pursuant thereto, was that the telegraph company added an additional wire to its system and the railroad company paid a certain price for its use," is therefore not supported by the evidence.

The majority opinion also states: "At the time of filing the suit the contract between the Western Union Telegraph Company of New York and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company had been terminated by notice duly given as provided." This is not an accurate statement and to us seems to be misleading. The contract was still in force when this suit was filed and the railroad company was still fettered by its contract with the New York Telegraph Company, the latter company having the right to continue the maintenance of its pole line on the railroad right of way to the exclusion of any such lines constructed by the railroad company. The petition herein was filed February 3, 1912, while the contract did not terminate until August 17, 1912, and for that reason the railroad company had had no opportunity to construct or begin the construction of its own line when the petition was filed. The majority opinion continues: "And subsequently the railroad company gave to the Western Union notice to remove all its poles, wires and other property from the railroad right of way." This notice was given on August 5,—twelve days before the time fixed by the telegraph company for terminating the contract,—and notified the telegraph company to begin such removal immediately after August 17. As between the railroad company and the New York Telegraph Company it was the duty of the latter company to comply with this notice.

The majority opinion assumes that the railroad company is bound to accept the offer of the telegraph company to permit it to string its wires on the poles of the telegraph company, and if it refuses to accept the offer it must construct its lines on some other part of its right of way, and [449] ignores the fact that the railroad company had, before the petition was filed, obtained by contract its right of way for a telegraph line. The case of Golconda Northern Ry. v. Gulf Lines Connecting R. Co. 265 Ill. 194, Ann. Cas. 1916A 833, 106 N. E. 818, is cited in the majority opinion as authority for the proposition that "preference is to be given in condemnation proceedings to the one who first locates the line which is in dispute." That is undoubtedly true where some third person owns the line

over which the right of way is located and condemnation proceedings are brought to secure this right of way. That case, however, was not a condemnation proceeding but was a bill in equity by one railroad company against another for an injunction to restrain the latter from interfering with, obstructing or hindering the plaintiff in the construction of its railroad through a certain narrow pass. The defendant was a grantee of another railroad company which had obtained deeds for its right of way through this pass from the owners of the land, such deeds containing conditions subsequent requiring the road to be constructed by a certain time. The complainant had subsequently obtained deeds from the same land owners for the same right of way through the pass, and claimed, among other things, that the former grants had become forfeited by the failure to construct the road within the time limits of the deeds, and therefore it held title to the right of way by virtue of subsequent deeds. The decision was against complainant, it being held that only the owners of the land, their heirs and devisees, could take advantage of a breach of a condition subsequent. Instead of being an authority in favor of the proposition announced in the majority opinion, it seems to us that this case recognizes the doctrine for which we contend, that one company may by deed or contract obtain the preferential right over another company seeking thereafter to obtain a right of way over the same premises for the same purpose. Moreover, there is a statute which applies to the location of rights of way by railroads [450] which requires a railroad company to file a plat showing the location of its railroad in the office of the recorder of deeds within six months after the railroad is located. (Hurd's Stat. 1913, chap. 109, sec. 9.)

The judgment of the county court should be affirmed.

Rehearing denied December 17, 1915.

Power of Telegraph or Telephone Company to Condemn Railroad Right of Way under State Statute.

Grant of Right to Condemn:

In General, 692.

Validity of Grant, 692.

Sufficiency of Grant:

Express Statute, 694.

General Statute, 695.

In General.

which is of superior rank in respect to public necessity or which may be exercised consistently with the use first attaching. See 10 R. C. L. tit. Eminent Domain, pp. 182, 198. It is likewise settled that the construction of a telegraph or telephone line on a railroad right of way imposes an additional burden for which compensation must be made. See the notes to Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 1 Ann. Cas. 734, and Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Moosehead Telephone Co. 20 Ann. Cas. 721. See also 10 R. C. L. tit. Eminent Domain, p. 152. And since the use of land by a telegraph or telephone company is not superior in point of public utility to its use by a railroad company it is essential to the condemnation of the use of a right of way that it shall appear that the superimposed use will not interfere materially with that to which the property was previously devoted. Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co. 120 Ala. 21, 24 So. 408; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 183 Ind. 258, 108 N. E. 951; Postal Tel. etc. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919; American Telephone, etc. Co. v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 202 Mo. 656, 101 S. W. 576. Whether such an interference will result is a question of fact, Western, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. 138 Ga. 420, 75 S. E. 471, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 225; as to which every case must be determined on its own facts, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 705. And the burden is on the telegraph company to show that its occupancy of the property is consistent with the proper performance by the railroad of its duties as a common carrier. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. v. Ohio Postal Tel. Co. 68 Ohio St. 306, 67 N. E. 890, 62 L.R.A. 941. It is, however, generally held that the presence of telegraph poles and wires on a railroad right of way does not materially interfere with the operation of the railroad. Thus in Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 120 Ala. 21, 24 So. 408, it was said: "It is proposed to so construct the line that it will not produce any material interference with the free exercise of the franchise of the railroad company, nor extend to that part of its right of way which is in actual use. Common knowledge teaches that there is ample space on the 100 feet of the railroad's right of way, for two or more telegraph lines, without obstructing the free and ample use for railroad purposes." So in Postal Tel. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919, the court said: "Under the general grant of authority to condemn, given to telegraph companies, such as is given in this state, the telegraph company may show the nature of the two uses, together with any facts which show that the two uses may coexist—the latter use without materially interfering with or impairing the first use—and if the court, upon all the facts, finds that the two uses can coexist, it is the duty of the court to hold that the condemnation may be had under the general grant for the purpose. And while we are not prepared to say that the court should take judicial knowledge of the fact, as a matter of common and general information, that the construction of a telegraph line upon the right of way of a railway company is not an interference or injury to the use to which the property is already devoted, yet, it is true that in most instances where the question has reached the courts it has been held that the two uses were not inconsistent, and the telegraph companies have been permitted to condemn and acquire an easement on and over the right of way of the railway company." In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co. 30 Colo. 133, 69 Pac. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 106, it was said: "The legislature has vested corporations of the character of petitioner with discretion in locating their telegraph lines. Ordinarily, the courts cannot exercise supervision with respect to such matters. The discretion which the corporation may exercise in determining the route of its lines cannot be interfered with in the absence of a showing of bad faith, a malicious motive, or that the taking of a particular tract sought to be condemned would entail a great loss which might readily be avoided. In re New York, etc. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 546; California Cent. R. Co. v. Hooper, 76 Cal. 404; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wiltse, 116 Ill. 449; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 100 Ill. 110. There was no showing of this character on the part of the respondent. True, it did introduce evidence to the effect that the erection of a telegraph line along its right of way would cause some inconvenience, and might possibly increase the hazard of railroading, but in no greater degree in this particular instance than other railroads must suffer from the erection of telegraph lines adjacent to their railroad tracks—a condition which exists almost without exception along every line of railroad in the United States." So in Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705, it was said: "It is contended by appellant that the respondent had no power to locate its telegraph line longitudinally upon appellant's right of way, because, when the lands have been once taken, by virtue of the power of eminent domain or otherwise, and appropriated to a public use, as is the right of way in controversy, such land cannot again be subjected to another public use, unless such secondary appropriation be authorized by the legislature. The authorities, however, affirm that this rule only applies when the second public use, by reason of its nature or character necessarily supersedes or destroys the former use. Where, as in this case, the construction of the telegraph line will not materially interfere with the use of appellant's land for railroad purposes, it is clear that the rule does not apply."

In but two cases, based on the same state of facts, has it been held that the condemnation of a right of way by a telegraph company works a material interference with the operation of a railroad. See Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 705, followed in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. (Ind.) 111 N. E. 802, reversing on rehearing 110 N. E. 70 (see also 114 N. E. 406). In North Western Telephone Exch. Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 76 Minn. 334, 79 N. W. 315, it was held that no necessity existed to warrant the condemnation by a telephone company of the right to run its line over a railroad right of way, it appearing that by a slightly more circuitous course the encroachment on the right of way could be avoided. In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 696, it was held, disapproving the decision to the contrary in Western Union Tel. Co. v. South, etc. Alabama R. Co. 184 Ala. 68, 62 So. 788, that actual necessity must exist to warrant the condemnation for telegraph purpose of an unused portion of a railroad right of way. On the other hand in Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Utah 474, 65 Pac. 735, 90 Am. St. Rep. 705, it was said: "It is also argued that no necessity has been shown to exist for the taking of the right of way. But it is shown that the respondent made a bona fide effort to agree with the appellant upon terms for the taking of the land sought, and that the latter refused to consider respondent's proposition or to negotiate with it at all. The necessity, therefore, exists for the taking. It is not a question whether there is other land to be had that is equally available, but the question is whether the land sought is needed for the construction of the public work. The necessity is shown to exist when it appears that it is necessary to take the land by condemnation proceedings in order to effectuate the purposes of the corporation." See also Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. 111 Fed. 843, 49 C. C. A. 663, affirming 104 Fed. 623. While the question of necessity is usually considered in connection with that of the compatibility of the two uses, the cases holding that there is no incompatibility proceed on the theory stated in the case last quoted.

A contract between a telegraph company and a railroad company whereby the former is given exclusive rights on the right of way of the latter is void as against public policy, and presents no obstacle to the condemnation by another company of the use of the right of way. *Western Union Tel. Co. v. American Union Tel. Rep. 781, it was said: "It is well known that rapid inter-communication between different points by wire and rail has created a wonderful revolution in commercial operations. Producers, consumers, manufacturers, merchants, buyers, sellers, all are brought in close proximity, and daily intelligence is given of the world's transactions. Trade is encouraged, industrial enterprise stimulated, and business in all its various branches builds itself upon knowledge. In war the rapid communication of intelligence is almost incalculable; in peace, it is scarcely less so. Shall the means, then, by which it is transmitted, be monopolized by a contract between two artificial beings, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law? When such exclusive rights exist, or such monopolies are established, the same should be done by a legislative grant, and not by an individual contract. Our judgment therefore is, that these contracts are especially made and entered into to cripple and prevent competition, and that they thereby enable the plaintiff in error to fix its tariff of rates at a maximum, governed alone by the necessities of its patrons. Such contracts are not favored by the law; they are against the public policy, because they tend to create monopolies, and are in general restraint of trade. Code, § 2750; 40 Ga. 583; Oregon Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 20 Wall. 66, 68 [22 U. S. (L. ed.) 315]; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Atlantic, etc. Tel. Co. 5 Nev. 103."

In like manner the fact that one telegraph company operates a line along a railroad right of way does not show that there is no necessity for the construction of another line. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal that is, property belonging to a certain class, such as that impressed with a public use, within the judgment of the lawmaking body, for reasons of policy should not be interfered with except upon certain conditions. We are clear to the opinion that the Legislature was acting within its rightful discretion in making such exceptions. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 1099.

The cases of Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Alabama Midland R. Co. 87 Ala. 501, 6 So. 404, and Anniston, etc. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, etc. R. Co. 82 Ala. 297, 2 So. 710, which find frequent citation and reference in our former decision in this case, involved the condemnation by one railway of the right of way of another. In neither of these decisions, however, was there used language so definite and emphatic as that now found in section 3867 of our present Code. The strongest expression there used, in this connection, was that there should be a reasonable necessity for the taking of such right of way. The decisions recognize [132] the difficulty of laying down any specific rule, as to the measure of necessity of sufficient scope to include all cases.

In the case of Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Alabama Midland R. Co. supra, the rule of strict construction of statutes granting the right of eminent domain is fully recognized, as shown by the following quotation: "Statutes delegating the paramount right of eminent domain must be strictly construed, and the authority strictly pursued in the manner prescribed. They are not to be extended by implication further than is necessary to accomplish their general purpose; but not so literally construed as to defeat the manifest objects of the Legislature."

In the opinion in that case it is further said: "The settled rule is that the legislative intent to grant authority to one railroad to take and condemn a franchise of another must appear in express terms, or must arise from necessary implication, founded on an existing and particular need. No room for doubt or uncertainty must be left. Should the General Assembly empower a company to construct a railroad between designated and fixed terminal points, and, to accomplish this object, it becomes necessary to take the franchises, or any part, of another corporation, power to do so arises from necessary implication; the presumption being that the Legislature deemed the later use the more important, and of greater public benefit. The implication rests on the general rule that the grant of power to do a particular thing of a public nature carries with it implied authority to do all that is necessary to accomplish the principal and general purpose."

It is seen, from a reading of the cases, that much stress is laid upon the rule that where the Legislature has granted power to a railroad company to build a railway between two terminal points, and to accomplish this object it becomes necessary to condemn a portion of the right of way of another road, the power to so condemn is necessarily implied from the corporate authority originally given, and that the question of practicability is considered of great importance, as well as that of avoiding interference with the operation of the road, the right of way of which is sought to be condemned. Reasoning along these lines, the rule as to reasonable necessity was stated, in the former opinion in this case, as follows: "When a right of way is essential to a public service corporation, and there are two [133] possible routes, one upon unused lands previously acquired by some other public service corporation for a public use, and the other upon private lands, then (the rights of the public being in equipoise) when the cost of the right of way over such private lands and the labor and expense of putting such right of way in proper shape to be used by such second public service corporation are not disproportionate to the benefit likely to accrue therefrom, then the right of way over the private lands is practicable, and a right of way over the unused portion of the lands previously set apart to the first public use should be denied. When, however, the cost of acquiring and constructing the right of way, with its attendant circumstances, over the private lands is so much greater than would be the cost of constructing such right of way over the unused portion of lands previously acquired by the first public service corporation for public use as to clearly outweigh and sensibly exceed the injury which would proximately result to such first public service corporation, then, under such circumstances, so much of the unused portion of the lands belonging to such first public service corporation as is necessary to the actual occupancy and use of the second public service corporation may be condemned for its purposes, but not more."

Upon the former hearing this court held that it was largely a question of practicability, as measured by the further questions of convenience and expense, of comparative advantage and injury "having regard always to the interests of the public, for whose benefit the general authority is given and the particular taking proposed."

In the case of South, etc. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. etc. R. Co. 119 Ala. 105, 24 So. 114, this court called attention to the rule which required only a reasonable necessity for such condemnation in the following language: "It also had a right to take a portion of the right of way of the defendant, upon showing a reasonable necessity therefor, and that such taking would not destroy the usefulness of the right of way as a franchise, or so impair the capacity of the easement as to render it unsafe: and both of these rights could have been enforced by statutory proceedings provided for this purpose" (citing Mobile etc. R. Co. v. Alabama Midland R. Co. 87 Ala. 501, 6 So. 404, and Anniston, etc. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, etc. R. Co. 82 Ala. 297, 2 So. 710).

[134] Whether in the two cases cited in the South, etc. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. etc. R. Co. Case, there existed in fact an actual necessity for the specific land, or portion thereof, sought to be condemned, within the meaning of section 3867 of our present Code, we need not stop to inquire. Both dealt with the right of condemnation granted to a railroad empowered by law to construct a road between two terminal points. The Anniston, etc. Case, had to deal with the condemnation of a right of way through a narrow gap in the mountains. In the building of railroads, as is a matter of common knowledge, the question of grades is an essential factor. In their construction the general topography of the country may, under certain circumstances, render absolutely necessary the use by a second road of a portion of the right of way of another. But such factors would not ordinarily create such imperative necessity in the erection of telegraph lines, and therefore what might be considered an indispensable necessity as a right of way for one would not be so considered for the other. The idea was expressed in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 120 Fed. 362, in the following language: "In railroad location, as we have noted above, grade is an essential factor: in telegraph construction it is, at most, a mere convenience. In railroad construction, the narrowness of defiles, the opening of gorges, the location of streams, the general topography of the country, or the lack of curve space may, under certain circumstances, render it imperatively necessary that the second road should intrench upon a primary location. None of these factors ordinarily create imperative necessity in the case of telegraph lines. With them grades may be ignored, gorges avoided, hills or mountains crossed. In other words, there is no necessity, in the nature of things, that ordinarily requires a telegraph line to be placed on a railroad right of way. Its location there is obviously a matter of convenience and economy."

No language so emphatic as that employed in the last sentence of section 3 of the act of October 1, 1903, which is now codified as section 3867 of the Code of 1907, is found in any of our decisions, and it was new to our statutory system at that time. The act of which this provision was a part purported to amend many of the sections of our Code relating to the power of eminent domain. The language of the statute now under review is therefore radically different from that of the statutes at that [135] time. Research fails to disclose more than one case where there has been longitudinal condemnation of the right of way of a railroad for telegraph purposes for any great length (Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. supra); and, as we have heretofore stated, this decision was rested upon the express terms of the statute then in existence. The Legislature, in revising the various sections of the Code relating to the power of eminent domain, and making material changes therein, will therefore be presumed to have intended some change in the law with respect thereto.

"It will be presumed that the Legislature, adopting the amendment, intended to make some change in the existing law; and therefore the courts will endeavor to give some effect to the amendment." 36 Cyc. 1165.

"When the Legislature employs different language in a subsequent statute in the same connection, the courts will presume a change of the law is intended. The Legislature must be presumed to know both the language employed in the former acts and the judicial construction placed upon them; and, if in a subsequent statute on the same subject it uses different language in the same connection, the courts must presume that a change of the law was intended, and after a consideration of the spirit and letter of the statute, will give effect to its terms according to their proper signification." Lehman v. Robinson, 59 Ala. 219.

That some material change was intended by the Legislature in the enactment of what is not section 3867 of the Code is strengthened by the fact that they declined to repeal this section when the effort to that end was made. Referring to the Senate Journal of the Legislature of 1907 (Henderson v. State, 94 Ala. 95, 10 So. 332), it is noted that Senate bill No. 81 was introduced, seeking to amend section 3 of an act, entitled "An act to amend sections 1713, 1714, 1717, 1718, 1719, and 1720 of the Code, approved October 1, 1903," and was referred to the committee on revision of laws. See Senate Journal 1907, p. 143. On page 744 of the said journal it appears that motion was made to take said bill No. 81 from the adverse calendar, which motion was continued until Wednesday, November 14, 1907; and on page 849 it appears that on the latter date, upon a consideration of the same by the Senate, the motion was laid on [136] the table by a vote of 25 to 5; the Senate thus refusing to take said bill from the adverse calendar and place it on a second reading. Bills of this character—such as are referred to, and adversely reported by, a standing committee—are required, under the provisions of section 911, Code of 1907, to be preserved, and said Senate bill 81 is therefore before us, and properly so, for consideration. It reads as follows: . . . That section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to amend sections 1713, 1714, 1717, 1718, 1719, and 1720 of the Code, approved October 1, 1903,' be and the same is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Section 3. Be it further enacted, that section 1717 of the Code be amended so as to read as follows:

"1717 (3211) Allegations, Objections and Proof to Be Heard—On the day appointed or any other day to which the hearing may be continued, the court must hear the allegations of the application and any objections which may be filed to the granting thereof, and any legal evidence touching the same, and shall make an order granting or refusing the application.

"Provided: that if there are several distinct tracts of lands owned by different persons embraced in the application, the owners of each tract may have a separate hearing as to the right to condemn their lands, and the court may, if it finds the application should be granted as to some and not as to other of the owners, make and enter its decree accordingly.

"The hearing herein provided must in all respects be conducted and evidence taken as in civil cases at law."

On the back of the bill is the following indorsement: "This bill was considered by the committee on revision of laws in session and received adverse report. Oscar O. Bayles, Chairman, January 31, 1907."

A reading of the bill readily discloses that its sole purpose was to repeal the last sentence of section 3 of the act of 1903, above referred to, which is now section 3867 of the Code of 1907, and place the law back as it was before the passage of said act in so far as it concerns the matter here under consideration. The bill, as is noted, is but a copy of said section 3 of the above-mentioned act, with the exception that the last sentence thereof is omitted, and which sentence now constitutes section 3867 of our Code. It was therefore a direct effort to repeal this section. The refusal of the Legislature, or at least, of an important [137] branch of that body, to repeal said section is not without significance, and lends color to the theory that the law-making body considered the change proposed thereby as material and important and not to be disregarded.

The introduction of the bill, with its history, was not called to the attention of this court, on former appeal, and therefore did not enter into consideration of the cause at that time. That it is a matter to be considered by this court would seem quite clear.

To summarize the situation, we find that section 1244 and 1246 of the Code of 1896, which expressly authorized such condemnation of the right of way of a railroad, were repealed by the adoption of the Code of 1907, with these sections omitted. In addition to this, the Legislature of 1903 amended the statutory provision in reference to condemnation proceedings and, in section 3 of the act of October 1, 1903, incorporated the language now found in the Code or section 3867, requiring the existence of an "actual necessity for the land or specific portion thereof" before that which has already been devoted to a public use may be subjected to condemnation. In the Legislature of 1907, effort was made to repeal that portion of section 3 of the act above referred to, and which is now section 3867 of the Code, but the bill for this purpose was defeated.

(5) We are persuaded that the Legislature intended a material change of the law in the use of the language, "actual necessity for the specific land, or portion thereof, or interest therein," and that such could not be rested upon the mere questions of economy or convenience to the telegraph company. What would be such actual necessity is difficult of definition so as to lay down a specific rule which would embrace all cases, and would best be left for determination according to the circumstances of the particular case. The cause preceded to final judgment upon the theory of petitioner that it had the right to condemn the railroad right of way because it needed a right of way and this was to it the most convenient and economical, and such additional use would work no material interference with respondent railway. A necessity that springs merely from the choice or desire of the petitioner is insufficient. As stated in the former opinion, the word "actual" is used here as a word of emphasis, meaning "real as distinguished from apparent, constructive or [138] imputed." Under the language of the statute, therefore, there must be first a real necessity for the specific land or portion thereof sought to be condemned. The word "specific" finds definition in the former opinion as "tending to specify, or to make particular, definite, limited or precise, as a specific statement." The language there used is strong, emphatic, and definite and without ambiguity or uncertainty.

(6) Speaking to the question of the construction of legislative or constitutional provisions, this court, in State v. McGough, 118 Ala. 166, 24 So. 397, said: "There are other rules of interpretation that may override all others, as: 'Where a law is plain and unambiguous, whether it be expressed in general or limited terms, the Legislature (or framers of a Constitution) should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction. Possible or even probable meanings, when one is plainly declared in the instrument itself, the courts are not at liberty to search for elsewhere.' Cooley on Const. Lim. 69, 70. The framers of the Constitution 'must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they said.' Id. 73; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 188, 6 U. S. (L. ed.) 23; Ex p. Mayor, 78 Ala. 423. 'We can only learn what they intended from what they have said. It is theirs to command, ours to obey. When their language is plain, no discretion is left to us. We have no right to stray into the mazes of conjecture, or to search for an imaginary purpose.' Lehman v. Robinson, 59 Ala. 241."

This statute cannot be so construed as to mean merely such necessity as springs from economical reasons or matters of convenience for this would be but substituting the word "reasonable" for the word "actual." The necessity is defined by the act as "actual," meaning "real," and we are of the opinion that by such language is meant such actual necessity as arises from either physical or overpowering economical conditions, the question of practicability to be, of course, kept constantly in view. No effort was made by the petitioner to prove such actual necessity within the meaning of the language of our statute as now construed by us. For aught that appears, no difficulty exists as an obstacle to the condemnation and use of a right of way. The testimony of the witness for petitioner shows, of course, additional cost for the erection of the telegraph line outside of the [189] railroad right of way, but this is purely an economical consideration, and one which appears to be by no means overpowering. As before noted, the erecting of telegraph line and the laying of a railroad are entirely different propositions, and what would constitute actual necessity for the one, within the meaning of our statute, might not be at all such to the other. Indeed, from the very nature of things, it is difficult to conceive of an actual necessity, as here construed, for the condemnation by a telegraph company of the longitudinal right of way of a railroad for any considerable distance. It may, of course, exist for short distances on account of peculiar Conditions; but these are matters to be determined when the particular case arises.

(7) Much was said in the former opinion in reference to the public good; it using the language "public interest is the lodestar of every statute conferring the right of eminent domain." The question here under consideration was one resting within the discretion of the Legislature. The right of way of a railroad, acquired by condemnation proceedings, is permitted by law to extend far beyond the actual roadbed, the usual width being 100 feet. Obviously the authority to condemn a way of that width is given the railroad to be exercised, and upon the assumption, at least, that such width is reasonably needful for its purposes. If one telegraph line is permitted to use a part of this right of way, then, under the language of the former decision in this case, other such lines, such as telephone and power transmission lines, would be entitled to use it, and so, by gradual encroachment, ultimately deprive the railroad of its entire right of way, except that portion actually occupied by the railroad. The mere fact that this petitioner agrees to remove its poles, from time to time, from the margin of the right of way, as occasion may require the use of the space by the railroad (conceding that such averments in the petition are binding and effective), would not alter the situation; for it clearly appears that the telegraph company is seeking a permanent location on the right of way, although agreeing to shift the line from place to place. At the time of the passage of the act of 1903, previously referred to, there had been a longitudinal condemnation of a railroad right of way for telegraph purposes, rested upon sections 1244-1246 of the Code of 1896, and a decision by this court (Mobile, etc. R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co. supra), in which it was held that in such proceedings a railroad company is entitled [140] to only nominal damages. It was therefore the law of this state at that time that a telegraph company could, through condemnation proceedings, acquire the use of the right of way of a railroad without the payment of any substantial damages, and could thus acquire a most valuable right practically free of cost. It therefore clearly appears that the right of way of a railroad, already cleared and so kept by the railroad company, was a most inviting field for the erection of telegraph lines, and it did not seem unlikely that in the future development of the state advantage would be taken of the situation. It may be that considerations like those above noted actuated the Legislature in enacting into law what is now section 3867 of the Code, and thus declaring that it is not the public policy of the state to condemn, for another use, property already devoted to a public use, unless an actual necessity therefor exists. The lawmaking body has spoken in emphatic terms in declaring the public policy, and it is not for us to "wander into the maze of conjecture or to search for imaginary purposes." Indeed, we are unable to see that the public good requires that the petitioner be permitted to locate its line upon the right of way of this railroad, but on the contrary, we think that the public interest is in equipoise. Petitioner went upon this right of way under contract, which contract, as we understand was conceded by counsel in argument, was terminated by the voluntary act of the petitioner. No reasons, except those of economy and convenience, appear why petitioner may not erect its lines elsewhere than on this railway. If, upon petitioner's failure to acquire this right of way, and before it acquired a right of way elsewhere, the railroad company should begin at once a destruction of petitioner's telegraph line, it may be that a court of equity, on account of, and for the conservation of, public interests might enjoin such act of destruction pending the acquirement of a right of way elsewhere within a reasonable time. This, of course, need not be determined here. But the situation thus presented, brought on by the voluntary act of petitioner, clearly can afford no foundation for the argument that an actual necessity existed for the condemnation of the railroad right of way.

We have dealt with the one question which we deem of vital importance on this appeal and as conclusive of the result thereof. It is therefore unnecessary to enter into a consideration of [141] whether or not the condemnation here sought was upon the margin of the right of way, or whether, if judgment of condemnation were entered, more than nominal damages should have been assessed. These were questions of secondary consideration, and are unnecessary to be here determined.

This cause was tried, in so far as the evidence of the petitioner is concerned, in conformity with the former opinion in this case. The trial judge, although entertaining a contrary view as to the law, followed in his rulings upon this question the holding of this court on the former hearing, which of course was entirely proper. While the record before us, under the view we now entertain of the case, would justify a final disposition of the cause on this appeal, yet, in view of this situation, we have concluded to remand the cause.

The former opinion was not decided by the full court, the then Chief Justice being absent and Mr. Justice Sayre dissenting. The writer of this opinion and Mr. Justice Thomas were not then members of this court. As presently constituted, the court has reached the conclusion that the former holding was erroneous.

We are fully mindful of the importance of this holding, both to the parties and to the public; but it is our sole duty to declare the law as we find it. The case of Western Union Tel. Co. v. South, etc. R. Co. supra, is therefore overruled, and the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SAYRE, J. (concurring).—I am not prepared to say that the action of the Legislature, or its lack of action, in reference to the bill to amend section 3 of the act to amend certain sections of the Code of 1896, should have any influence in the decision of this case. I place my concurrence upon the other considerations stated in the opinion. In this Mr. Justice Thomas also agrees.

ON APPLICATION FOR REHEARING.

(February 15, 1916.)

GARDNER, J.—(1) Upon this application for rehearing counsel for appellee, for the first time during this litigation, it [142] would seem, insist that the proceeding brought against the appellant was not for the purpose of acquiring an easement in the right of way, but was merely to ascertain the amount of compensation which should be paid therefor. This theory rests upon the assumption, on their part, that the appellee already owned perpetual easement on the right of way by virtue of the contract of 1884. By what is here said we do not intend to indicate that such theory would support a condemnation proceeding. That might be conceded, for the sake of argument and for that purpose only, but we pass that question by as unnecessary to be determined. There is no intimation in the entire record that such a theory was even hinted at on the former trials of this cause, and the former opinion in the case discloses no such intimation upon the first appeal. This court, so far as cases of this character are concerned, is a court of review only, and is expected to pass only upon questions arising in the court below.

(9) The petition filed in this cause, seeking a condemnation of the right of way, conceded that the appellee went upon and occupied the right of way under a contract, soon to expire and is disclosed by the following quotation from section 1 thereof: "Your petitioner has for many years, to wit, 20 years, occupied the right of way of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, with its lines of telegraph, consisting of poles, wires, appurtenances and fixtures, under a contract with the said railroad company, which will expire on or about the 17th day of August, 1912; and your petitioner desires to continue to occupy said right of way and maintain and operate its said lines of telegraph where they are now placed and located," etc.

But notwithstanding this question is presented now for the first time, in view of the carefully prepared briefs of the able and diligent counsel for appellee, we have deemed it proper to give it consideration.

This record shows, indeed the petition itself discloses, that appellee went upon the right of way of appellant under contract of 1884. The opinion in this cause recited that it was conceded by counsel in argument that the contract was terminated by the act of the petitioner. This was in accordance with the very terms of the contract, which provided a continuation of the same for a period of 25 years, and that at the expiration of said period [143] either party thereto might terminate the contract on giving one year's notice. There is nothing in the contract giving a perpetual easement to the appellee, and nothing that would lead thereto by necessary implication. No such insistence was made by counsel in their former brief, but on this appeal, in one of their briefs, they referred to the contract in the following language: "We then have left a working agreement which, by its terms, implies a permissive occupation of the property for telegraph purposes, possibly something in the nature of a tenancy at will."

It is thus seen that there was no contention that by the contract a perpetual easement was granted. Section 3 of the petition avers the ownership by the railroad of the easement sought to be condemned.

But we need not pursue the subject further. The contract was terminated according to its terms, and terminated in its entirety. No effort seems to have been made—and we do not see how it could have been made—to terminate that part of the contract which is burdensome and retain that which is beneficial.

As an exhibit to the last brief filed by appellee, there is attached the opinion of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia, recently delivered in the case of Western Union Tel. Co. v. Georgia R. etc. Co. 227 Fed. 276, and counsel seem to be impressed with the idea that that decision lends color to the theory now advanced. The statement of facts, as well as the opinion itself show, however, that the telegraph company in this instance had acquired by contract a perpetual easement in the right of way. We quote from the opinion as follows: "A reading of these two contracts discloses beyond question that the predecessors of the Western Union Telegraph Company were granted perpetual easement in and upon the rights of way of the said railroads for the construction, maintenance, and operation of telegraph lines on same, and that such grants became irrevocable and assignable upon the construction of said telegraph lines as long as same should be kept in operation."

A reading of the case therefore discloses that it is easily differentiated from the one here under consideration. We are therefore not at all impressed with this last theory of

NOTE.

Contrary to the general current of authority, it is held in the reported case that to warrant the condemnation by a telegraph company of the right to erect its line on a railroad right of way an actual necessity for the taking must exist, i. e., the condemnor must be unable to acquire a suitable right of way over private lands. For a discussion of the power of a telegraph or telephone company under a state statute to condemn a railroad right of way, see the note to Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 670.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY

LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

Indiana Supreme Court—May 25, 1915.

Eminent Domain — Condemnation by Telegraph Company — Taking of Railroad Right of Way — Inconsistency of Use.

Under Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 929, regulating the matters of entry, survey, effort to purchase, and title taken in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and section 5770 providing that telegraph companies may acquire such rights of way as may be necessary for their purposes under the writ of assessment of damages, the right of a telegraph company to condemn by writ of assessment a right of way for poles and wires along defendant railroad's right of way depends upon the degree of interference which such poles and wires will cause in the railroad use, since, although lands once condemned to public use cannot be subsequently condemned for a second public use inconsistent with the former, which would destroy it, unless there is a statute expressly conferring such right, nevertheless, under a right to condemn conferred by general statute, a second appropriation of land already devoted to public use may be had where the subsequent use will not be too inconsistent with the former, so that the interference therewith may be compensated in damages.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal and Error — Review of Facts.

In reviewing evidence on appeal from denial of a motion for new trial, the appellate court can consider only the evidence most favorable to the appellee.

Same.

Where an ultimate material fact is to be inferred from other facts, it is for the trier of the facts to draw the inference, and, when the facts upon which the inference is based are such that reasonable minds may draw opposite inferences therefrom, the appellate court cannot say that the fact found, as a result of the inference drawn, is not sustained by evidence, unless the facts are undisputed, and the verdict or finding is opposed to the only reasonable inference therefrom.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Vanderburgh county: GIVENS, Judge.

Action by Western Union Telegraph Company, plaintiff, against Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

J. E. Williamson, Pickens, Moores, Davidson & Pickens and Geo. H. Fearons for appellant.

Philip W. Frey and G. R. DeBruler for appellees.

[259] LAIRY, J.—This action was brought by appellant company to condemn and appropriate a right of way for its telegraph poles and wires longitudinally upon the right of way of appellee, South, East and St. Louis Railway Company operated by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company. The action was filed in the Vanderburgh Circuit [260] Court and affects that portion of the right of way which lies within Vanderburgh County. Appellees filed a number of objections; and, after hearing the evidence the court sustained the third, fifth, sixth, eleventh and thirteenth specifications of objection, and refused to appoint appraisers. The right of appellant to condemn the land described in its complaint for the purpose designated was thus denied. Appellant filed a motion for a new trial which was overruled.

The several alleged errors assigned and relied on for reversal present in different forms only a single question, and that is the right of appellant, under the pleadings and the proof to condemn the real estate described in the complaint.

By the statutes of this State, a telegraph company has a right to avail itself of the writ of assessment of damages for the purpose of acquiring land for the location and maintenance of its necessary poles and lines.

§§ 5770, 929 Burns 1914, § 4166 R. S. 1881, Acts 1905 p. 59. It is well settled that where land has been once appropriated to an important public use, the power of eminent domain can not be invoked for the purpose of taking it for a second public use which is wholly inconsistent with the former and which would entirely supersede and destroy the use to which the land is already devoted, unless there is a statute expressly conferring such right, or from which such right arises by necessary inference. Ft. Wayne v. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. (1892) 132 Ind. 558, 32 N. E. 215, 32 Am. St. Rep. 277, 18 L.R.A. 367; City of Valparaiso v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (1890) 123 Ind. 467, 24 N. E. 249; Gold v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. (1899) 153 Ind. 232, 53 N. E. 285. It seems to be equally well settled that a right to condemn conferred by a general statute authorizes, by implication, the second or subsequent appropriation of land already devoted to a public use in cases where such subsequent use is not inconsistent with [261] the former and where such subsequent use is of such a character that it will not interfere with the use to which such land is already devoted. Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Anderson (1894) 139 Ind. 490, 38 N. E. 167, 47 Am. St. Rep. 285; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (1903) 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Jackson County (1901) 156 Ind. 260, 58 N. E. 837, 59 N. E. 856.

The interference of a proposed subsequent use may be so complete and absolute as to entirely destroy and supersede such former use, or it may be so slight as to be merely nominal, occasioning no inconvenience whatever. In either case there is no doubt as to the law with respect to a subsequent condemnation. In the first instance, the right to condemn does not exist unless it is conferred by statute, either expressly or by necessary implication; and, in the second instance, the right to condemn is inferred from a statute giving general authority to condemn. Between a slight and inconsiderable interference on the one hand and an interference which is so complete and absolute as to entirely destroy and supersede a former use on the other, cases may be found presenting all shades and degrees of interference and inconvenience. In cases where the subsequent use for which the appropriation is sought is not of such a character as to destroy the former use but is of such a character as to interfere with it to a greater or less extent, the rule is not so apparent. Under the authorities it seems that a slight or inconsiderable interference with a former use may be compensated in damages and the appropriation allowed; and, that where the interference and inconvenience which would result are material and substantial, damages cannot be awarded and the right to condemn does not exist; but our investigation has not disclosed any case in which a court has attempted to fix a standard by which the degree of interference or inconvenience can be measured so as to determine with accuracy when the degree of interference and inconvenience passes the stage where it can be [262] compensated in damages and becomes so substantial and material as to preclude the right of a second appropriation. For the reason stated each case must depend largely on the particular facts involved, and little assistance can be gained from an examination of text books or decided cases.

By the refusal of the trial court to appoint appraisers in this case, it decided from the evidence admitted under the objections filed that the construction and maintenance of a line of poles and telegraph wires over that part of the railroad right of way sought to be condemned, would constitute a substantial and material interference with the use of such right of way for railroad purposes. The issue is fairly presented by the fifth and eleventh objections filed and the finding of the trial court must be sustained on appeal if there is some evidence to support it. As this court has no power to weigh conflicting evidence, it can consider only the evidence most favorable to appellee in passing upon the question thus presented.

The right of way over which appellant seeks to acquire the right to construct and maintain its telegraph line extends from the city of Evansville to a point near Howell where there is a Y. From this dividing point one part of the right of way extends down the Ohio River on the north side to a bridge where it crosses to Henderson, Kentucky. From this Y another part of the right of way extends in a westerly direction through Posey County to and beyond the Wabash River. The evidence shows that this right of way varies in width from over 100 feet at the widest places to from 50 to 75 feet at the narrowest. From Evansville to Howell there is a double track and on the other parts of the right of way there is a single track and the tracks are located near the center of the right of way. At the time of the trial there was a line of poles and wires located on the right of way which had been operated by the Western Union Telegraph Company [263] of New York under a contract which had expired or which was about to expire, and it was the purpose of appellant by this proceeding to acquire the right to construct and maintain its pole line in practically the same location on the right of way as that occupied by the existing pole line. There is evidence to show that the proper operation of trains upon the railway requires that telegraph or telephone lines should be constructed and maintained by the company operating the railroad and that the operating company contemplated in the near future the installing and maintaining of an automatic electric signal system. The evidence relating to the inconvenience which an additional line of poles would occasion, and the extent to which such a line of poles and wires would interfere with the successful operation of the railroad by injuring and impairing the efficiency of the system of signals and by otherwise impeding the operation of trains and rendering the service less safe and convenient, is conflicting; but the evidence most favorable to appellee shows a state of facts from which the trial court was justified in drawing the inference that the construction and maintenance of such a line of poles and wires would constitute a material and substantial interference with the public use to which the right of way in question was already devoted. Where an ultimate material fact is to be inferred from other facts proved it is the province of the court or jury trying the facts to draw the inference and thus to find the ultimate fact. When the facts upon which the inference is based are of such a nature that reasonable minds might rightly draw opposite inferences therefrom, this court cannot say that the fact found as a result of such inference is not sustained by evidence. That can be done only in cases where the facts are undisputed and where the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial court is opposed to the only inference that can be rightly and reasonably drawn from such facts. [264] Speck v. Kenoyer (1905) 164 Ind. 431, 73 N. E. 896; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Berry (1894) 9 Ind. App. 63, 35 N. E. 565, 36 N. E. 646. In view of the conclusion we have reached, other questions presented need not be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that under the peculiar facts presented by that case the occupation of a railroad right of way by the poles and wires of a telegraph company is so substantial an interference with the use of the property by the railroad that the telegraph company is not entitled to condemn the right so to occupy it. The cases relating to the power of a telegraph or telephone company to condemn a railroad right of way under a state statute are reviewed in the note to Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 670.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Vanderburgh county: GIVENS, Judge.

Action by Western Union Telegraph Company, plaintiff, against Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

J. E. Williamson, Pickens, Moores, Davidson & Pickens and Geo. H. Fearons for appellant.

Philip W. Frey and G. R. DeBruler for appellees.

[259] LARRY, J.—This action was brought by appellant company to condemn and appropriate a right of way for its telegraph poles and wires longitudinally upon the right of way of appellee, South, East and St. Louis Railway Company operated by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company. The action was filed in the Vanderburgh Circuit [260] Court and affects that portion of the right of way which lies within Vanderburgh County. Appellees filed a number of objections; and, after hearing the evidence the court sustained the third, fifth, sixth, eleventh and thirteenth specifications of objection, and refused to appoint appraisers. The right of appellant to condemn the land described in its complaint for the purpose designated was thus denied. Appellant filed a motion for a new trial which was overruled.

The several alleged errors assigned and relied on for reversal present in different forms only a single question, and that is the right of appellant, under the pleadings and the proof to condemn the real estate described in the complaint.

By the statutes of this State, a telegraph company has a right to avail itself of the writ of assessment of damages for the purpose of acquiring land for the location and maintenance of its necessary poles and lines.

§§ 5770, 929 Burns 1914, § 4166 R. S. 1881, Acts 1905 p. 59. It is well settled that where land has been once appropriated to an important public use, the power of eminent domain can not be invoked for the purpose of taking it for a second public use which is wholly inconsistent with the former and which would entirely supersede and destroy the use to which the land is already devoted, unless there is a statute expressly conferring such right, or from which such right arises by necessary inference. Ft. Wayne v. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. (1892) 132 Ind. 558, 32 N. E. 215, 32 Am. St. Rep. 277, 18 L.R.A. 367; City of Valparaiso v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (1890) 123 Ind. 467, 24 N. E. 249; Gold v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. (1899) 153 Ind. 232, 53 N. E. 285. It seems to be equally well settled that a right to condemn conferred by a general statute authorizes, by implication, the second or subsequent appropriation of land already devoted to a public use in cases where such subsequent use is not inconsistent with [261] the former and where such subsequent use is of such a character that it will not interfere with the use to which such land is already devoted. Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Anderson (1894) 139 Ind. 490, 38 N. E. 167, 47 Am. St. Rep. 285; Postal Tel.-Cable Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. (1903) 30 Ind. App. 654, 66 N. E. 919; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Jackson County (1901) 156 Ind. 260, 58 N. E. 837, 59 N. E. 856.

The interference of a proposed subsequent use may be so complete and absolute as to entirely destroy and supersede such former use, or it may be so slight as to be merely nominal, occasioning no inconvenience whatever. In either case there is no doubt as to the law with respect to a subsequent condemnation. In the first instance, the right to condemn does not exist unless it is conferred by statute, either expressly or by necessary implication; and, in the second instance, the right to condemn is inferred from a statute giving general authority to condemn. Between a slight and inconsiderable interference on the one hand and an interference which is so complete and absolute as to entirely destroy and supersede a former use on the other, cases may be found presenting all shades and degrees of interference and inconvenience. In cases where the subsequent use for which the appropriation is sought is not of such a character as to destroy the former use but is of such a character as to interfere with it to a greater or less extent, the rule is not so apparent. Under the authorities it seems that a slight or inconsiderable interference with a former use may be compensated in damages and the appropriation allowed; and, that where the interference and inconvenience which would result are material and substantial, damages cannot be awarded and the right to condemn does not exist; but our investigation has not disclosed any case in which a court has attempted to fix a standard by which the degree of interference or inconvenience can be measured so as to determine with accuracy when the degree of interference and inconvenience passes the stage where it can be [262] compensated in damages and becomes so substantial and material as to preclude the right of a second appropriation. For the reason stated each case must depend largely on the particular facts involved, and little assistance can be gained from an examination of text books or decided cases.

By the refusal of the trial court to appoint appraisers in this case, it decided from the evidence admitted under the objections filed that the construction and maintenance of a line of poles and telegraph wires over that part of the railroad right of way sought to be condemned, would constitute a substantial and material interference with the use of such right of way for railroad purposes. The issue is fairly presented by the fifth and eleventh objections filed and the finding of the trial court must be sustained on appeal if there is some evidence to support it. As this court has no power to weigh conflicting evidence, it can consider only the evidence most favorable to appellee in passing upon the question thus presented.

The right of way over which appellant seeks to acquire the right to construct and maintain its telegraph line extends from the city of Evansville to a point near Howell where there is a Y. From this dividing point one part of the right of way extends down the Ohio River on the north side to a bridge where it crosses to Henderson, Kentucky. From this Y another part of the right of way extends in a westerly direction through Posey County to and beyond the Wabash River. The evidence shows that this right of way varies in width from over 100 feet at the widest places to from 50 to 75 feet at the narrowest. From Evansville to Howell there is a double track and on the other parts of the right of way there is a single track and the tracks are located near the center of the right of way. At the time of the trial there was a line of poles and wires located on the right of way which had been operated by the Western Union Telegraph Company [263] of New York under a contract which had expired or which was about to expire, and it was the purpose of appellant by this proceeding to acquire the right to construct and maintain its pole line in practically the same location on the right of way as that occupied by the existing pole line. There is evidence to show that the proper operation of trains upon the railway requires that telegraph or telephone lines should be constructed and maintained by the company operating the railroad and that the operating company contemplated in the near future the installing and maintaining of an automatic electric signal system. The evidence relating to the inconvenience which an additional line of poles would occasion, and the extent to which such a line of poles and wires would interfere with the successful operation of the railroad by injuring and impairing the efficiency of the system of signals and by otherwise impeding the operation of trains and rendering the service less safe and convenient, is conflicting; but the evidence most favorable to appellee shows a state of facts from which the trial court was justified in drawing the inference that the construction and maintenance of such a line of poles and wires would constitute a material and substantial interference with the public use to which the right of way in question was already devoted. Where an ultimate material fact is to be inferred from other facts proved it is the province of the court or jury trying the facts to draw the inference and thus to find the ultimate fact. When the facts upon which the inference is based are of such a nature that reasonable minds might rightly draw opposite inferences therefrom, this court cannot say that the fact found as a result of such inference is not sustained by evidence. That can be done only in cases where the facts are undisputed and where the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial court is opposed to the only inference that can be rightly and reasonably drawn from such facts. [264] Speck v. Kenoyer (1905) 164 Ind. 431, 73 N. E. 896; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Berry (1894) 9 Ind. App. 63, 35 N. E. 565, 36 N. E. 646. In view of the conclusion we have reached, other questions presented need not be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that under the peculiar facts presented by that case the occupation of a railroad right of way by the poles and wires of a telegraph company is so substantial an interference with the use of the property by the railroad that the telegraph company is not entitled to condemn the right so to occupy it. The cases relating to the power of a telegraph or telephone company to condemn a railroad right of way under a state statute are reviewed in the note to *Western Union Tel. Co. v. Louisville, etc. R. of the sale. To reduce appellants' liability for the value thus found, the trial judge ordered the proceeds of the sale to be paid to respondent. To this order, the appellants can take no exception, as it was beneficial to them. Appellants, however, contend that the proper measure of damages is the difference between the price obtained and that which could have been obtained by a sale under respondent's execution. We think the trial court adopted the correct rule. 35 Cyc. 1698.

Rights of Parties on Sale under Junior Attachment or Execution.

Introductory, 710.

Rights as to Proceeds of Sale, 710.

Liability of Sheriff, 712.

Title of Purchaser, 712.

Introductory.

The decisions are not in harmony as to the rights of the parties interested where property against which two or more attachments or executions have been issued is sold under the junior writ. It is agreed that the purchaser takes title by the sale, and also that the selling officer may under some circumstances be liable in damages to the holder of the senior writ. There is of course no dispute as to the proposition that the lien acquired under the senior writ is in no way divested. But while the prevailing rule seems to be that the holder of the senior writ is entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the sale, some courts adhere to the doctrine that the proceeds should be applied first to the claim of the holder of the junior writ, leaving the senior lien holder to pursue his remedy against the land or against the selling officer.

The present discussion is confined to a review of cases wherein the junior writ is inferior in right at the time of the sale thereunder, excluding from consideration the effect of a waiver or loss of the priority of the senior writ.

Rights as to Proceeds of Sale.

The rule that on the sale of property under a junior attachment or execution the holder thereof is first entitled to the satisfaction of his claim out of the proceeds of the sale obtains in a few jurisdictions. Love v. Williams, 4 Fla. 126; Kilby v. Haggin, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 208; Reynolds v. Ingersoll, 11

Smedes & M. (Miss.) 249, 49 Am. Dec. 57. See also Mushback v. Ryerson, 11 N. J. L. 346; Sandford v. Roosa, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 162. In Hanauer v. Casey, 26 Ark. 352, it was said that the rule resulted from the fact that the senior attachment still bound real estate after a sale under the junior attachment or execution. The court pointed out, however, that this rule did not obtain as to personal property because on the sale of such property the liens thereon were released. In Woods v. Kellerman, 3 Cal. App. 422, 80 Pac. 358, the court said: "The second point made by the appellant seems to be based upon the propositions: That where there are several executions against the same property in the hands of the sheriff, any sale made by the sheriff, though under a junior execution, is, in effect, a sale upon all the executions; and that the money is to be credited on the several liens in the order of their priority. This, from the authorities cited, seems to be the law in some states; but, according to the better opinion, 'in the majority, the senior liens, whether existing by judgment or otherwise, are not impaired by the sale.' And even in those states where a different rule obtains, it is said: 'If it be understood and agreed between the parties in interest and the purchaser that he will take the property subject to prior incumbrances, this agreement will be enforced, the judgment creditor making the sale will be entitled to the proceeds, and the prior lien-holders will retain their liens against the property.' (Freeman on Executions, sec. 338.) The majority rule, we think, obtains in this state; but, if otherwise, the case would clearly come within the exception stated. For here the sale seems to have been made by an arrangement to which all the parties to the immediate transaction assented; and we do not doubt as to them the sales were valid as made. The defendant redeemed with full notice of this arrangement and did not by his redemption acquire any additional rights."

The more general view is, however, that on the sale of property under a junior execution or attachment the holder of the senior writ is entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the sale. Speelman v. Chaffee, 5 Colo. 247; People v. Smith, 29 Ill. App. 577; Rogers v. Edmunds, 6 N. H. 70; Green v. Johnson, 9 N. C. 309, 11 Am. Dec. 763; Schuylkill County's Appeal, 30 Pa. St. 358 (both levies being made); Landis v. Evans, 113 Pa. St. 332, 6 Atl. 908; Platt-Barber Co. v. Groves, 193 Pa. St. 475; Furman v. Christie, 3 Rich. L. (S. C.) 1; Arnold v. McKellar, 9 S. C. 335; Lemmond v. Short, 3 Strob. L. (S. C.) 313; Blair v. Horseby, Dud. L. (S. C.) 357; Jackson v. Heiskell, 1 Leigh (Va.) 257; Rowe v. Jarvis, 13 U. C. C. P. 495. See also the reported case. And see Vance v. Red, 2 Speer's L. (S. C.) 90; Garner v. Cutler, 28 Tex. 175. Compare McClelland v. Slingluff, 7 Watts & S. (Pa.) 134, 42 Am. Dec. 224. In Beck v. Brady, 7 La. Ann. 1, the court said: "The code of practice, however, gives the following effect to a writ of attachment: The sheriff must seize and detain so much of the debtor's property, as may be equal in value to the amount claimed in the suit. Art. 256. He must take charge and keep possession of all the goods and effects which he may have attached (art. 257); and the plaintiff may, after other proper steps, proceed to obtain judgment, and, on execution of the same, have so much of the property attached sold, as will suffice to satisfy his judgment. Art. 265. The preceding article, 264, is equally explicit to the same effect. Now, all his diligence in ascertaining and establishing the grounds for his attachment; in searching out and, as in this case, by an expensive suit, attended with some risk, subjecting property fraudulently covered from creditors by a fictitious sale; in going through a tedious and expensive suit to establish his claim and obtain judgment, would be nugatory, if another creditor, during the delay, might step in and take the property attached by an execution, and obtain payment by privilege, without any other cause of preference than the seizure. The law never intended such an absurdity. In this case the plaintiffs, though they sued and attached first, would have to give up the property and go to New York to sue, after all their expense and trouble, which would inure to the benefit of those who sued and attached last, instead of subjecting the last to the necessity of seeking their claim abroad. The sense of right implanted in every bosom would repudiate such injustice. The true principle is this: That the creditor who is most diligent and uses the process of law to secure his rights cannot be deprived of the beneficial effects of that process, by one less diligent in using it. One who has no better right at the time, that is no privilege, mortgage or lien, cannot subsequently acquire either, so as to defeat the process of law in his favor. He does not claim a privilege strictly so as to defeat the process of law in his favor. He does not claim a privilege strictly so called, but that the beneficial effects of the process of law in his favor should not be rendered nugatory by process subsequently issued in favor of another ordinary creditor; or, which is the same thing, by a privilege subsequently acquired by mere process of law. The principle may be illustrated by reference to another provision of our code. Payment to the prejudice of an attachment cannot be made. Now, the creditor by execution and seizure acquires the rights of his debtor upon the property seized, and no more. But the debtor could not dispose of the property for payment, to the prejudice of the attachment, and therefore his creditor cannot by seizing and selling it take the proceeds to the prejudice of the attachment." And in Speelman v. Chaffee, 5 Colo. 247, it was said: "It is insisted by counsel that, even allowing the sale to have been made under a junior lien, yet the title passed thereby to the appellant as purchaser. It is doubtless true, under the authorities, that when the same officer holds more than one writ, differing in priority, he may sell under a junior writ; and if he does this, the property cannot, merely under the senior writ, be taken from the purchaser. In such case, however, the proceeds of the sale must be applied to the writ having the prior lien. Freeman on Executions, sec. 196; Rogers v. Dickey, 1 Gilman (Ill.) 643. But in order to pass title to the purchaser in such case, the sale must be fully consummated, the money paid and the property delivered to the purchaser. Unless he fully complies with his bid and the terms which such bid imposes, or offers so to do, he acquires no right to the property, and can maintain no action or proceeding in relation thereto. See Freeman on Executions, sec. 300, and cases cited. To this rule is the exception, that if the officer surrenders the property to the purchaser, or otherwise treats the sale as consummated, the officer becomes responsible to the plaintiff for the amount of the bid."

In Caperton v. McCorkle, 5 Grat. (Va.) 177, wherein it appeared that during the pendency of an appeal from an order quashing the senior execution the sheriff sold under the junior one, it was held that on reversal of the judgment quashing the senior writ, the proceeds of the sale were first subject to the satisfaction of the senior writ, and could be recovered from the holder of the later execution.

But it has been held that a junior execution creditor may sell and obtain satisfaction from the proceeds notwithstanding the existence of a senior execution, the holder of which prevented the sheriff from selling thereunder. Williams v. Chambers, 140 Ga. 859, 80 S. E. 273. In the case of In re J. R. Richardson Co. 3 Boyce (Del.) 336, 83 Atl. 1034, wherein it appeared that the holder of a senior execution sought to claim the proceeds of a sale under a junior execution, it was held that the senior execution not having been levied although placed in the officer's hand before the second execution, the validity of the sale under the second execution could not be impeached and that the holder of the junior writ was entitled to the proceeds of the sale. To the same effect see McClelland v. Slingluff, 7 Watts & S. (Pa.) 134, 42 Am. Dec. 224.

Liability of Sheriff.

The action of a sheriff in selling under a junior attachment or execution when the circumstances impose the duty on him of selling under the senior writ, entitles the senior incumbrancer to sue the sheriff for damages. Love v. Williams, 4 Fla. 126; Kilby v. Haggin, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 208; Rogers v. Dickey, 1 Gilman (Ill.) 636, 41 Am. Dec. 204; Grabenheimer v. Budd, 40 La. Ann. 107, 3 So. 724; Marsh v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 461; McKey v. Garth, 2 Rob. (Va.) 33, 40 Am. Dec. 726. See also Sandford v. Roosa, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 162. And see the reported case. In Stroudsburg Bank's Appeal, 126 Pa. St. 523, 12 Atl. 868, it appeared that the holder of a senior writ of execution placed it in the hands of a sheriff who negligently failed to make a timely levy thus precluding the holder from satisfying the amount of his claim out of the proceeds of the property which was sold under a junior execution. It was held that the sheriff was liable to the holder of the senior execution. The court said: "The property levied upon and sold consisted wholly of that which had been set aside under a previous writ issued by the bank on their judgment: there were no other judgments, and it does not appear that there were, in fact, any labor claims; there was therefore no motive for any fraudulent action or collusion. The execution of D. H. Wilson & Co. having been first issued would ordinarily, therefore, be first entitled; but, unfortunately, there was no levy made upon that writ. The levy was made upon the writ of the bank only, and upon that writ the personal property was sold. In McClelland v. Slingluff, 7 Watts & S. (Pa.) 134, it was held that in such case the sheriff must apply the money to the writ upon which the levy and sale were made, and not to the first writ, upon which no levy was indorsed or attached. The money made when this is the case, says Mr. Justice Rogers, belongs to the second execution creditor on whose writ the goods were levied and sold, leaving the first execution creditor to an action against the sheriff for redress. To the same effect is Schuykill County's Appeal, 30 Pa. St. 358."

In Smallcomb v. Cross, 1 Ld. Raym. (Eng.) 251, 1 Salk. 320, in speaking of the liability of a sheriff who sells under a junior execution, in preference to the senior one, the court said: "By the same reason, if two writs of fieri facias come to the sheriff in one day, he ought to execute that writ first which came to hand first, for he has no election; and in this case there is a prius and a posterius in the same day. In consequence the sheriff makes himself liable for executing the writ first that came last, and must answer it to the party that brought the first writ, who may bring an action against him; but the execution shall stand good."

Title of Purchaser.

It is a general rule that title passes to the purchaser on a sale under a junior attachment or execution. Smallcomb v. Cross, 1 Ld. Raym. (Eng.) 251, 1 Salk. 320; Speelman v. Chaffee, 5 Colo. 247; In re J. R. Richardson Co. 3 Boyce (Del.) 336, 83 Atl. 1034; Love v. Williams, 4 Fla. 126; Rogers v. Dickey, 1 Gilman (Ill.) 636, 41 Am. Dec. 204; Kilby v. Haggin, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 208; McKey v. Garth, 2 Rob. (Va.) 33, 40 Am. Dec. 725. See also Sandford v. Roosa, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 162. And see the reported cases. Thus in March v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 461, it was declared that a sale under a junior execution vested the purchaser with an indefeasible title, and this even though the senior and junior executions were in hands of different officers. The court said: "If the executions are in the hands of different officers, then the liability of the sheriff to whom the first execution was delivered, would depend on the question, whether he had been guilty of negligence in not having made a levy before the sale under the second execution. If there be no negligence, I apprehend the party would be without redress, unless the money produced by the sale under the second execution happened to remain in the hands of the sheriff, when an application was made to the court for a rule directing to whom it should be paid over. This was done in Lambert v. Paulding, 18 Johns. 311. If, however, it should appear that the money actually raised on the second execution had been paid over to the plaintiff in that execution, this remedy would fail; and, consequently, the lien arising by the first delivery would become ineffectual. Whatever might be the result of an application against an officer of the court, directing him to pay over money, the execution of this summary jurisdiction would not be used to enforce such an application against an officer of another court, over whom this court has no control. But if otherwise, it does not affect the present question, which is between the sheriff and the purchaser under the second execution. The general principle, it appears to me, goes the whole length of upholding the title of the purchaser under the second execution, provided the levy and sale were perfected, before a levy on the first. The fact that one execution issued from this court, or the common pleas, and the other from justice's court, cannot change the principle which governs." And in Love v. Williams, 4 Fla. 126, it was said: "It is true that all the authorities lay down the proposition that, as between different plaintiffs, if two writs of execution are delivered to the sheriff on the same or different days, he ought to execute that first which was first delivered, unless it be fraudulent or dormant; but if he executes, that is, levies and sells, by virtue of the writ last delivered, the property of the goods is bound by the sale, and the party cannot seize them by virtue of the writ first delivered."

In Berg v. Baer, 104 Ga. 587, 30 S. E. 744, a sale under a junior execution under circumstances leading the purchaser to believe that the property would be sold free of the senior lien was held to vest in the purchaser an unencumbered title.

BRUSHABER

v.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

United States Supreme Court—January 24, 1916.

240 U. S. 1; 36 S. Ct. 236.

Taxation — Enjoining Payment — Rights of Corporate Stockholder.

The maintenance by a stockholder of a suit to restrain a corporation from voluntarily complying with the income tax provisions of the Tariff Act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), upon the grounds of the repugnancy of the statute to the Federal Constitution, of the peculiar relation of the corporation to the stockholders, and their particular interests resulting from many of the administrative provisions of the assailed act, of the confusion, wrong, and multiplicity of suits, and the absence of all means of redress, which will result if the corporation pays the tax and complies with the act in other respects without protest, as it is alleged it is its intention to do, is not forbidden by the prohibition of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3224, 3 Fed. St. Ann. 689, against enjoining the enforcement of taxes.

Income Tax — Validity of Federal Act.

The whole purpose of U. S. Const. 16th Amend. giving Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several states, and without regard to any census or enumeration," is to exclude the source from which a taxed income was derived as the criterion by which to determine the applicability of the constitutional requirement as to apportionment of direct taxes.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The retroactive effect of the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 135), which fix the preceding March 1st as the time from which the taxed income for the first ten months is to be computed, does not render the tax repugnant to the due process of law clause of U. S. Const. 5th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 288), nor inconsistent with the 16th Amendment itself, since the date of retroactivity did not extend beyond the time when the latter amendment became operative.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Power to exclude from taxation some income of designated persons and classes, and to exempt entirely certain enumerated organizations or corporations, such as labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, mutual savings banks, etc., is not by implication forbidden to Congress by the provisions of U. S. Const. 16th Amend. that Congress may lay and collect taxes on incomes "from whatever source derived"

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, mutual savings banks, etc., can be excepted from the operation of the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), without rendering the tax repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

[See note at end of this case.]

Uniformity of Tax — Limitations on Federal Power.

A geographical uniformity alone is what is exacted by the provisions of U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8 (8 Fed. St. Ann. 347), that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Same.

The due process of law clause of U. S. Const. 5th Amend. (9 Fed. St. Ann. 288), is not a limitation upon the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution unless, under a seeming exercise of the taxing power, the taxing statute is so arbitrary as to compel the conclusion that it was not the exertion of taxation, but the confiscation of property, or is so wanting in basis for classification as to produce such a gross and patent inequality as inevitably to lead to the same conclusion.

Validity of Federal Income Tax Act.

The progressive rate feature of the income tax imposed by the Act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), does not cause such tax to transcend the conception of all taxation, and to be a mere arbitrary abuse of power which must be treated as wanting in due process of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The methods of collection at the source, prescribed by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), are not wanting in due process of law because of the cost to which corporations are subjected by the duty of collection cast upon them, nor because of the resulting discrimination between corporations indebted upon coupon and registered bonds and those not so indebted, nor because of the discrimination against corporations which have assumed the payment of taxes on their bonds which results from the fact that some or all of their bondholders may be exempt from the income tax, nor because of the discrimination against owners of corporate bonds in favor of individuals none of whose income is derived from such property, nor because the law does not release corporate bondholders from the payment of a tax on their bonds, even after such taxes have been deducted by the corporation, if, after the deduction, the corporation should fail, nor because the payment of the tax by the corporation does not relieve the owners of bonds, the taxes on which have been assumed by the corporation, from their duty to include the income from such bonds in making a return of all income.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Limiting the amount of interest which may be deducted from gross income of a corporation for the purpose of fixing the taxable income to interest on indebtedness not exceeding one-half the sum of bonded indebtedness and paid-up capital stock, as is done by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), is not wanting in due process of law because discriminating between different classes of corporations and individuals.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Allowing individuals to deduct from their gross income dividends paid them by corporations whose incomes are taxed, and not giving such right of deduction to corporations, as is done by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), does not render the tax wanting in due process of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The allowance of a deduction of $3,000 or $4,000 to those who pay the normal tax, as is done by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), is not wanting in due process of law because those whose incomes are greater than $20,000 are not allowed, for the purpose of the additional or progressive tax, a second right to deduct the $3,000 or $4,000 which they have already enjoyed, nor because, for the purpose of the additional tax, no second right to deduct dividends received from corporations is permitted.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The allowance of a deduction of stated amounts for the purpose of ascertaining the taxable income, as is done by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), does not render the tax wanting in due process of law because of the discrimination between married and single people, and between husbands and wives who are living together and those who are not.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

No unconstitutional discrimination and want of due process of law results because the owners of houses in which they live are not compelled by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), to estimate the rental value in making up their incomes, while those who live in rented houses are not allowed, in making up their taxable income, to deduct the rent which they have paid, nor because of the fact that although family expenses are not, as a rule, permitted to be deducted from gross income, farmers are permitted to omit from their income return certain products of the farm which are susceptible of use by them for sustaining their families during the year.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An unwarrantable delegation of legislative authority is not made by the income tax provisions of the tariff act of October 3, 1913 (38 Stat. at L. 166, chap. 16, Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185), because certain administrative powers to enforce the act are conferred by it upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

Appeal from United States District Court, Southern District of New York.

Action by Frank R. Brushaber, plaintiff, against Union Pacific Railroad Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion.

AFFIRMED.

Julien T. Davies, Brainard Tolles, Garrard Glenn and Martin A. Schenck for appellant.
Henry W. Clark for appellee.

Solicitor General Davis, Assistant Attorney General Wallace and Attorney General Gregory for United States.

[9] WHITE, C. J.—As a stockholder of the Union Pacific Railroad Company the appellant filed his bill to enjoin the corporation from complying with the Income Tax provisions of the Tariff Act of October 3, 1913 (§ II, ch. 16, 38 Stat. 166; Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185). Because of constitutional questions duly arising the case is here on direct appeal from a decree sustaining a motion to dismiss because no ground for relief was stated.

The right to prevent the corporation from returning and paying the tax was based upon many averments as to the repugnancy of the statute to the Constitution of the United States, of the peculiar relation of the corporation to the stockholders and their particular interests resulting from many of the administrative provisions of the assailed act, of the confusion, wrong and multiplicity [10] of suits and the absence of all means of redress which would result if the corporation paid the tax and complied with the act in other respects without protest, as it was alleged it was its intention to do. To put out of the way a question of jurisdiction we at once say that in view of these averments and the ruling in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 15 S. Ct. 673, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 759, sustaining the right of a stockholder to sue to restrain a corporation under proper averments from voluntarily paying a tax charged to be unconstitutional on the ground that to permit such a suit did not violate the prohibitions of § 3224, Rev. Stat. against enjoining the enforcement of taxes, we are of opinion that the contention here made that there was no jurisdiction of the cause since to entertain it would violate the provisions of the Revised Statutes referred to is without merit. Before coming to dispose of the case on the merits, however, we observe that the defendant corporation having called the attention of the Government to the pendency of the cause and the nature of the controversy and its unwillingness to voluntarily refuse to comply with the act assailed, the United States as amicus curiae has at bar been heard both orally and by brief for the purpose of sustaining the decree.

Aside from averments as to citizenship and residence, recitals as to the provisions of the statute and statements as to the business of the corporation contained in the first ten paragraphs of the bill advanced to sustain jurisdiction, the bill alleged twenty-one constitutional objections specified in that number of paragraphs or subdivisions. As all the grounds assert a violation of the Constitution, it follows that in a wide sense they all charge a repugnancy of the statute to the Sixteenth Amendment under the more immediate sanction of which the statute was adopted.

The various propositions are so intermingled as to cause it to be difficult to classify them. We are of opinion, however, [11] that the confusion is not inherent, but rather arises from the conclusion that the Sixteenth Amendment provides for a hitherto unknown power of taxation, that is, a power to levy an income tax which although direct should not be subject to the regulation of apportionment applicable to all other direct taxes. And the far-reaching effect of this erroneous assumption will be made clear by generalizing the many contentions advanced in argument to support it, as follows: (a) The Amendment authorizes only a particular character of direct tax without apportionment, and therefore if a tax is levied under its assumed authority which does not partake of the characteristics exacted by the Amendment, it is outside of the Amendment and is void as a direct tax in the general constitutional sense because not apportioned. (b) As the Amendment authorizes a tax only upon incomes "from whatever source derived," the exclusion from taxation of some income of designated persons and classes is not authorized and hence the constitutionality of the law must be tested by the general provisions of the Constitution as to taxation, and thus again the tax is void for want of apportionment. (c) As the right to tax "incomes from whatever source derived" for which the Amendment provides must be considered as exacting intrinsic uniformity, therefore no tax comes under the authority of the Amendment not conforming to such standard, and hence all the provisions of the assailed statute must once more be tested solely under the general and pre-existing provisions of the Constitution, causing the statute again to be void in the absence of apportionment. (d) As the power conferred by the Amendment is new and prospective, the attempt in the statute to make its provisions retroactively apply is void because so far as the retroactive period is concerned, it is governed by the pre-existing constitutional requirement as to apportionment.

But it clearly results that the proposition and the contentions [12] under it, if acceded to, would cause one provision of the Constitution to destroy another; that is, they would result in bringing the provisions of the Amendment exempting a direct tax from apportionment into irreconcilable conflict with the general requirement that all direct taxes be apportioned. Moreover, the tax authorized by the Amendment, being direct, would not come under the rule of uniformity applicable under the Constitution to other than direct taxes, and thus it would come to pass that the result of the Amendment would be to authorize a particular direct tax not subject either to apportionment or to the rule of geographical uniformity, thus giving power to impose a different tax in one State or States than was levied in another State or States. This result instead of simplifying the situation and making clear the limitations on the taxing power, which obviously the Amendment must have been intended to accomplish, would create radical and destructive changes in our constitutional system and multiply confusion.

But let us by a demonstration of the error of the fundamental proposition as to the significance of the Amendment dispel the confusion necessarily arising from the arguments deduced from it. Before coming, however, to the text of the Amendment, to the end that its significance may be determined in the light of the previous legislative and judicial history of the subject with which the Amendment is concerned and with a knowledge of the conditions which presumptively led up to its adoption and hence of the purpose it was intended to accomplish, we make a brief statement on those subjects.

That the authority conferred upon Congress by § 8 of Article I (8 Fed. St. Ann. 347) "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises" is exhaustive and embraces every conceivable power of taxation has never been questioned, or, if it has, has been so often authoritatively declared as to render it necessary only to state the doctrine. And it has also never [13] been questioned from the foundation, without stopping presently to determine under which of the separate headings the power was properly to be classed, that there was authority given, as the part was included in the whole, to lay and collect income taxes. Again it has never moreover been questioned that the conceded complete and all-embracing taxing power was subject, so far as they were respectively applicable, to limitations resulting from the requirements of Art. I, § 8, cl. 1 (8 Fed. St. Ann. 347) that "all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," and to the limitations of Art. I, § 2, cl. 3 (8 Fed. St. Ann. 303), that "direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States" and of Art. I, § 9, cl. 4 (8 Fed. St. Ann. 702), that "no capitation, or other direct, tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." In fact the two great subdivisions embracing the complete and perfect delegation of the power to tax and the two correlated limitations as to such power were thus aptly stated by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. supra, at page 557: "In the matter of taxation, the Constitution recognizes the two great classes of direct and indirect taxes, and lays down two rules by which their imposition must be governed, namely: The rule of apportionment as to direct taxes, and the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts and excises." It is to be observed, however, as long ago pointed out in Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 541, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 482, that the requirement of apportionment as to one of the great classes and of uniformity as to the other class were not so much a limitation upon the complete and all-embracing authority to tax, but in their essence were simply regulations concerning the mode in which the plenary power was to be exerted. In the whole history of the Government down to the time of the adoption of the Sixteenth Amendment, leaving aside some conjectures expressed of the possibility of a tax lying intermediate between the two great classes and embraced [14] by neither, no question has been anywhere made as to the correctness of these propositions. At the very beginning, however, there arose differences of opinion concerning the criteria to be applied in determining in which of the two great subdivisions a tax would fall. Without pausing to state at length the basis of these differences and the consequences which arose from them, as the whole subject was elaborately reviewed in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 15 S. Ct. 673, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 759, 158 U. S. 601, 15 S. Ct. 912, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 1108, we make a condensed statement which is in substance taken from what was said in that case. Early the differences were manifested in pressing on the one hand and opposing on the other, the passage of an act levying a tax without apportionment on carriages "for the conveyance of persons," and when such a tax was enacted the question of its repugnancy to the Constitution soon came to this court for determination. (Hylton v. U. S. 3 Dall. 171, 1 U. S. (L. ed.) 556.) It was held that the tax came within the class of excises, duties and imposts and therefore did not require apportionment, and while this conclusion was agreed to by all the members of the court who took part in the decision of the case, there was not an exact coincidence in the reasoning by which the conclusion was sustained. Without stating the minor differences, it may be said with substantial accuracy that the divergent reasoning was this: On the one hand, that the tax was not in the class of direct taxes requiring apportionment because it was not levied directly on property because of its ownership but rather on its use and was therefore an excise, duty or impost; and on the other, that in any event the class of direct taxes included only taxes directly levied on real estate because of its ownership. Putting out of view the difference of reasoning which led to the concurrent conclusion in the Hylton case, it is undoubted that it came to pass in legislative practice that the line of demarcation between the two great classes of direct taxes on the one hand and excises, duties and [15] imposts on the other which was exemplified by the ruling in that case, was accepted and acted upon. In the first place this is shown by the fact that wherever (and there were a number of cases of that kind) a tax was levied directly on real estate or slaves because of ownership, it was treated as coming within the direct class and apportionment was provided for, while no instance of apportionment as to any other kind of tax is afforded. Again the situation is aptly illustrated by the various acts taxing incomes derived from property of every kind and nature which were enacted beginning in 1861 and lasting during what may be termed the Civil War period. It is not disputable that these latter taxing laws were classed under the head of excises, duties and imposts because it was assumed that they were of that character inasmuch as although putting a tax burden on income of every kind, including that derived from property real or personal, they were not taxes directly on property because of its ownership. And this practical construction came in theory to be the accepted one since it was adopted without dissent by the most eminent of the textwriters. 1 Kent. Com. 254, 256; 1 Story Const. § 955; Cooley Const. Lim. (5th ed.) *480; Miller on the Constitution, 237; Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, § 281; Hare, Const. Law, Vol. 1, 249, 250; Burroughs on Taxation, 502; Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, 225.

Upon the lapsing of a considerable period after the repeal of the income tax laws referred to, in 1894 an act was passed laying a tax on incomes from all classes of property and other sources of revenue which was not apportioned, and which therefore was of course assumed to come within the classification of excises, duties and imposts which were subject to the rule of uniformity but not to the rule of apportionment. The constitutional validity of this law was challenged on the ground that it did not fall within the class of excises, duties and imposts, [16] but was direct in the constitutional sense and was therefore void for want of apportionment, and that question came to this court and was passed upon in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 15 S. Ct. 673, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 759, 158 U. S. 601, 15 S. Ct. 912, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 1108. The court, fully recognizing in the passage which we have previously quoted the all-embracing character of the two great classifications including, on the one hand, direct taxes subject to apportionment, and on the other, excises, duties and imposts subject to uniformity, held the law to be unconstitutional in substance for these reasons: Concluding that the classification of direct was adopted for the purpose of rendering it impossible to burden by taxation accumulations of property, real or personal, except subject to the regulation of apportionment, it was held that the duty existed to fix what was a direct tax in the constitutional sense so as to accomplish this purpose contemplated by the Constitution. (157 U. S. 581.) Coming to consider the validity of the tax from this point of view, while not questioning at all that in common understanding it was direct merely on income and only indirect on property, it was held that considering the substance of things it was direct on property in a constitutional sense since to burden an income by a tax was from the point of substance to burden the property from which the income was derived and thus accomplish the very thing which the provision as to apportionment of direct taxes was adopted to prevent. As this conclusion but enforced a regulation as to the mode of exercising power under particular circumstances, it did not in any way dispute the all-embracing taxing authority possessed by Congress, including necessarily therein the power to impose income taxes if only they conformed to the constitutional regulations which were applicable to them. Moreover in addition the conclusion reached in the Pollock case did not in any degree involve holding that income taxes generically and necessarily came within the class [17] of direct taxes on property, but on the contrary recognized the fact that taxation on income was in its nature an excise entitled to be enforced as such unless and until it was concluded that to enforce it would amount to accomplishing the result which the requirement as to apportionment of direct taxation was adopted to prevent, in which case the duty would arise to disregard form and consider substance alone and hence subject the tax to the regulation as to apportionment which otherwise as an excise would not apply to it. Nothing could serve to make this clearer than to recall that in the Pollock case in so far as the law taxed incomes from other classes of property than real estate and invested personal property, that is, income from "professions, trades, employments, or vocations" (158 U. S. 637) its validity was recognized; indeed it was expressly declared that no dispute was made upon that subject and attention was called to the fact that taxes on such income had been sustained as excise taxes in the past. 158 U. S. 635. The whole law was however declared unconstitutional on the ground that to permit it to thus operate would relieve real estate and invested personal property from taxation and "would leave the burden of the tax to be borne by professions, trades, employments, or vocations; and in that way what was intended as a tax on capital would remain, in substance, a tax on occupations and labor" (158 U. S. 637), a result which it was held could not have been contemplated by Congress.

This is the text of the Amendment:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration."

It is clear on the face of this text that it does not purport to confer power to levy income taxes in a generic sense—an authority already possessed and never questioned—[18] or to limit and distinguish between one kind of income taxes and another, but that the whole purpose of the Amendment was to relieve all income taxes when imposed from apportionment from a consideration of the source whence the income was derived. Indeed in the light of the history which we have given and of the decision in the Pollock case and the ground upon which the ruling in that case was based, there is no escape from the conclusion that the Amendment was drawn for the purpose of doing away for the future with the principle upon which the Pollock case was decided, that is, of determining whether a tax on income was direct not by a consideration of the burden placed on the taxed income upon which it directly operated, but by taking into view the burden which resulted on the property from which the income was derived, since in express terms the Amendment provides that income taxes, from whatever source the income may be derived, shall not be subject to the regulation of apportionment. From this in substance it indisputably arises, first, that all the contentions which we have previously noticed concerning the assumed limitations to be implied from the language of the Amendment as to the nature and character of the income taxes which it authorizes find no support in the text and are in irreconcilable conflict with the very purpose which the Amendment was adopted to accomplish. Second, that the contention that the Amendment treats a tax on income as a direct tax although it is relieved from apportionment and is necessarily therefore not subject to the rule of uniformity as such rule only applies to taxes which are not direct, thus destroying the two great classifications which have been recognized and enforced from the beginning, is also wholly without foundation since the command of the Amendment that all income taxes shall not be subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the taxed income may be derived, [19] forbids the application to such taxes of the rule applied in the Pollock case by which alone such taxes were removed from the great class of excises, duties and imposts subject to the rule of uniformity and were placed under the other or direct class. This must be unless it can be said that although the Constitution as a result of the Amendment in express terms excludes the criterion of source of income, that criterion yet remains for the purpose of destroying the classifications of the Constitution by taking an excise out of the class to which it belongs and transferring it to a class in which it cannot be placed consistently with the requirements of the Constitution. Indeed, from another point of view, the Amendment demonstrates that no such purpose was intended and on the contrary shows that it was drawn with the object of maintaining the limitations of the Constitution and harmonizing their operation. We say this because it is to be observed that although from the date of the Hylton case because of statements made in the opinions in that case it had come to be accepted that direct taxes in the constitutional sense were confined to taxes levied directly on real estate because of its ownership, the Amendment contains nothing repudiating or challenging the ruling in the Pollock case that the word direct had a broader significance since it embraced also taxes levied directly on personal property because of its ownership, and therefore the Amendment at least impliedly makes such wider significance a part of the Constitution—a condition which clearly demonstrates that the purpose was not to change the existing interpretation except to the extent necessary to accomplish the result intended, that is, the prevention of the resort to the sources from which a taxed income was derived in order to cause a direct tax on the income to be a direct tax on the source itself and thereby to take an income tax out of the class of excises, duties and imposts and place it in the class of direct taxes.

[20] We come then to ascertain the merits of the many contentions made in the light of the Constitution as it now stands, that is to say, including within its terms the provisions of the Sixteenth Amendment as correctly interpreted. We first dispose of two propositions assailing the validity of the statute on the one hand because of its repugnancy to the Constitution in other respects, and especially because its enactment was not authorized by the Sixteenth Amendment.

The statute was enacted October 3, 1913, and provided for a general yearly income tax from December to December of each year. Exceptionally, however, it fixed a first period embracing only the time from March 1, to December 31, 1913, and this limited retroactivity is assailed as repugnant to the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and as inconsistent with the Sixteenth Amendment itself. But the date of the retroactivity did not extend beyond the time when the Amendment was operative, and there can be no dispute that there was power by virtue of the Amendment during that period to levy the tax, without apportionment, and so far as the limitations of the Constitution in other respects are concerned, the contention is not open, since in Stockdale v. Atlantic Ins. Co. 20 Wall. 323, 331, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 348, in sustaining a provision in a prior income tax law which was assailed because of its retroactive character, it was said:

"The right of Congress to have imposed this tax by a new statute, although the measure of it was governed by the income of the past year, cannot be doubted; much less can it be doubted that it could impose such a tax on the income of the current year, though part of that year had elapsed when the statute was passed. The joint resolution of July 4th, 1864, imposed a tax of five per cent upon all income of the previous year, although one tax on it had already been paid, and no one doubted the validity of the tax or attempted to resist it."

[21] The statute provides that the tax should not apply to enumerated organizations or corporations, such as labor, agricultural or horticultural organizations, mutual savings banks, etc., and the argument is that as the Amendment authorized a tax on incomes "from whatever source derived," by implication it excluded the power to make these exemptions. But this is only a form of expressing the erroneous contention as to the meaning of the Amendment, which we have already disposed of. And so far as this alleged illegality is based on other provisions of the Constitution, the contention is also not open, since it was expressly considered and disposed of in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. 220 U. S. 108, 173, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1312, 31 S. Ct. 342, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 389.

Without expressly stating all the other contentions, we summarize them to a degree adequate to enable us to typify and dispose of all of them.

1. The statute levies one tax called a normal tax on all incomes of individuals up to $20,000 and from that amount up by gradations, a progressively increasing tax called an additional tax, is imposed. No tax, however, is levied upon incomes of unmarried individuals amounting to $3,000 or less nor upon incomes of married persons amounting to $4,000 or less. The progressive tax and the exempted amounts, it is said, are based on wealth alone and the tax is therefore repugnant to the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

2. The act provides for collecting the tax at the source, that is, makes it the duty of corporations, etc., to retain and pay the sum of the tax on interest due on bonds and mortgages, unless the owner to whom the interest is payable gives a notice that he claims an exemption. This duty cast upon corporations, because of the cost to which they are subjected, is asserted to be repugnant to due process of law as a taking of their property without compensation, and we recapitulate various contentions as to discrimination against corporations and against individuals [22] predicated on provisions of the act dealing with the subject:

(a) Corporations indebted upon coupon and registered bonds are discriminated against, since corporations not so indebted are relieved of any labor or expense involved in deducting and paying the taxes of individuals on the income derived from bonds.

(b) Of the class of corporations indebted as above stated, the law further discriminates against those which have assumed the payment of taxes on their bonds, since although some or all of their bondholders may be exempt from taxation, the corporations have no means of ascertaining such fact, and it would therefore result that taxes would often be paid by such corporations when no taxes were owing by the individuals to the Government.

(c) The law discriminates against owners of corporate bonds in favor of individuals none of whose income is derived from such property, since bondholders are, during the interval between the deducting and the paying of the tax on their bonds, deprived of the use of the money so withheld.

(d) Again corporate bondholders are discriminated against because the law does not release them from payment of taxes on their bonds even after the taxes have been deducted by the corporation, and therefore if after deduction the corporation should fail, the bondholders would be compelled to pay the tax a second time.

(e) Owners of bonds the taxes on which have been assumed by the corporation are discriminated against because the payment of the taxes by the corporation does not relieve the bondholders of their duty to include the income from such bonds in making a return of all income, the result being a double payment of the taxes, labor and expense in applying for a refund, and a deprivation of the use of the sum of the taxes during the interval which elapses before they are refunded.

[23] 3. The provision limiting the amount of interest paid which may be deducted from gross income of corporations for the purpose of fixing the taxable income to interest on indebtedness not exceeding one-half the sum of bounded indebtedness and paid-up capital stock, is also charged to be wanting in due process because discriminating between different classes of corporations and individuals.

4. It is urged that want of due process results from the provision allowing individuals to deduct from their gross income dividends paid them by corporations whose incomes are taxed and not giving such right of deduction to corporations.

5. Want of due process is also asserted to result from the fact that the act allows a deduction of $3,000 or $4,000 to those who pay the normal tax, that is, whose incomes are $20,000 or less, and does not allow the deduction to those whose incomes are greater than $20,000; that is, such persons are not allowed for the purpose of the additional or progressive tax a second right to deduct the $3,000 or $4,000 which they have already enjoyed. And a further violation of due process is based on the fact that for the purpose of the additional tax no second right to deduct dividends received from corporations is permitted.

6. In various forms of statement, want of due process, it is moreover insisted, arises from the provisions of the act allowing a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining the taxable income of stated amounts on the ground that the provisions discriminate between married and single people and discriminate between husbands and wives who are living together and those who are not.

7. Discrimination and want of due process results, it is said, from the fact that the owners of houses in which they live are not compelled to estimate the rental value in making up their incomes, while those who are living in rented houses and pay rent are not allowed, in making up their taxable income, to deduct rent which they have [24] paid, and that want of due process also results from the fact that although family expenses are not as a rule permitted to be deducted from gross, to arrive at taxable, income, farmers are permitted to omit from their income return, certain products of the farm which are susceptible of use by them for sustaining their families during the year.

So far as these numerous and minute, not to say in many respects hypercritical, contentions are based upon an assumed violation of the uniformity clause, their want of legal merit is at once apparent, since it is settled that that clause exacts only a geographical uniformity and there is not a semblance of ground in any of the propositions for assuming that a violation of such uniformity is complained of. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 20 S. Ct. 747, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 909; Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S. 608, 622, 22 S. Ct. 493, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 713; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. 220 U. S. 107, 158, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1312, 31 S. Ct. 342, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 389; Billings v. U. S. 232 U. S. 261, 34 S. Ct. 421, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 608, 622.

So far as the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment (9 Fed. St. Ann. 288) is relied upon, it suffices to say that there is no basis for such reliance since it is equally well settled that such clause is not a limitation upon the taxing power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution; in other words, that the Constitution does not conflict with itself by conferring upon the one hand a taxing power and taking the same power away on the other by the limitations of the due process clause. Treat v. White, 181 U. S. 264, 21 S. Ct. 611, 45 U. S. (L. ed.) 853; Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S. 608, 22 S. Ct. 493, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 713; McCrary v. U. S. 195 U. S. 27, 61, 1 Ann. Cas. 561, 24 S. Ct. 769, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 78; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. supra; Billings v. U. S. 232 U. S. 261, 282, 34 S. Ct. 421, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 596. And no change in the situation here would arise even if it be conceded, as we think it must be, that this doctrine would have no application in a case where although there was a seeming exercise of the taxing power, the act complained of was so arbitrary as to constrain to the conclusion that it was not the exertion of taxation but a confiscation of property, that is, a taking [25] of the same in violation of the Fifth Amendment, or, what is equivalent thereto, was so wanting in basis for classification as to produce such a gross and patent inequality as to inevitably lead to the same conclusion. We say this because none of the propositions relied upon in the remotest degree present such questions. It is true that it is elaborately insisted that although there be no express constitutional provision prohibiting it, the progressive feature of the tax causes it to transcend the conception of all taxation and to be a mere arbitrary abuse of power which must be treated as wanting in due process. But the proposition disregards the fact that in the very early history of the Government a progressive tax was imposed by Congress and that such authority was exerted in some if not all the various income taxes enacted prior to 1894 to which we have previously adverted. And over and above all this the contention but disregards the further fact that its absolute want of foundation in reason was plainly pointed out in Knowlton v. Moore, supra, and the right to urge it was necessarily foreclosed by the ruling in that case made. In this situation it is of course superfluous to say that arguments as to the expediency of levying such taxes or of the economic mistake or wrong involved in their imposition are beyond judicial cognizance. Besides this demonstration of the want of merit in the contention based upon the progressive feature of the tax, the error in the others is equally well established either by prior decisions or by the adequate bases for classification which are apparent on the face of the assailed provisions, that is, the distinction between individuals and corporations, the difference between various kinds of corporations, etc., etc. Knowlton v. Moore, supra; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. supra; Billings v. U. S. supra; National Bank v. Kentucky, 9 Wall. 353, 19 U. S. (L. ed.) 701; National Safe Deposit Co. v. Stead, 232 U. S. 58, 70, 34 S. Ct. 209, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 504. In fact, comprehensively surveying all the contentions [26] relied upon, aside from the erroneous construction of the Amendment which we have previously disposed of, we cannot escape the conclusion that they all rest upon the mistaken theory that although there be differences between the subjects taxed, to differently tax them transcends the limit of taxation and amounts to a want of due process, and that where a tax levied is believed by one who resists its enforcement to be wanting in wisdom and to operate injustice, from that fact in the nature of things there arises a want of due process of law and a resulting authority in the judiciary to exceed its powers and correct what is assumed to be mistaken or unwise exertions by the legislative authority of its lawful powers, even although there be no semblance of warrant in the Constitution for so doing.

We have not referred to a contention that because certain administrative powers to enforce the act were conferred by the statute upon the Secretary of the Treasury, therefore it was void as unwarrantedly delegating legislative authority, because we think to state the proposition is to answer it. Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 12 S. Ct. 495, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 294; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 496, 24 S. Ct. 349, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 525; Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320, 29 S. Ct. 671, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 1013.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case, which is followed and applied in several other cases decided at the same term, sustains the validity of the Federal Income Tax Law of October 3, 1913 (Fed. St. Ann. 1914 Supp. p. 185). Premising that the Sixteenth Amendment was not a grant of a taxing power, but merely removed certain limitations from a power inherent in Congress, the court holds to be unfounded various objections based on the retrospective operation of the law, and on its classification of persons and property subject to taxation, objections to which the court refers as "numerous and minute, not to say in many cases hypercritical."

It is specifically held that the provision for collecting income at its source is not invalid as to corporations on whom it imposes the labor and expense of deducting and paying the taxes of individuals on income derived from corporate securities.

The action by which the decision was invoked was brought by a corporate stockholder to enjoin the payment of the tax by the corporation, and respecting his right to sue the court follows the decision in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 15 S. Ct. 673, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 759, that such an action does not violate the prohibition of the statute (Rev. St. § 3224, 3 Fed. St. Ann. 689) against enjoining the enforcement of a tax.

The validity of a statute levying an income tax is discussed in the notes to Alderman v. Wells, 21 Ann. Cas. 193, and State v. Frear, Ann. Cas. 1913A 1147. The construction of such a statute as to the personal income taxable thereunder is considered in the notes to Hawaiian Com. etc. Co. v. Tax Assessor, Ann. Cas. 1913C 980, and Com. v. Werth, Ann. Cas. 1916D 1263. As to the effect on an income tax law of the invalidity of a provision therein, see the note to State v. Duncan, Ann. Cas. 1916D 1, at page 89. And as to the meaning of the term "plant" as used in the English income tax law see the note to White v. Solvay Process Co. Ann. Cas. 1917A 314, at page 322.

THE KING

v.

BOARD OF ASSESSORS, FREDERICTON.

New Brunswick Supreme Court—February 21, 1913.

41 N. Bruns. 564.

Taxation — Income Tax — Place of Taxation — Residence.

A high sheriff who is by law required to be a resident of the shire town of his county, and who in fact spends the greater portion of his time there in the discharge of his duties, boarding at the jail, is a resident of that town and as such subject to a local income tax, though his wife and family continue to reside at his former home.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exemption from Income Tax — Government or County Officer.

A sheriff is not a person employed in a "government" office nor is he a county officer "whose duties are necessarily performed in" the shire town of his county, within the meaning of exempting clauses in an act imposing an income tax on residents of that town.

[564] On October 19, 1912, Barry, J., granted an order absolute for certiorari to remove and an order nisi to quash an assessment of the city of Fredericton for the year 1912 against William T. Howe, high sheriff of York county. The assessment was levied upon the sheriff as a resident on income of $1,000 less exemption of $300.00, and a poll tax of $5.00, amounting in all to $15.85.

[565] The writ was issued upon the following grounds:

1. Section 72 of "The City of Fredericton Assessment Act, 1907," providing that a statement must be filed otherwise no appeal is allowed from assessment, does not apply in this case. The contention is, not that the applicant is over assessed, but that he is not liable to any assessment in Fredericton.

2. William T. Howe, the applicant, is not an inhabitant nor a resident of the city of Fredericton within the meaning of "The City of Fredericton Assessment Act, 1907." He is an inhabitant of the parish of Stanley and has been such for some forty years now last past, and had been in each year and is in this present year 1912 assessed for parish and county rates, road tax and district school taxes as an inhabitant of Stanley, and has paid all such taxes.

3. Section 34 of said Assessment Act does not apply to members of the Executive government of the Province or to Government or county officers. See Exemptions, Section 3, sub-section 11.

4. Sheriff Howe is a county official whose duties are necessarily performed in Fredericton. His actual residence is in Stanley. The fact that as sheriff he keeps an official office in the county court house building in Fredericton, does not render him liable to taxation in Fredericton as an inhabitant.

The sheriff, in the affidavit upon which the writ was granted, stated that for upwards of forty years last past, he had been a resident and inhabitant of the parish of Stanley engaged in farming, on his own land, and had always been rated and assessed in that parish for poll tax and on his real and personal property for parish and county rates and for road and district school taxes. He also swore "that I never was at any time and am not now a resident nor inhabitant of the city of Fredericton and that I never was and am not now domiciled within the said City within the meaning of [566] 'The City of Fredericton Assessment Act, 1907,' or otherwise and that I do not own any real estate in the said city." He states further that he was assessed as a resident in Fredericton in 1910 and also in 1911 and paid the taxes so assessed, being ignorant of his legal status; that it is necessary for him to have an office in Fredericton, and he has there the office provided by the county in the county court house building, and in discharge of his duties as sheriff is in Fredericton a considerable portion of his time and while in Fredericton boards at the county gaol, paying for such board for such days only as he is actually there, and continues: "I have not become and do not intend to become a resident or inhabitant of Fredericton, and I never intended to change and have not changed my domicile and residence from the said parish of Stanley where my home has been for upwards of forty years now last past, and now is, and where my wife and family reside with me." He states further that he spent some days in each week and generally Sundays at his home in Stanley, where all his personal property was situate, and that he has no occupation in Fredericton other than as high sheriff.

An appeal was made to the Board of Assessors of Fredericton against the sheriff's taxation for 1912 but the Board refused to make any change. An appeal was also taken to the City Council and on recommendation of the committee on appeals was refused by the City Council.

J. W. McCready for City of Fredericton.

F. St. J. Bliss in support of the order nisi,

[568] BARKER, C. J.—The applicant is high sheriff of the county of York, having been appointed to that office in April, 1901. At that time he resided with his family on his farm in the parish of Stanley and his wife and family still reside there as their home. He has been assessed for the year 1912 in the city of Fredericton for city taxes amounting to $15.85. Of this $5.00 is a poll tax and the balance is on an income of $1,000 less $300 exempted under section 3 of "The City of Fredericton Assessment Act, 1907," to which I shall refer later on. The applicant denies his liability to be taxed in Fredericton on any amount and the assessment has been removed here with a view to its being quashed. The liability depends upon the construction to be placed on "The City of Fredericton Assessment Act, 1907." The poll tax is assessed by virtue of section 28 of the Act which imposes a poll tax of $5.00 upon all male inhabitants of the city. Section 34 is as follows: "For the purposes of assessment, any person carrying on business or having any office or place of business or any occupation, employment or profession within the City of Fredericton, shall be deemed and taken to be and is hereby declared to be an inhabitant and resident of the said city and shall be assessed accordingly, provided that any person whose actual domicile is out of the city, shall not be assessed on a poll tax within the city." And section 3, which relates to "exemptions," provides in sub-section 10 as follows: "The income of all male inhabitants of the city of Fredericton, including those under the age of twenty-one years, and the incomes of females shall be exempt from taxation, excepting on incomes exceeding $300 per annum, and in any such case the parties above named shall be taxable on all excess of income over and above $300 per annum. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the incomes of non-residents, persons or corporations doing business in the city, not paying poll tax." That is to say, if I read those sections correctly, all persons who are actually non-residents, though liable to be assessed on income because of their carrying on business or having an office in [569] the city, do not pay any poll tax, but they do not get the benefit of the exemption clause, s. 3 (10), but are assessed on the full income. The present assessment has been made on the basis of actual residence, the poll tax added and the exemption of $300 allowed. It is claimed that if this proved wrong the applicant though a non-resident, is by virtue of his having an office at Fredericton, liable under section 34 for the total income but not for the poll tax. As the tax rate is $1.55 on the hundred, this would reduce the applicant's taxes from $15.85 to $15.50, a difference of thirty-five cents. It does not seem necessary for a determination of this case to go into any prolonged discussion as to the precise meaning of the word "inhabitant" as used in this and other similar acts. Parker, J., devoted some time to the subject, in his judgment in Rex v. Board of Assessors, Fredericton; Reg. v. Assessors of Fredericton (1864) 11 N. Bruns. 1, but seems to have arrived at no more satisfactory conclusion than that the word must be construed with reference to the context and that, in itself, it has no definite meaning. Ritchie, C. J., in Ex p. Smith (1874) 15 N. Bruns. 147, also discussed the same question, but did not make it the basis of his judgment. In Hatheway v. Cumming (1864) 11 N. Bruns. 161, the plaintiff who was then a member of the provincial government and chief commissioner of public works, was claiming exemption from taxation in Fredericton on his official salary. This was before members of the executive government were exempt from taxation as they are now. This court held that he was not an inhabitant of the city and was not liable, as a nonresident carrying on business in Fredericton, to be rated on income. The chief commissioner in that case seems to have divided his time between Fredericton so long as was necessary for the discharge of his public duties there and his residence in St. Mary's in much the same way as the present applicant divides his time between Fredericton and his family residence at Stanley.

The question in Jones v. St. John (1899) 30 Can. Sup. Ct. 122, involved a question of domicile, and although the two [570] questions of domicile and residence are in many respects alike there are distinctions. There must be a change of residence to establish a change of domicile but there may be a change of residence without involving any change of domicile. There is no question of domicile involved in this application; it is merely a question of inhabitancy or residence, for I think the true view of the Act is that the two words are used interchangeably. So far as I have examined the Act the word "domicile" only occurs once. In section 34 provision is made for taxing persons who carry on business in Fredericton and for the purpose of assessment such persons are deemed to be inhabitants and residents. Then follows this proviso. "That any person whose actual domicile is out of the City shall not be assessed on a poll tax within the city." These words "actual domicile" can have no other meaning than "actual residence" as distinguished from the constructive residence created by the section for the purposes of assessment. Put in simple language the provision is that a non-resident pays no poll tax though he is liable to the general assessment if he carries on business, or has an office, etc., within the city. Again by section 64 provision is made for correction of errors and omissions in the assessment roll and among the list is this "if any person takes up his residence in the said City of Fredericton within three months after filing of the assessment roll." The simple question then is, has the applicant taken up his residence in Fredericton, for if he has, the omission of his name from the assessment roll would be an error which the assessors are authorized to correct. The question is one of fact to be settled by the acts of the sheriff viewed in the light of the attendant circumstances. Were I to act solely on the sheriff's affidavit on which this application is based the question of residence would be easily disposed of, because he has made the following statement, "That I never was at any time and am not now a resident nor inhabitant of the city of Fredericton, and that I never was and am not now domiciled within the said city within the meaning of The City of Fredericton [571] Assessment Act, 1907 nor otherwise." Later on I shall refer to this affidavit, but for the present I shall deal with some facts as to which the sheriff was competent to speak. It seems that in April, 1909, he was appointed sheriff of the county of York. He accepted the position and has continued to occupy it ever since, having been re-appointed in the years 1910, 1911, and 1912. At the time of his appointment in 1909 he was living with his family on his farm in the parish of Stanley in the county of York. In his affidavit he makes the following statement: "That since my appointment as high sheriff of York county, in the ordinary and regular discharge of my duties as such it is necessary and expedient for me to keep an office in Fredericton, which office is provided by the municipality of the county of York in the county court house building, and it is necessary for me in the discharge of my duties as such sheriff, to be in Fredericton a considerable portion of the time, and while in Fredericton I board at the county gaol, paying for such board for such days only as I am actually there, but I have not become and do not intend to become a resident or inhabitant of Fredericton and I never intended to change and have not changed my domicile and residence from the said parish of Stanley, where my home has been for upwards of forty years now last past, and now is, and where my wife and family reside with me. That since my appointment as sheriff I have continued my occupation as farmer as I theretofore had done, spending some days in each week and generally Sundays at my home in Stanley aforesaid."

The sheriff is by law compelled to reside at Fredericton. There seems to be no question that he knew this when he was appointed and that he accepted the office with full knowledge of that fact. It seems that the city authorities acting on the assumption that the sheriff had become a resident of the city, assessed him under this same act for the years 1910 and 1911 on his income, and these taxes he paid without objection although he is now seeking to have the money returned on the ground that when he paid them he was "ignorant of his legal status in regard thereto."

[572] The question of residence, as distinct from the question of domicile, depends mainly, perhaps altogether, upon the acts of the party. If what the sheriff has done and has been doing for the last three years, and is doing now, constitute a residence in Fredericton so as to render him liable to assessment on his income, any intention to avoid any such result will not exempt him. Actual facts must always win in competition with mere expressed intention. If, however, the question of residence involved a question of intention, I should think we were taking at least a defensible course if we referred the defendant's actions to an intention to discharge the obligation as to residence subject to which he accepted the office, rather than to a deliberate intention on his part to ignore the obligation apparently for the sole purpose of escaping the small tax for which residence would make him liable. What are the facts? In April, 1901, now nearly four years ago, the applicant accepted the important and responsible office of sheriff of York county from the government. He did so with full knowledge that by law, as such sheriff, unless otherwise permitted by the government, he was compelled to reside at Fredericton, and to keep an office there for the purposes of his official work. He was re-appointed in 1910, again in 1911 and a third time in 1912, and on each of these occasions by accepting the office, he manifested in an unmistakable manner his preference for the office with residence at Fredericton to a residence at Stanley without the office. He knew in 1901 by information, what he learned by actual experience in the following years, that the duties of his office and his work in connection with it must occupy a large portion of his time and might occupy the whole of it. He might have applied to the government for permission to reside out of Fredericton, but nothing of that kind was done. He secured a room and board and lodging with his deputy, the gaoler of the county, where he lived and still lives while in Fredericton. So with reference to the voluntary payment of the taxes for 1910 and 1911. What is the applicant's misapprehension of his legal status which he now alleges as [573] the reason for paying them? He knew all the facts then as well as he does now. He knew that he was taxed on income as a resident of Fredericton and he knew then as well as he knows now whether he was actually residing there as he had undertaken to do, or not, and he knew what his intentions were, whatever they were worth, as well as he does now. And yet with this knowledge he paid the taxes for two years—without objection. He may have been mistaken as to the exact ground of his liability, but that did not alter the fact as to residence. He knew that he was taxed as a resident on income and he must have known then as well as now whether he had done what the law required of him as to residences for the Assessment Act gives no statutory meaning to the word resident. Acts like this do not of course conclude the question but when a public officer is under a statutory obligation to reside at Fredericton and is taxed there as a resident on income, and with full knowledge of these facts, voluntarily pays the tax it is a strong reason for saying that he had in fact become a resident of Fredericton and so considered himself.

In Doucet v. Geoghegan [1878] 9 Ch. D. 441, the question involved was whether the testator, who was a native of France had acquired an English domicile. Among the facts relied on as supporting the alleged change were these: He was a Roman Catholic but he had married two wives in England, both of whom were Protestants, and the marriages took place in a Protestant church. He did not take any of the steps required by French law to render these marriages legal in France. He made a will describing himself as of St. John's Wood and of Regent street, in which he appointed a testamentary guardian to his children and disposed of his property, notwithstanding he had children, "in a way," to quote Sir George Jessell, "every Frenchman knows is repugnant to French law." James, L. J., in expressing his opinion in favor of the English domicile, says, at p. 457: "Both his marriages were acts of unmitigated [574] scoundrelism if he was not a domiciled Englishman," and, at p. 458; "I wish to add that I am disposed to think that when the testator entered the English church and declared that he knew of no impediment to his lawful marriage, he must be taken to have made a solemn declaration that he had an English domicile."

I shall refer to one more circumstance. At my request the Assistant Registrar has made a search of the records of this Court for the years 1910, 1911 and 1912, in order to ascertain the number of writs filed during that period which had been personally served by Sheriff Howe. He has reported to the Court that there are only nine. The small number is due, I suppose, to the fact that such services are generally made by a deputy. These affidavits are dated as follows: September 21, 1910; November 18, 1911; December 5, 1911; May 7, 1912; May 15, 1912; May 25, 1912; May 15, 1912; August 26, 1912; and October 28, 1912. In all of these affidavits the sheriff describes himself as "of the City of Fredericton in the County of York." The last affidavit, sworn to on October 28, 1912, is nine days after Barry, J., made the order for the return of these proceedings based on the sheriff's affidavit, sworn to on the 15th day of October, 1912, in which he describes himself as of Stanley.

Allusion has very properly been made to the fact that Mrs. Howe, with her family, though there is no evidence as to the extent of the family, continues to live at Stanley. If it were necessary in order for the sheriff to acquire a residence or to take up his residence, to use the words of the statute, in Fredericton that his wife and family should go with him, it is clear that she has not gone. Under what circumstances she has remained we do not know. Neither do I think it important, for there can be no doubt a man can take up a separate residence and the exigencies of one's business or occupation often render it necessary. The question here is whether the sheriff has done so, so as to render him liable to the taxation. In my opinion he has. I am at a loss to see what additional act or what omission [575] on his part can be suggested as necessary under the circumstances to make him a resident.

If I should be wrong in the view I have expressed, I think the applicant would be liable to be assessed on his entire income as a non-resident under section 34, and would be free of a poll tax. The necessity for his keeping an office at Fredericton and the fact that he does keep it are admitted, but it is contended that he is within the exemption mentioned in section 3, (11), which enacts that "incomes of non-residents, being members of the executive government of the province, or nonresidents, employed in the city of Fredericton in government or county offices whose duties are necessarily performed in Fredericton, shall be exempt from taxation under this act." Sheriffs are appointed by the government, so are the justices of the peace. And in that sense both are government officers. The office of sheriff is one of the important offices of the Crown connected with the administration of justice. Sheriffs are, however not working for the government in the sense that a clerk in the Crown Land Office is. Neither are sheriffs county officers, though their jurisdiction is limited as to area. The municipality does not control or direct them in the discharge of their duties, unless they arise out of some contract, nor is it in any way responsible for their acts. They are not doing the work of the county, as the county treasurer or auditor does who may properly be classed as county officers: C. S. 1903, c. 165, s. 60. Neither are the duties of sheriffs necessarily performed in Fredericton. It is very probable that a fair percentage of them are discharged without the city limits. It is, I think, clear that this provision of the Act was intended to meet the cases of members of the Government not residing in Fredericton and non-residents employed in the Government offices there and a similar class of county officials. The sheriff of the county is not in any opinion, in either class.

This application must I think be refused with costs as provided in section 80 of the Assessment Act.

[576] Before closing my remarks I deem it my duty to call attention to the careless, or at all events, the thoughtless, manner in which the applicant's affidavit has been drawn and for which the solicitor under whose supervision it was prepared must be held responsible, although I cannot acquit the applicant himself of all blame. In an affidavit specially prepared for the purposes of this application, involving as will be seen some nice questions as to the construction of a statute and the applicant's liability, he is made to swear without any reservation, and without any necessity, so far as I can see, that he never was at any time and was not then a resident or inhabitant of the city of Fredericton and that he never had been and was not then domiciled within that city within the meaning of "The City of Fredericton Assessment Act, 1907," or otherwise, that he had not changed his domicile and residence and that he had not become and did not intend to become a resident or inhabitant of Fredericton. This wholesale method of disposing of questions of law or of law and fact in an affidavit is so palpably improper that it carries its condemnation on its face. In addition to this, affidavits prepared and sworn to with so little care or consideration by those who ought to know better, are apt to be subjected to criticisms as to their reliability in reference to mere questions of fact, which under other circumstances no one would think of making.

The motion to quash the assessment will be refused, with costs as provided in § 80, to be paid by the said William T. Howe and for the recovery of the same the Registrar will deliver the bond filed with him on obtaining the rule to the City Treasurer on request.

Order nisi to quash assessment discharged with costs.

I. Introductory.

The present note is intended to collate and review the cases involving the question what constitutes a "residence," "domicil," or the like, within personal property, inheritance, transfer, or legacy tax statutes. Cases concerning the residence of corporations and partnership associations are not included.

No effort has been made to treat separately the cases involving domicil as a branch of international jurisprudence or those concerned with residence within one or another subdivision of a national jurisdiction, since, in spite of technical distinctions between the principles governing the two classes of cases, it appears that as far as taxation statutes are concerned the principles are practically the same. Similarly cases dealing with residence, domicil, inhabitancy, etc., are considered as being on an equal footing within the scope of this note.

The first part of the note concerns itself with a treatment of the general rules governing residence within tax statutes, while in the latter part, under subdivision V. Application to Facts, an effort is made to show rather fully what the facts, in individual cases, were, on which the decision as to residence was based.

The discussion of general principles necessarily proceeds on broad lines, but no cases are cited in respect thereto except those involving the application of those principles to the question of the place of taxation.

II. General Principles.

Although there are some technical distinctions in significance between the words "residence," "abode," "domicil," and kindred terms, they have been held in most jurisdictions to be synonymous when used in tax statutes. See the note to Raymond v. Lersman, Ann. Cas. 1915C 780, passim, and at page 791.

The residence of a person for the purpose of taxation is the true, fixed place from which he has no present intention of moving. Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805; Stockton v. Staples, 66 Me. 197; Sharp v. Casper, 36 N. J. L. 367. In general terms it may be designated as the principal seat of residence, of business pursuits, connections, attachments, and of political and municipal relations. Lyman v. Fiske, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293; Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650.

Actual physical presence in a place is one circumstance in determining the domicil, or the fact of being a resident; but it is far from conclusive, and the question depends on many other considerations than physical presence. Sears v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 250.

The place of one's birth is his domicile of origin. The residence which he may select for himself after arriving at his majority is termed his domicile of choice. Boyd v. Com. 149 Ky. 766, Ann. Cas. 1914B 481, 149 S. W. 1022, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580.

It has been held that domicile of origin or birth is different from that of choice in that it is more enduring, and that its hold is stronger and less easily shaken off. Winans v. Atty.-Gen. [1904] A. C. (Eng.) 287, 73 L. J. K. B. 613, 90 L. T. N. S. 721, 20 Times L. Rep. 510.

The domicile of origin adheres until a new one is acquired. Littlefield v. Brooks, 50 Me. 475; Bangs v. Brewster, 111 Mass. 382; Moore v. Wilkins, 10 N. H. 452.

And so, throughout life, the old residence continues to adhere until the acquirement of a new residence; while in transitu the old residence remains. Atty.-Gen. v. Dunn, 6 M. & W. (Eng.) 511; Culbertson v. Floyd County, 52 Ind. 361; Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805; Boyd v. Com. 149 Ky. 764, Ann. Cas. 1914B 481, 149 S. W. 1022, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580; Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51; Littlefield v. Brooks, 50 Me. 475; Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 242; Otis v. Boston, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 44; Bulkley v. Williamstown, 3 Gray (Mass.) 493; Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650; Borland v. Boston, 132 Mass. 89, 42 Am. Rep. 424; Pickering v. Cambridge, 144 Mass. 244, 10 N. E. 827; Guggenheim v. Long Branch, 80 N. J. L. 246, 76 Atl. 338; Paddock v. Lewis, 179 N. Y. 591, 72 N. E. 1146, affirming judgment 59 App. Div. 430, 69 N. Y. S. 1; Kellogg v. Winnebago County, 42 Wis. 97. The one exception to the foregoing rule seems to be that where a person, intending to acquire a new domicile in another state, departs from the state of his old domicile and journeys to the place of his new domicile, his domicile for purposes of taxation in the old state ceases as soon as he crosses the state line and does not adhere to him while in transitu without the jurisdiction of the old state. Biggs v. Rochester, 16 Gray (Mass.) 337; Colton v. Longmeadow, 12 Allen (Mass.) 598. In the case first cited, the court said: "This plaintiff did not reside or dwell in Rochester on the 1st of May 1858, nor had he then a home there. He left the town, removed out of the state, and abandoned his home, with an intention never to resume it, but with an intention, which he soon carried into effect, to make a new home in the state of New York. And certainly there is no good reason, if the statute does not peremptorily so require, that he should be taxed in this state for expenses incurred in support of its institutions, after he left it, and ceased to receive benefit from them, either by participating in the actual enjoyment of them, or by deriving, through their instrumentality, protection to his property or his person."

It is a general rule in construing tax statutes that a person must have a domicile in some place. Barhydt v. Cross, 156 Ia. 271, Ann. Cas. 1915C 792, 136 N. W. 525, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 986; Lebanon v. Biggers, 117 Ky. 430, 78 S. W. 213, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1528; Helm v. Com. 135 Ky. 302, 122 S. W. 196; Boyd v. Com. 149 Ky. 764, Ann. Cas. 1914B 481, 149 S. W. 1022, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580; Church v. Rowell, 49 Me. 367; Littlefield v. Brooks, 50 Me. 475; Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 242; Otis v. Boston, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 44; Bulkley v. Williamstown, 3 Gray (Mass.) 493; Kirkland v. Whately, 4 Allen (Mass.) 462; Beecher v. Detroit, 114 Mich. 228, 77 N. W. 206, 4 Detroit L. N. 579; Kellogg v. Winnebago County, 42 Wis. 97.

A person cannot have more than one legal domicile at the same time, for purposes of taxation. Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805; Barhydt v. Cross, 156 Ia. 271, Ann. Cas. 1915C 792, 136 N. W. 525, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 986; Lebanon v. Biggers, 117 Ky. 430, 78 S. W. 213, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1528; Boyd v. Com. 149 Ky. 764, Ann. Cas. 1914B 481, 149 S. W. 1022, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580; Winchester v. Van Meter, 158 Ky. 31, 164 S. W. 323; Judkins v. Reed, 48 Me. 386; Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 242; Otis v. Boston, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 44; Bulkley v. Williamstown, 3 Gray (Mass.) 493; Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650; Gardiner v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 162, 63 N. E. 397. See also Culbertson v. Floyd County, 52 Ind. 361.

Where a person has two actual physical residences, he has a right to choose or designate which of those two shall be his legal residence for purposes of taxation unless the facts and circumstances are sufficient to overcome the expressed intention and choice. Winchester v. Van Meter, 158 Ky. 31, 164 S. W. 323; Gardiner v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 162, 63 N. E. 397.

The question of residence or of change of residence is one of fact for the jury. Lebanon v. Biggers, 117 Ky. 430, 78 S. W. 213, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1528; Judkins v. Reed, 48 Me. 386; Lyman v. Fiske, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293; Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650; Gardiner v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 162, 63 N. E. 397.

Whether a new residence has been acquired cannot be made to depend on one fact or combination of circumstances but must depend on all the facts and circumstances. Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51; Judkins v. Reed, 48 Me. 386; Lyman v. Fiske, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293; Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650; Crittenden v. Mt. Clemens, 86 Mich. 220, 49 N. W. 144.

The presumption of continuance applies to residence. When a residence is once proved or established as being in one place, it is presumed to continue in that place and the burden of proof is on the party claiming that this residence has been changed. Winans v. Atty.-Gen. [1904] A. C. (Eng.) 287, 73 L. J. K. B. 613, 90 L. T. N. S. 721, 20 Times L. Rep. 510; People v. Moir, 207 Ill. 180, 69 N. E. 905, 99 Am. St. Rep. 205; Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805; Nugent v. Bates, 51 Ia. 77, 50 N. W. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 117; Cover v. Hatten, 136 Ia. 63, 113 N. W. 470; Glotfelty v. Brown, 148 Ia. 124, 126 N. W. 797; Barhydt v. Cross, 156 Ia. 271, Ann. Cas. 1915C 792, 136 N. W. 525, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 986; Lebanon v. Biggers, 117 Ky. 430, 78 S. W. 213, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1528; Kilburn v. Bennett, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 199; Matter of Martin, 173 App. Div. 1, 158 N. Y. S. 915.

Intention is an important factor in establishing the residence of a person, and the determination of the question of residence practically always involves the question of intent. Montgomery v. Lebanon, 111 Ky. 646, 64 S. W. 509, 54 L.R.A. 914; Helm v. Com. 135 Ky. 392, 122 S. W. 196; Gardiner v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 162, 63 N. E. 397; State v. Shepherd, 218 Mo. 656, 117 S. W. 1169, 131 Am. St. Rep. 568; People v. Crowley, 21 App. Div. 304, 47 N. Y. S. 457.

Intent is to be inferred from declarations and from conduct. Culbertson v. Floyd County, 52 Ind. 361; Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805; Montgomery v. Lebanon, 111 Ky. 646, 64 S. W. 509, 54 L.R.A. 914.

The declarations of intention of a person are, therefore, admissible in evidence, if a part of the res gestae, as bearing on the question what his legal residence is. People v. Moir, 207 Ill. 180, 69 N. E. 905, 99 Am. St. Rep. 205. See also Lyman v. Fiske, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293. In Pickering v. Cambridge, 144 Mass. 244, 10 N. E. 827, it was held that such declarations were inadmissible unless a part of the res gestae, where they were introduced in favor of the declarant.

Evidence of expressed intent, however, has no controlling weight if such an intent is inconsistent with the acts and general conduct of the person. Acts showing intent will, in such a case, outweigh expressions of intent. People v. Moir, 207 Ill. 180, 69 N. E. 905, 99 Am. St. Rep. 205; Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805; Winchester v. Van Meter, 158 Ky. 31, 164 S. W. 323; Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51; Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 242; Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass.

132, 26 Am. Rep. 650; Gourlay v. Gourlay, 15 R. I. 572, 10 Atl. 592. See also the reported case. And see generally the note to Holt v. Hendee, 21 Ann. Cas. 202.

But when the expression of an intention to select a permanent residence at a designated place harmonizes with the facts and circumstances which serve to illustrate that intention, it is controlling. Winchester v. Van Meter, 158 Ky. 31, 164 S. W. 323.

The acceptance of deeds describing the grantee as of a certain place is evidence of legal domicile in that place, within tax laws. Babcock v. Slater, 212 Mass. 434, 99 N. E. 173. The payment of a personal tax in one place is evidence of domicile in that place. Babcock v. Slater, 212 Mass. 434, 99 N. E. 173. And a showing that the person whose domicile is in question accepted and served in public office, such as that of surveyor of highways, is evidence of conduct showing intent to make the place wherein he so served his legal residence. Cole v. Cheshire, 1 Gray (Mass.) 441; Kilburn v. Bennett, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 199.

To acquire or to effect a change of residence there must not only be an intention to change but the change must actually be made. Factum et animus must concur.

An actual change of physical residence, unaccompanied by an intention to effect a change, does not constitute a change of legal residence. An intent to change must be shown. Winans v. Atty.-Gen. [1904] A. C. (Eng.) 287, 73 L. J. K. B. 613, 90 L. T. N. S. 721, 20 Times L. Rep. 510; People v. Moir, 207 Ill. 180, 69 N. E. 905, 99 Am. St. Rep. 205; Glotfelty v. Brown, 148 Ia. 124, 126 N. W. 797; Barhydt v. Cross, 156 Ia. 271, Ann. Cas. 1916C 792, 136 N. W. 525, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 986; Helm v. Com. 135 Ky. 392, 122 S. W. 196; Bartlett v. New Boston, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 777.

The intent which will control the question of residence is intent to reside, or intent with respect to continuing to reside, not any intent as to the legal consequence of that residing. So if a person lives in a place, with the intent to continue so to live, that place will be his legal residence, in spite of the fact that he intends to have the advantages of legal residence elsewhere. Dickinson v. Brookline, 181 Mass. 195, 63 N. E. 331, 92 Am. St. Rep. 407, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff had left his home in Cohasset and was actually dwelling in Brookline, with the purpose of dwelling there permanently, but that he continued to vote in Cohasset and intended that to be his legal residence. Holding that Brookline was, nevertheless, his residence, the court said: "Of course the argument for the plaintiff is that his domicile is presumed to continue until it is proved to have been changed, that it could be changed only by his intent and overt act, and that he expressly denied the intent. The ambiguity is in the last proposition. The plaintiff did not deny that he intended to keep on living as he had lived for the last few years, and if the jury saw fit to find, as no doubt they did, that he did intend to do so, then he did intend the facts necessary to constitute a change of domicile, and what he did not intend was simply that these facts should have their inevitable legal consequence. If a person is present with his family in a house in Brookline and intends to make his actual headquarters there for the rest of his life, and to live no more in the place of his former domicile, he cannot retain the old domicile by the simple means of intending, subject to his actual change, to retain advantages inconsistent with it. The proposition hardly needs illustration. When you intend the facts to which the law attaches a consequence, you must abide the consequence whether you intend it or not."

The only way in which a person can elect to be taxed in one place rather than another is to live in that place and make it his prinicipal residence. Pickering v. Cambridge, 144 Mass. 244, 10 N. E. 827.

Provided the intention and the fact of change of residence concur, the motive influencing the change is of no legal consequence. People v. Caldwell, 142 Ill. 434, 32 N. E. 691; Draper v. Hatfield, 124 Mass. 53. It is, therefore, settled that a person may change his legal residence from one municipality to another, for the mere purpose of diminishing the amount of his taxes. Draper v. Hatfield, 124 Mass. 53.

But if it is established that a property owner has his legal residence in one county, the fact that on being assessed in that county he pays taxes on his personalty in another county for the purpose of securing the lower tax rate of that county, will not affect his liability for taxes in the county of his residence. Mahany v. People, 138 Ill. 311, 27 N. E. 918, wherein it was said: "In respect to the point that appellant was assessed and paid personal property taxes for 1889 in West Jersey, it may be said that the evidence tends strongly to show that after he had knowledge that an assessment on his moneys and credits was about to be made in Toulon, he procured an assessment to be made in West Jersey, and for the reason that the taxes on an assessment in West Jersey would amount to only about one-third of what they would be on a like assessment in Toulon. If he was legally assessable in Toulon, then his mailing a schedule to the assessor of West Jersey was in fraud of his liability to pay taxes in Toulon, and he can take nothing by his payment of personal property taxes in West Jersey."

A temporary removal which does not contemplate an absence from the former domicile for an indefinite and uncertain time does not constitute a change of residence. Lebanon v. Biggers, 117 Ky. 430, 78 S. W. 213, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1528; Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51; Porterfield v. Augusta, 67 Me. 556; Sears v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 250; Briggs v. Rochester, 16 Gray (Mass.) 337; Bartlett v. New Boston, 77 N. H. 476, 93 Atl. 796; State v. Leuch, reported in full post, this volume, at page 778.

If a removal, however, is with the intention not to return, and to remain in the place of residence for an indefinite time, a change of residence is effected thereby. Mead v. Boxborough, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 362; In re Marshall, 248 Pa. St. 579, 94 Atl. 243.

Where there has been an actual removal, unless it is shown by or inferred from the circumstances that it was for some particular purpose expected to be only of a temporary nature, or in the exercise of some particular profession, office, or calling, a change of domicile is effected. Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51.

And it has been said that one may acquire a domicile by a residence of a day, if to the fact of residence he superadds the requisite intention. Stockton v. Staples, 66 Me. 197.

Under a statute of Louisiana (Act of March, 1816, B. & C. Digest, § 3) voluntary absence from the state for two years forfeits residence in that state. State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann. 165.

Under a Mississippi statute (Code 1892, § 3749) taxes on personal property are assessed in the municipality in which the taxpayer is actually residing at the time, although his legal domicile, for purposes of permanent residence, business, or political affiliation, may be elsewhere. Millsaps v. Jackson, 88 Miss. 504, 42 So. 234.

A former statute of New York (Laws 1850, c. 92, p. 142), not now in force, provided that when a person actually resided in two or more places within the state, his residence for purposes of taxation should be deemed to be in the town, county, or ward in which his principal business was transacted. Bell v. Pierce, 51 N. Y. 12, affirming 48 Barb. 51; Paddack v. Lewis, 179 N. Y. 591, 72 N. E. 1146, affirming 59 App. Div. 430, 69 N. Y. S. 1; People v. Moore, 52 Hun 13, 4 N. Y. S. 778; Bowe v. Jenkins, 69 Hun 458, 23 N. Y. S. 548; Bartlett v. New York, 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 44; Douglas v. New York, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 110.

Under a statute of Rhode Island (Gen. Laws, c. 45, § 9) the residence for taxation of personal property is fixed as being the place wherein the owner shall have had his actual place of abode for the larger portion of the twelve months next preceding the first day of April in each year. Greene v. Gardiner, 6 R. I. 242; Tripp v. Brown, 9 R. I. 240; Clarke v. Addeman, 26 R. I. 168, 58 Atl. 623. "The evil designed to be remedied by the clause of the Tax Act of 1857, upon which this case turns, is well understood. Persons having a double residence, in town and country, would not unfrequently select the latter as their domicile, though they spent only the summer months there, for the purpose of escaping, so far as their personal property was concerned, the higher rate of town taxation, whilst they enjoyed, during the greater portion of the year in town, all the comforts and conveniences secured by it. Instead, therefore, of the old rule, the Act of 1857, which went into effect on the 31st day of March of that year, provided, that 'all ratable personal property shall be taxed in the town where the owner shall have had his actual place of abode for the larger portion of the twelve months next preceding the 1st day of April in each year.' (Rev. Stats. c. 38, § 10.)" Greene v. Gardiner, supra. The statute of Rhode Island has no application to one who has not been in the state longer than six months. Ailman v. Griswold, 12 R. I. 339. And under that statute the place of abode of a person is the town in which he has his home and family, not that in which he spends time sporadically for business purposes. Arnold v. Davis, 8 R. I. 341, wherein the court said: "The tax is assessed at a later period in the year; but the plaintiff relies, in behalf of the town of Warwick, upon the ground that the defendant had his domicile, his residence and his place of abode in that town until November preceding the first day of April, that is, more than half of the twelve months next preceding the first day of April. The answer to that is two-fold. First. That the defendant, though he had his home and place of residence of his family—his homestead—in the town of Warwick, until the month of November, yet, still, according to his testimony, he was in the habit of leaving, every morning at eight o'clock, to pass the day at his place of business, in Providence, and returning at half-past seven in the evening. He also had a factory in Uxbridge, in an adjoining state, where he frequently went and tarried several days. We do not find any difficulty in concluding that such presence and occupation in Providence and Uxbridge do not give him an 'actual place of abode' in Providence or in any place other than that where he had his home and his family, to which he returned after such absence and occupation."

The St. John (New Brunswick) Act of 1882 (45 Vic. c. 59) provides that "for the purposes of assessment, any person carrying on business, or having any office or place of business, or any corporation, employment or profession within the city of St. John, etc., is hereby declared to be an inhabitant and resident of the said city." Ex p. Tucker, 23 N. Bruns. 311; Jones v. St. John, 30 Can. Sup. Ct. 122. Under that act one is not "carrying on a business" in St. John who is there merely as the agent of another, nor is he "having an office" within the meaning of the act, if he is working in the office of another, but under such circumstances he is a person "having an employment," in St. John, and hence, liable to assessment. Ex p. Tucker, 23 N. Bruns. 311, wherein the court said: "The question in this case is, whether the applicant who is president of the Eastern Insurance Company—a company doing marine insurance, and having an office in the city of St. John—is liable to be assessed as an inhabitant of the city under 'The St. John City Assessment Act of 1882' (45 Vic. c. 59). Mr. Tucker resided in Portland, and usually attended the office of the company—a distance of about three miles from his dwelling house in Portland—each day, for a short time, to do such business as the company assigned to its president, which was, principally, signing policies. There was no salary attached to the office for his services, but at the end of the year the company gave him, by vote, the sum of five hundred dollars. It is clear he was not an inhabitant of St. John; and he can only be liable to assessment because he is made an inhabitant by the act. . . . We think it clear Mr. Tucker was not a person 'carrying on business' in St. John, as that must mean carrying on business for himself, and not as a mere clerk or agent of another; nor has he any office or place of business there: the office was not his, it was the company's; and they, and not he, should be taxed for that. But we think he had an occupation or employment. The fact that there was no agreement to pay him does not affect this question; it would make no difference if one clerk in an establishment was employed to do certain services, and was paid a salary, and another undertook to do and did the same work for nothing: each would have been employed in doing the work. To say that a man who accepts an office which makes it his duty to attend daily at another person's office, and sign policies, or do other work, and who does such work, has not been employed there, would be going directly against the plain words of the statute, which we do not think we are at liberty to do, even if we thought the statute operated harshly on the applicant. These terms, 'occupation,' and 'employment,' in the section may bear, we think, different meanings. The first means where a person does some business for himself; and 'employment' means the doing of some business for another, implying not only the doing of the business, but the employment to do it; one of the definitions of which is, to intrust with the management of it. Mr. Tucker was intrusted with the management of the business he did for this insurance company in their office in St. John, therefore he was employed to do it, and he did it in pursuance of such employment, and the doing it was therefore an employment—such business was not an isolated act, but continues through the year. We therefore think he had an 'employment' within the city of St. John, within the meaning of the words of the statute; and that this rule ought to be discharged."

III. Infants and Non Composites.

An infant has no power to change his domicile of origin, so as to render himself taxable elsewhere though it may be changed for him by his parent or guardian. Boyd v. Com. 149 Ky. 764, Ann. Cas. 1914B 481, 149 S. W. 1022, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580. And the residence of an infant is fixed by that of the parents or surviving parent. Brookover v. Kase, 41 Ind. App. 102, 83 N. E. 524. And see generally the notes to Nunn v. Robertson, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1197, and Churchill v. Jackson, Ann. Cas. 1913E 1203. Where an infant is without parents, the intent of the legal guardian, not that of the infant, is material in determining what the residence of the infant is. Kirkland v. Whately, 4 Allen (Mass.) 462.

Similarly the residence of one non compos mentis, though he has attained his majority, is fixed for the purpose of taxation by the residence of his parents or surviving parent, since the law treats non compos as infants and as not being emancipated by age. Brookover v. Kase, 41 Ind. App. 102, 83 N. E. 524. And as a general rule the power of a guardian or committee of a lunatic over the person of his ward is practically the same as that of the parent, and he may, therefore, control the residence of the ward to the same extent. Brookover v. Kase, 41 Ind. App. 102, 83 N. E. 524. See also New York v. Brinckerhoff, 63 Misc. 445, 118 N. Y. S. 449. It follows that, since a lunatic is incapable of forming an intention, his guardian may change for him his legal residence, for taxation purposes. Brookover v. Kase, 41 Ind. App. 102, 83 N. E. 524; Mason v. Thurber, 1 R. I. 481. In the case last cited it appeared that the guardian of the plaintiff, a lunatic, had changed the residence of the plaintiff to Providence, and the question was raised whether he was capable of so changing it for purposes of taxation. The court said: "In the case before us there is the fact, and the jury have found the intent. The objection is, that it is the intent of the guardians, and not of the plaintiff. But, if the intent of the guardians be competent to fix the permanent home and domicile of the lunatic ward, should not such a domicile draw after it the usual consequences of domicile, to wit, the right of taxation? The parties interested in this question are the plaintiff and the two corporations that claim the right of taxation, and with reference to all of them, we think it just the plaintiff should pay his tax in the town where he has his domicile. In general protection and taxation are reciprocal. We think it just with reference to the lunatic ward that he should pay his tax in the town in which he has his home, because he enjoys the benefits of the government of that town. And with reference to the corporation which claims the right to tax, it is just that North Providence should tax, because that corporation renders the equivalent for taxation, whereas the city of Providence renders no equivalent."

IV. Husband and Wife.

Although the domicile of a wife, in law, follows that of her husband, as a general rule, and is determined by his, she can acquire a separate domicile or residence of her own for the purpose of taxation by a voluntary separation. Matter of Crosby, 85 Misc. 679, 148 N. Y. S. 1045, wherein the court said: "In the matter under consideration there is no proof of an agreement to separate, but there is proof of the fact of actual separation. There is proof that from the time when the decedent left her husband's home in Montana until the date of her death he never visited at her residence except once, and that was upon the occasion of their daughter's marriage. No mere agreement of separation could be more effective in keeping them apart than the voluntary arrangement or understanding which resulted in their maintaining separate homes and paying their individual expenses from their individual property for a period of about twenty-six years. Whatever the clause of the disagreement which resulted in the actual separation, the latter seems to have been as effective as if it were evidenced by a judicial decree. If such a decree had been entered there would be no question under the authorities in this state of the right of the wife to acquire an independent domicile. It would seem to be subordinating substance to mere form to hold that a separation which lasted twenty-six years, although not evidenced by a judicial decree, should be less effective in affording the wife the right to acquire an independent domicile than if such agreement had been incorporated in a formal written instrument. The publicity incident to a judicial separation might well induce a woman of delicacy and refinement to refrain from applying for it, but when the separation is as effectual as if a judicial decree had directed it, she should not be deprived of the right to acquire an independent domicile merely because she refrained from applying for a judicial decree of separation. I will, therefore, find that decedent prior to her death acquired a domicile separate and apart from that of her husband, and that she was not at the time of her death domiciled in the state of New York."

The legal domicile of the husband is not affected by the acts or by the intentions of the wife. Parsons v. Bangor, 61 Me. 457, wherein the court said: "The question is, whose will determines the domicile or residence? Cannot the husband by his will and acts change his domicile against and contrary to the will and wishes of his wife, such being his intention? In other words, whose will and intention are to govern. If the husband's are to control, then it matters not, his will and acts controlling, that he is married or not. Suppose the wife remained six or sixty days in Bangor, with or without his consent, how can that affect the residence of the husband if he has abandoned his residence here with the intention of not returning, and has gone to and is in New York with the intention of there being and remaining. Suppose the wife declined to leave Bangor and remained there permanently, refusing to go to New York and live with her husband; does that make him an inhabitant of Bangor against his will, when he is absent therefrom with no intention of returning, and is in fact being and residing elsewhere with the intention of there so remaining?"

V. Application to Facts.

1. IN GENERAL.

A departure from the place of one's residence with the purpose of residing abroad temporarily but of returning to the original residence at some indefinite time in the future does not constitute a change of residence. Culbertson v. Floyd County, 52 Ind. 361.

But it seems that living abroad through a period of years, accompanied by marriage and the purchase of an estate, constitutes the place of foreign abode the legal residence, in contemplation of tax laws, in spite of declared intentions to return, but in the absence of an actual return, State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann. 165, for the facts of and decision in which case, see infra, the subdivision, Personal Property Tax.

Where a person leaves his old place of residence, intending to take up a new residence elsewhere, but taking an extended voyage before taking up the new residence, his old residence continues until the new one is actually taken up, although the intention to change comes earlier. Barhydt v. Cross, 156 Ia. 271, Ann. Cas. 1915C 792, 136 N. W. 525, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 986; Borland v. Boston, 132 Mass. 89, 42 Am. Rep. 424.

As a general rule the place where a married man's family resides is to be deemed his domicile. Nugent v. Bates, 51 Ia. 77, 50 N. W. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 117; Bangs v. Brewster, 111 Mass. 382. See also Wade v. Matheson, 4 Lana. 158, affirmed in 47 N. Y. 658. Compare the reported case. But this presumption may be controlled by proof that it is intended only as a temporary establishment for his family, or for transient purposes. Nugent v. Bates, 51 Ia. 77, 50 N. W. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 117.

A new residence is acquired when one moves from his old residence to a new place of residence, with no intention of returning to the old, although he may have a floating intention to go elsewhere when he finds a more suitable place. Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51.

Where a dwelling house is partly in one county or town, and partly in another, the line running through it, the legal residence is in that county or town in which lies the most necessary and indispensable part of the house, that part in which the occupant mainly and substantially performs those acts and offices which characterize his home, such as sleeping, eating, sitting, and receiving visitors. Judkins v. Reed, 48 Me. 386 [Sembler]; Chenery v. Waltham, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 327. See also Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650. If, however, the line so divides the house as to render it impossible to determine in which jurisdiction the occupant mainly and substantially performs the acts and offices heretofore referred to, then the occupant will have a right of election and his election is binding on both jurisdictions. Chenery v. Waltham, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 327. See also Thayer v. Boston, 124 Mass. 132, 26 Am. Rep. 650.

2. IN PARTICULAR.

a. Inheritance, Transfer, or Legacy Tax.

(1) England.

In Atty. Gen. v. Dunn, 6 M. & W. 511, the following facts appeared: "A British subject, domiciled and having real and personal estate in England, went abroad and purchased, in 1828, the title, castle, and estate of R., in the Papal States. He hired Italian domestic servants, male and female, whom he kept at R. until his death. He expended large sums in repairing and improving the castle and grounds of R., which repairs and improvements were going on at the time of his death. He did not make R. his constant residence, but from 1828 to 1831 sometimes occupied it, sometimes lived in furnished lodgings in the towns adjacent, and at other times visited Rome, Florence, and other parts of Italy, residing in furnished lodgings. In 1831 he came to England, and resided in different parts of it till September, 1832. In March, 1832, he sent to R. several cases of plate, books, and wearing apparel. In September, 1832, he made his will in London. In the same month he left England and went to Florence, where he remained two months, and thence to R.: he then lived, sometimes in the castle of R., sometimes in furnished lodgings in the adjacent town. till October, 1833, when he went to Rome, and there lived in furnished lodgings until his death in February, 1834." On these facts, it was held that the testator had not lost his English domicile, and that the legacy duty was, therefore, payable on the bequests contained in his will. The court said: "We are all agreed that there is not sufficient evidence to establish any domicile after Mr. Boone quitted England. We have considered it very much, and with some anxiety. My impression at first was, that there might be; but I now think, that if I were on a jury, I could not find that fact, unless I were prepared to find that an intention is the same thing as an act. I cannot find that the testator is remaining in any one place; and with respect to Rasina, the evidence does not enable us to say that he was there for a week at a time, or that his house was furnished; and when he was there, he did not live in the house, but in towns adjacent, and in ready-furnished lodgings. It does not appear, on the facts of this case, that at any one time he was there for more than a short period. He had an intention, probably, of making that his permanent residence, after he had completed certain improvements; but in the meantime he was wandering about in the towns in Italy. There is no more reason for saying he was resident in the Papal States, than that he was resident at Florence: he appears to have been some time in each place, but in ready-furnished lodgings, and in all of them it was as a man passing from place to place. A man may travel about the continent for four or five years, amusing himself at the bathing places, or visiting galleries of works of art; yet however long he may remain, it does not constitute a domicile in any of those places, more especially if he has had a domicile, which he never loses until he has acquired another. I think that in this case there is not sufficient to enable us to determine that in fact Mr. Boone was domiciled either at Rasina, or at any other place abroad; in that case it is admitted that he retained his English domicile: and if he did, it is equally admitted that the legacy duties are payable."

In the case of In re Tootal, 23 Ch. D. 532, 52 L. J. Ch. 664, 48 L. T. N. S. 816, 31 W. R. 653, it was held that the difference between the religion, laws, manners, and customs of the Chinese and the English is such that an Englishman cannot acquire a legal domicile in China so as to exempt his personal estate, after his death, from the legacy duties. The court said, stating the facts: "After some previous changes of residence, which it is unnecessary to trace, the testator in 1862 went to reside at Shanghai in the Empire of China, and, with the exception of some visits to England in 1864 and 1873 for health and business, he continued to reside at Shanghai till his death, which occurred in 1878. During his residence there he very extensively engaged in business in connection with newspapers, being the manager and part proprietor of the North China Herald and the North China Daily News and other publications and periodicals, all of which were published at Shanghai, and he was also a partner in a printing business there. Evidence has been adduced on the part of the petitioners showing that for some years before his death he had determined to reside permanently at Shanghai and had relinquished all intention of ever returning to England, and that he had in fact on several occasions expressed his intention of not returning to England. This evidence remains uncontradicted on the part of the Crown. In his will he describes himself as of Shanghai in the Empire of China. In these circumstances it was admitted by the petitioners' counsel that they could not contend that the testator's domicile was Chinese. This admission was rightly made. The difference between the religion, laws, manners, and customs of the Chinese and of Englishmen is so great as to raise every presumption against such a domicile." It was further held that there is no such thing in the law as an Anglo-Chinese domicile after the analogy of the Anglo-Indian domicile.

In Winans v. Atty-Gen. [1904] A. C. 287, 73 L. J. K. B. 613, 90 L. T. N. S. 721, 20 Times L. Rep. 510, the question involved was whether the deceased Mr. Winans was domiciled in England, and, hence, whether a legacy left by him was subject to the English legacy tax. The court stated the principal events of Mr. Winans' life as follows: "He was born in the United States in 1823. He lived there till 1850, residing in Baltimore with his father, a railway contractor, and employed in his father's business. Mr. Winans' eldest son, Walter, who was examined in this case, says that when he spoke of Baltimore he always called it 'home.' In 1850 Mr. Winans went to Russia. He was employed by the Russian Government, as his father had been, in equipping railways there on the American system. During the Crimean War he rendered assistance to the Russian Government in the construction and the equipment of gunboats to be used against the enemy—England and England's ally. In Russia he married a Guernsey lady, the daughter of a gentleman also employed by the Russian Government. He had two sons by her. In 1859 his health broke down. There were symptoms of consumption, and he was warned by his doctor that another winter in Russia would probably be fatal. He was advised to winter in Brighton in England. Very reluctantly, under medical orders, he left St. Petersburg and spent the winter in a hotel at Brighton, returning to Russia when the winter was over. In 1860 he took a furnished house in Brighton, No. 2 Chichester Terrace, for a term of five years, determinable at the end of any year. He also took the next house, No. 1, for a term of twenty-one years, determinable at the fifth, seventh, or fourteenth year. He connected the two houses structurally. He held both these houses at the time of his death—the furnished house, No. 2, as tenant from year to year, and No. 1 on a tenancy similar to that on which it was originally taken. From

1860 down to 1870 or 1871 he used to spend the winter at Brighton and about eight months of the year in Russia. In 1870 he gave up his house in St. Petersburg, and took a lease of some shooting in Scotland, apparently for the sake of his sons, for he shot very little himself. From 1871 to 1883 he spent about two months in Russia, two or three months in Kissingen in Germany, and the rest of the year in Brighton, Scotland, or London. In 1883 he ceased to visit Russia, thenceforward dividing his time between Kissingen, Brighton, London, and Scotland. This mode of life continued until 1893. After that date he spent the whole of the year in England—in London, Brighton, and the country. He never bought an estate in England for himself or for either of his sons. As far as he was concerned 'he preferred living in furnished houses or hotels'—so his son says." It further appeared that the most cherished desire in life of the deceased was the furtherance of a project for the perfecting of an invention of his spindle or cigar-shaped boats, in the perfection of which he had spent millions of dollars, and which invention he believed would render America immune from European attack. Another of his projects was the purchase of property on the water front of Baltimore, Md., for the service of the cigar-shaped boats. The court said, per Lord Macnaghten: "Of course, to us these schemes of Mr. Winans appear wild, visionary, and chimerical. But I have no doubt that to a man like Mr. Winans, wholly wrapt up in himself, they were very real. They were the dream of his life. For forty years he kept them steadily in view. And one was anti-English and the other wholly American. . . . The only other circumstance to be mentioned is that in his will dated February 4, 1897, Mr. Winans describes himself as a 'citizen of the United States of America.' It was argued on behalf of the Crown that, although Mr. Winans may have been prevented by the state of his health from returning to America when he left Russia, and although he could not have safely attempted the voyage in the latter years of his life, yet there was a time in which he might have ventured to cross the Atlantic in an ordinary liner. The obvious answer is that at that time, when divided counsels and family disagreements prevented the development of the Ferry Bar property, he had no object in going to Baltimore. Then it was said that the length of time during which Mr. Winans resided in this country leads to the inference that he must have become content to make this country his home. Length of time is of course a very important element in questions of domicile. An unconscious change may come over a man's mind. If the man goes about and mixes in society that is not an improbable result. But in the case of a person like Mr. Winans, who kept himself to himself and had little or no intercourse with his fellow men, it seems to me that at the end of any space of time, however long, his mind would probably be in the state it was at the beginning. When he came to this country he was a sojourner and a stranger, and he was, I think, a sojourner and a stranger in it when he died. On the whole I am unable to come to the conclusion that Mr. Winans ever formed a fixed and settled purpose of abandoning his American domicile and settling finally in England. I think up to the very last he had an expectation or hope of returning to America and seeing his grand schemes inaugurated. To take the test proposed by Wickens, V.-C., "if the question had arisen in a form requiring a deliberate or solemn determination," I have no doubt Mr. Winans, who was, as his son says, 'entirely American in all his ideas and sympathies,' would have answered it in favor of America."

(2) Illinois.

In People v. Moir, 207 Ill. 180, 69 N. E. 905, 99 Am. St. Rep. 205, the following facts appeared, as set forth by the reporter: "The deceased had resided in Oquawka, in Henderson county, for many years, where he owned his residence and was engaged in the business of banking, merchandising, loaning money and farming, and where he had accumulated a large fortune. His wife died in September, 1901. For some time prior to her death he had contemplated leaving Oquawka. He talked of going to California, and finally determined to go to Burlington, Iowa, where a married daughter, the wife of George Tracy, an attorney of that city, resided, and with whom he expected to make his home. On Saturday, December 7, 1901, said daughter was at her father's home in Oquawka. That afternoon Mr. Tracy came to Oquawka with the intention of remaining over Sunday. In the afternoon of that day Dr. Fleming, of Burlington, was called by telephone to Oquawka to see Mr. Moir, who was somewhat indisposed. On his arrival he held a consultation at the residence of Mr. Moir with Dr. Hanson, Mr. Moir's family physician, who resided at Oquawka. It was found that the deceased was suffering from an ulcerated tooth, and it was suggested that he go to Burlington, where the same could be satisfactorily treated. That evening Mr. and Mrs. Tracy and Dr. Fleming returned to Burlington, accompanied by Mr. Moir. On their arrival at the Tracy home a dentist, Dr. Cochran, was called. Dr. Fleming, in company with Dr. J. W. Holiday, treated Mr. Moir until December 19, 1901, when he died at the home of Mr. Tracy. The remains were taken to Oquawka for interment. The funeral was held at and the burial took place from the Moir residence, in which no change had been made during the twelve days intervening between the time Mr. Moir went to Burlington and his death." Holding that the residence of the deceased, for the purpose of the inheritance tax, had not been changed from Oquawka, the court said: "The record is voluminous, and to set out in this opinion the declarations of Mr. Moir testified to by the numerous witnesses who testified upon that subject would serve no useful purpose. Suffice it to say, it is clear therefrom that the deceased had made up his mind to go to Burlington and make his home with his daughter at that place at some time in the future not far remote from the time when he actually went to Burlington. The evidence of all the witnesses on that point, with one or two exceptions, agrees, however, that at the several times upon which he spoke upon the subject he said he would go to Burlington when the business with which he was then connected was closed up. The business of himself and sons at Oquawka, during the fall of 1901, was in progress of settlement preparatory to the contemplated change. No new goods were being bought for the store which they were carrying on at that place, and the depositors in the bank were being paid off preparatory to transferring the assets of the bank to a national bank which was being organized at Oquawka to take on its business. The business was not, however, closed up at the time the deceased went to Burlington, and it is admitted that the various enterprises in which Mr. Moir was engaged continued to be carried on by his sons until some weeks after the death of Mr. Moir. The time, therefore, when the deceased had determined to change his residence had not arrived at the time he went to Burlington. To bring about a change of residence it is necessary that there be not only an intention to change the residence, but the change must actually be made, which can only be effected by abandoning the old and permanently locating in the new place of residence. We are strongly impressed that the deceased intended to make the change so soon as his business was closed up, but are equally clear that such intention was never executed by a permanent abandonment of the old and the selection of a new place of residence by Mr. Moir. . . . It is plain that Mr. Tracy and wife did not return to Burlington in company with Mr. Moir by reason of the fact that after Dr. Fleming and Dr. Hanson arrived at the home of the deceased it was then agreed the time had come when the contemplated change of residence should be made, but that they returned to their home and took the deceased with them in order that the deceased might readily receive the medical attention which it was thought he needed. To have effected a change of residence at that time it was necessary that Mr. Moir should have gone to Burlington with the fixed intention of changing his residence—that is, with the intention of abandoning his old residence and taking up a new residence in Burlington. The clear inference to be drawn from the evidence is, that the deceased went to Burlington for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, and not with the intention of effecting a change of residence. His business not having been closed up, he left his home, and all that was in it, as it had existed for years, his unmarried daughter, who was his housekeeper, and his servants, remaining. After his death his remains were taken back to the old home and a funeral was there held. All the facts show that he went to Burlington for a temporary purpose, and not with the intention of making said city his permanent future residence.”

(3) Missouri.

In State v. Bunce, 187 Mo. App. 607, 173 S. W. 101, it appeared that Thomas F. Bunce, then a resident of the present state of New Mexico, and having resided there for about eighteen years next before his death, being in bad health, was brought from his home there to Knox county, in Missouri, where, about three days after his arrival, he died. Holding that he was not at the time of his death a resident of Missouri, for the purposes of the inheritance tax, the court said: “We think it is very clear that Thomas F. Bunce at the time of his death cannot be held to have been a resident of this state. Beyond question, he had been a resident of the territory or state of New Mexico for eighteen years next before his death, save for the last three or four days of his life; he made his will there, in which he described himself as of ‘East Las Vegas, New Mexico.’ It is dated there the 27th of April, 1910, and he died in this state on or about May 25, 1910. While he was brought here only three or four days before his death, there is nothing to show that he anticipated immediate death, or that he had in mind taking up a residence in this state. In point of fact, there is no testimony whatever covered by the agreed statement of facts in this case to show any intent whatever on the part of Thomas F. Bunce to change his domicile or place of residence. That far, therefore, we agree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned circuit judge, and we hold that at the time of his death Thomas F. Bunce was not a resident of this state, as the term ‘resident’ has been defined.”

(4) New York.

In Matter of Martin, 173 App. Div. 1, 158 N. Y. S. 915, the following facts appeared, as stated in the opinion: “Frederick Townsend Martin was born in Albany in 1849, and remained there until 1885, when he removed to New York city and rented a house there. Some time previous to 1890 he gave up this house, and thereafter when in New York he visited his sister or lived at the Murray Hill Hotel, and from 1907 on he occupied a suite of rooms at the Plaza. He always had the same rooms, and kept a few belongings there, but only paid for the suite during actual occupancy. Up to February, 1913, Mr. Martin always spent the winter, with the exception of an occasional trip to Palm Beach, in New York city. During the summer he went abroad, stopping in London hotels, and while in Paris living at an apartment which appears to have been furnished and maintained by Mr. Martin and his intimate friend, Mr. Sands. In February, 1913, while Mr. Martin was in New York city, his brother, Bradley Martin, died in London, and Mr. Martin went over, returned to New York in April, but went back to England again in July, and remained there until his death in London in March, 1914. In December, 1913, his friend, Mr. Sands, died, leaving Mr. Martin his personal effects and twenty-five thousand dollars cash. Mr. Martin immediately gave up the Paris suite and purchased a house in England, to which he removed Mr. Sands’ and his own furniture, and which he proceeded to fit up as a residence.” On these, and further facts which appear in the opinion, the court held that the deceased had not lost his New York residence, and that his estate was, therefore, subject to the transfer tax. The court said: “It is clear that Mr. Martin’s domicile up to the purchase of this London house was New York, and the burden of proof rests on the party desiring to show a different one. . . . The only fact tending to show another is the purchase of the London house, and there are a number of circumstances to explain or offset the significance of this fact. In the first place, Mr. Martin seemed to consider himself under a duty to provide a home for Mr. Sands’ collection, and in his letter of December 19, 1913, he refers to the London house as purchased solely for that purpose. The unfinished letter written just before his death to Mrs. Dewey is very significant as to his attitude toward his London house. It reads in part as follows: ‘You will understand so well that it was a frightful disappointment to me to be forced by illness to give up my winter in my beloved land. I have bought the lease of a house in London for eight years, as Mr. Sands, who was my dear, devoted friend from boyhood, died in Paris last November quite suddenly, and left me a legacy to buy the lease of a house where I could keep all the furniture and pretty things that we had bought during the long years of our friendship. I look upon it only as a storehouse to keep these things in, as nothing would induce me to live in Paris after his death. My home is in New York, where I am happier than in any other city in the world. Just think of it, that I, an American, should have brought out a book that was the book of the year in England.' Then, on another occasion, he wrote: 'I think it is better for you to enter 6 Great Cumberland place as my permanent address as trustee to Lord Craven'—thus indicating that he considered it his permanent house only for a limited purpose. Mr. Martin did nothing to transfer any of his business interests, etc., to London, and he allowed to stand his will previously made, which gave his residence as New York. On the whole, the evidence seems definitely to show that Mr. Martin still considered New York city as his domicile, and, taking into consideration Mr. Martin's wealth and habits of life, the purchase of a private residence in a city where he was accustomed to spend a considerable portion of his time does not have the significance that would attach to a like action by a person of a less cosmopolitan character."

In the case of In re Mesa y Hernandez, 172 App. Div. 467, 159 N. Y. S. 59, the court held that the estate of the decedent was not liable for the New York transfer tax. The court said: "Tirso Mesa y Hernandez was born in Cuba on January 28, 1847, and resided continuously there until his marriage on February 24, 1881, to Josefina Garcia Pola, also a native of Cuba. They went to live immediately after their marriage at his sugar plantation, 'La Vega,' at Manguito, Cuba, which remained their sole family home until 1904, when he purchased a town house, No. 2 San Lazaro, Havana, Cuba. He resided in Cuba uninterruptedly from his marriage until the time of his death, save for the years 1895 and 1899, which he spent in Europe because of the Cuban insurrection, and for periods of the other years between 1888 and 1908 when he spent his summers in Europe, with short stays in New York on his way there and on his return. There being no direct passenger service between Cuba and Europe, he was obliged to come to New York to obtain transportation across the ocean. On these trips his wife accompanied him, as well as other members of his family at times, and when in New York they stopped at hotels, never leasing a house or apartment there. Their longest stay in this country was after they reached Porto Rico on their way to Cuba, when they learned (in 1896) that during their European trip their home had been burned down in the course of the war, whereupon they toured this country as far west as Colorado and then went to Europe, returning to Cuba finally in February, 1900, upon the rebuilding and refurnishing of their home.

Ann. Cas. 1917B.—47.

Decedent's stays in New York annually thereafter lasted from one to five weeks, averaging two weeks. He died on November 29, 1908, at another of his plantations, 'Colonia Violet,' Aguade de Pasaderos, Cuba, leaving him surviving his widow and three children. He was buried from his city home, and the interment took place in his mortuary chapel in the Christobal Colon cemetery at Havana, he having given instructions that he should be buried there, no matter where he died. He left realty and personalty in Cuba and personalty in the hands of his bankers in New York. His business interests were entirely in Cuba, save for investments of his funds made by his bankers in New York. He belonged to clubs in Havana only, and his sugar plantations, the source of his wealth, were all in Cuba. His children were educated in England, and returned to Cuba upon completing their studies. His only given address was in Cuba. There could not have been a clearer case of definite and settled residence than that presented by these and numerous other facts and circumstances set forth in the affidavits in the proceeding, and not in any way contradicted."

In Matter of Morgan, 95 Misc. 451, 159 N. Y. S. 105, the court held that the deceased at her death was a resident of New York within the meaning of the transfer tax law and that her estate was subject, therefore, to the tax. The court said, setting forth the facts: "From the testimony given before the appraiser in this matter, and now laid before me, it appears that the decedent and her husband had their domicile of origin or prior choice in this state for many years before 1879, but that in the latter year they purchased a house in Washington, removed there, and continued to reside there until the date of Mr. Morgan's death, which occurred in 1886. That the decedent acquired a new domicile of residence in Washington after she and her husband went to live there is not and cannot be disputed. This was a new domicile of choice, and thus we have one certain or fixed premise in this cause. The decedent inherited from her husband the house which they had lived in at Washington, and she continued to own that house until the date of her death. But Mrs. Morgan occupied the Washington house as her home only until 1905, when she bought a new house situated at No. 70 Park avenue, in the city of New York. She thereafter rented the Washington house, and used the Park avenue house as her town house. She continued to rent the Washington house, and to occupy the Park avenue house, until the date of her death. She never lived at the Washington house after 1905, except for a few days, while she was making arrangements for reletting it to new tenants. It does appear that Mrs. Morgan did not reside during the entire year at No. 70 Park avenue in this city. She lived there about six winter months of the year, the remaining months of each year she spent in Europe or in visiting relatives and friends. She owned the furniture in the Park avenue house, engaged and paid the servants, and conducted it generally as her place of residence or home. It, however, appears at various times, after the decedent had purchased the house at No. 70 Park avenue, she executed legal documents in which she described herself as a resident of Washington, in the District of Columbia. Some of these documents were executed as late as May 3, 1913. She died on the 4th of August, 1914, and her will was admitted to probate in the District of Columbia. There is no doubt in my mind that Mrs. Morgan desired to have her legal domicile, with all its advantages, in Washington, D. C., and at the same time she wished to resume her original residence in New York. The Scotch law, it may be observed at this point, makes a subtle distinction between a physical and an intellectual residence. As a matter of fact, Mrs. Morgan did resume her old physical residence in this state and in this county, and while so resident she died. It may be that Mrs. Morgan was entitled to have her legal or intellectual domicile continue in Washington and yet reside here. Upon this abstract point I express no opinion at this time. . . . In the matter now before me there is very little contention as to the fact that Mrs. Morgan at the time of her death was actually physically resident in the city of New York, and that her sojourns elsewhere were not in law tantamount to residence. Thus it happened that she received for the last years of her lifetime all the protection which the sovereignty of the state of New York affords to residents. In my judgment her estate is subject to tax, because she died a de facto resident of the state of New York. I am convinced that Mrs. Morgan's last legal residence was in the city, county, and state of New York, and I so hold."

In the case of In re Norton, 96 Misc. 152, 159 N. Y. S. 619, the court held that the deceased was last a resident of New York, not of Bermuda, and that his estate was subject to the transfer tax. The court said: "The testimony taken and the affidavits and documents so submitted show that the decedent's domicile of origin was in Illinois, and that he actually resided in Illinois until 1901, when he sold his dwelling house in Illinois and came to New York city. He lodged at hotels in New York city from 1901 until 1904. In the latter year he purchased a house on Riverside Drive, in this city, furnished it as a home and occupied it as a residence. In December, 1904, he purchased another house at Lake Placid, N. Y., and furnished it as a summer home. From 1904 to 1910 he owned both the house in New York city and the summer house at Lake Placid, and during that period he did not own a dwelling house in any other state. In various legal documents executed by decedent between the years 1904 and 1910 he described himself as of New York city. He was assessed on personal property in this city and paid the tax in 1909 and 1910. In January, 1910, he went to Bermuda, and on May 10, 1910, he purchased a dwelling house and several acres of land there. He sold his Riverside Drive house during the same year. During 1910 and 1911 the Lake Placid house was leased, and in 1912 it was sold. He remained in Bermuda practically the entire year, 1911. During 1912 he made several trips to the United States for business purposes, but he did not remain in this state for more than a few days. He spent the summer of 1913 in Europe, and returned to Bermuda in the autumn. In June, 1914, he told his son-in-law that his wife wished to have some place in New York city to which she could take her two servant maids when traveling through the city instead of stopping at hotels, and thereupon an apartment at No. 640 West End avenue was rented for a term of three years. The lease was signed by Mrs. Norton and by the decedent, the signature of the latter having been made by his son-in-law as his attorney. The decedent paid the rent of the apartment. On August 12, 1914, the decedent applied for a passport when contemplating a trip to Europe for the purpose of aiding his wife to return to the United States, and in his application he stated that he was domiciled in the United States, and that his permanent residence was in New York city. This statement does not, however, coincide with the fact. In September, 1914, after Mrs. Norton had returned from Europe, she removed her personal belongings from the Biltmore hotel to the apartment at 640 West End avenue. The decedent traveled in connection with his business from September 10 until October 28, 1914. On the latter date he returned to this city and went to his wife's apartment at 640 West End avenue. He made arrangements for going to Bermuda in the early part of December following, but he was ill at that time and he died at the apartment 640 West End avenue on December 31, 1914. In 1913 the decedent had purchased property in Bermuda, and in the deed he described himself as 'of Bermuda.' He frequently thereafter referred to Bermuda as his residence. In 1911 he was assessed for personal property in this city and made affidavit stating that he had ceased to be a resident of New York and had been for a year prior to 1911 a legal resident of Bermuda. In various applications for letters patent made by him during the years 1913 and 1914 he stated that he was a resident of Bermuda, although on September 10, 1914, he gave New York as his address in an application for a Canadian patent. In a postscript to a letter dated August 10, 1914, after the outbreak of the European war, he stated: 'America looks pretty good to me for the future.' From the foregoing facts it would appear that the decedent acquired a residence in New York about the year 1901, and that he resided in this state up to the time he sold his Riverside Drive home in 1910. The purchase of a home in Bermuda after he had sold his summer and winter houses in New York, and the fact that he described himself in several legal documents as of Bermuda, would seem to indicate that he intended to abandon his residence in New York and acquire a new residence in Bermuda. I think he actually did acquire a residence in Bermuda facto et animo. Whether, however, he intended by renting the apartment on West End avenue in 1914 to again take up a residence in New York is a question perhaps involved in some doubt. The testimony which was given to explain the rental of the apartment on West End avenue for three years would seem to indicate that the place was rented as a matter of convenience for Mrs. Norton only; but the statement by the decedent in his application for a passport that he was a permanent resident of New York city, coupled with the postscript to the letter of August 10, 1914, wherein he stated that 'America looks pretty good to me for the future,' somewhat conflicts with this and might seem to indicate that he contemplated returning to the United States and again making New York his principal place of residence and abandoning Bermuda. But no actual abandonment is shown. Such are the principal facts. If my solution were permitted to turn upon 'commorancy,' or the last legal 'residence' of this decedent, I should find that it was Bermuda, and that even the conflicting statements of decedent, made for national purposes, should not be allowed to estop those succeeding to his estate and now vested with it by right of succession from showing the real fact as to decedent's last residence. But, in view of the late decisions cited above, I feel constrained to find that the last domicil of decedent shown by the evidence was in New York. It appears that the decedent in or about 1904 acquired a 'domicil' of choice in New York state. This being so, the onus of showing a change of such domicil is on those asserting it. Matter of Wise, 84 Misc. 663, 146 N. Y. S. 780. This burden has not been sustained, and therefore the decedent's last established domicil of choice is presumed to continue. I therefore find that the decedent's last 'domicil' was in the state of New York, and not in Bermuda."

In Matter of Grant, 83 Misc. 259, 144 N. Y. S. 567, the courts thus stated the facts: "From . . . affidavits it appears that General Grant was born in Missouri in 1850; that subsequently he resided at Washington with his father, who was then President of the United States; that he became an officer of the United States Army in 1871 and continued in the service until 1881, when he resigned. It is apparent that a short time after his resignation from the army he became domiciled in New York city. He was police commissioner in this city from 1894 to 1898. In 1899 he was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, and after his discharge from the volunteer service he was appointed major-general in the United States Army. In his will, which was executed in Texas in 1903, he described himself as 'at present an officer in the United States Army stationed at Fort Sam Houston, Texas.' From 1902 to 1904 his headquarters were at Fort Sam Houston, Texas; from 1904 to 1908, as Commander of the Department of the East, his headquarters were at Governor's Island, in New York harbor; from 1908 to 1910 he commanded the Department of the West, with headquarters at Chicago, and from 1910 to the date of his death his headquarters were again at Governor's Island. He resided wholly at his headquarters, and had no residence elsewhere. It further appears that while residing in federal territory at Governor's Island, and also while on official business in the city of Washington, General Grant expressed an intention of buying a certain house in the District of Columbia and making it his permanent home; but while he selected a house, he did not either purchase the house or rent it. He, however, shipped some household furniture and his uniforms to Washington, but it does not appear that they were delivered at a house purchased or rented by him. Shortly thereafter he died while sojourning at the Hotel Buckingham, in the city of New York, temporarily, on his way to the south." Holding that the fact of residence in federal territory (Governor's Island) coupled with the intent of living in federal territory (Washington) was sufficient union of factum and animus to change General Grant's domicil from New York to federal territory, the court said: "If it be made out here that General Grant while actually residing permanently in federal territory, to wit, in this case, while at Governor's Island, animo manendi, or while on duty expressed his intention, as he did in fact, of always continuing to live in federal territory, to wit, the city of Washington, we have, I think the union of animus (intent) and factum (actual residence) necessary to constitute his last domicil of choice in federal territory by the most stringent rule of the American cases.

Such union of animus and factum brings General Grant within the doctrine of those early New York cases which are presumed by controller's counsel to establish a doctrine of private international law, that in every case where a new domicil of choice is alleged as against a former domicil of choice actual residence in the new domicil of choice must be established."

In Matter of Crosby, 85 Misc. 679, 148 N. Y. S. 1045, it appeared that the husband of the decedent was domiciled in New York at the time of the death of his wife, but that she had previously separated from him, voluntarily, had gone to Morristown, N. Y., and later to Charlestown, W. Va., and had there resided for about thirteen years prior to her death. On these facts the court held that the deceased was not a taxable resident of New York at her death and that her estate was, therefore, not subject to the transfer tax.

In Matter of Rothschild, 86 Misc. 364, 148 N. Y. S. 368, the court said: "The evidence before the transfer tax appraiser conclusively shows to my mind that the domicil of the late Charles A. Rothschild at the time of his death was in France. His household and household effects were maintained in France continuously since the year 1905, when he abandoned his prior domicil in New York sine animo revertendi. Since 1905 Mr. Rothschild lived only in France. Both the animus and the factum elements of a domicil in France are amply established in this instance by uncontradicted testimony."

b. Personal Property Tax.

(1) Illinois.

On facts which appear in the quoted portion of the opinion, the court, in Mahany v. People, 138 Ill. 311, held that a change of residence within personal property tax laws had been affected. The court said: "The taxes in question were assessed for the year 1889. Appellant is an unmarried man, and for many years has owned, and still owns, a farm in West Jersey township, in Stark county. For some twenty years appellant lived on this farm, but about four years prior to 1889 he rented it to a tenant, reserving the orchard. He thereupon commenced rooming and boarding at a hotel in the village of Toulon, in Toulon township, about four miles from his farm in West Jersey. He seems to have spent about one-third of his time in traveling about the country and in neighboring states, and the other two-thirds of his time at Toulon, attending to his business of loaning money, occasionally going to his farm and there attending to his orchard, gathering his fruit, etc., but returning to Toulon at night. The report of the county collector was prima facie evidence of the legality of the taxes assessed against appellant. (Pike v. People, 84 Ill. 80; Mix v. People, 86 Ill. 312; Durham v. People, 67 Ill. 414.) The objections urged by him against the validity of the taxes were, that he was not liable to be taxed for personal property in the township of Toulon; that he was a resident of West Jersey township at the time of the assessment, and liable to pay personal property taxes therein, and that he was assessed in said latter township on personal property for 1889, and paid the taxes so assessed. The evidence that was submitted to the county court in regard to his residence was not entirely satisfactory, some of it tending to the one conclusion, and some to the other. The county court both heard and saw the witnesses during their examinations, and had the full benefit to be derived from a personal presence at their cross-examinations, and found that his residence was in Toulon. We have very carefully read and examined all the evidence found in the record, and we cannot either say or demonstrate that the finding of the county court was erroneous, and more especially so in view of the fact that, prima facie, the assessment is valid."

In People v. Caldwell, 142 Ill. 434, 32 N. E. 691, a change of residence was held to have been effected by facts which sufficiently appear in the following quotation from the opinion: "It appears that Caldwell was the owner of three farms, aggregating sixteen hundred acres, two of which are situated wholly in Piatt county, and one of which seven hundred and ten acres is in Piatt and one hundred and ninety acres in Champaign county. . . . One of these farms had upon it a good house, large barn, stock scales, etc., and it would appear that it had, at one time, at least, been the residence of Caldwell. In 1886 Caldwell built a house on the land in Champaign county, near the line, and as he claims, then moved into it and has ever since occupied it as his residence, and that since the spring or summer of 1886 his actual residence has been on said land in Champaign county, and that the personal property assessed by the assessor of Sangamon township, in Piatt county, was liable for taxation only in Champaign county, that being the place of his domicil. To this it is answered: First, that his residence is not in Champaign county, but in Piatt county, and that his pretense of occupying the house on the land in Champaign county is fraudulently made, to escape the listing and taxation of his personal property in Piatt county, for the reason that the rate of taxation is higher in the latter than in the former; and second, that if it be conceded that his residence was in Champaign county, yet the property assessed, and upon which the extension of the tax is sought to be enjoined, had its situs in Sangamon township, in Piatt county, for the purposes of taxation. It would seem that much of the personal property of the complainant had, in previous years, been listed by him in Champaign county, where, as shown, the rate of taxation was less than in Piatt county, and it does not seem improbable that this cause may have led Caldwell to change his abode, and claim his residence in the former county. Be that as it may, it seems clear that from 1886 down he claimed to reside in the dwelling house upon the land in Champaign county. He lived there with his wife, at least part of the time, claimed it was his home, voted in that township, and did many acts indicative of his intention to make it his place of domicile. We have carefully considered all of the evidence, and think the chancellor fully warranted in finding that his place of residence on the first day of May, 1890, and for several years prior thereto, had been upon the land constituting part of what is known as the 'Champaign farm,' and in Scott township, in Champaign county. His motive for selecting this domicile cannot be important. If he actually resided in Champaign county the same legal consequences would result, whatever may have been his motive for choosing it."

In Ellis v. People, 199 Ill. 548, 65 N. E. 428, it appeared that taxes had been assessed on the personal property of the appellant, in the town of Carrollton. Her father had resided in Rubicon up to the time of his death. After his death, his widow lived in Carrollton until her death and after that her daughter, the appellant, continued to live with her sister in Carrollton, though they spent most of their time visiting different parts of the United States. The appellant had never had actual possession of the personal property sought to be taxed, it having been in the possession of a cousin who lived in Rubicon, where the property was listed for taxation. Upon these facts it was held that the appellant's residence was in Carrollton, not in Rubicon, and that her personal property was therefore properly listed for taxation in Carrollton.

(2) Indiana.

In Culbertson v. Floyd County, 52 Ind. 361, the court held that a change of residence from Indiana to Europe had not been effected by the following facts, as they appeared in the agreed statement: "Prior to the 8th day of August, 1870, the said John C. Culbertson resided in the city of New Albany, Indiana. He had resided there for about thirty years from choice. He was not born in Indiana. In August, 1870, he had no occupation or business of any kind. He lived upon an income derived from the rents of real estate, bank stocks and money loaned. He had a dwelling house on Bank street, in New Albany, which he occupied with his family, consisting of his wife and two children, until the 8th day of August, 1870. On the said 8th day of August, 1870, he relinquished the possession of his house to one Conn, having rented the same to him, with all the furniture therein, in consideration of a rental of three hundred and fifty dollars per annum, payable quarterly, and agreeing to give said Conn three months' notice before requiring him to vacate the premises. No time was fixed for the determination of the lease, other than as above stated. On the same day, with the intention of ceasing to be a resident of Indiana for an indefinite time, he departed from Indiana, with all the members of his family, for the purpose of residing in Europe, with the expectation of again becoming a citizen of Indiana at some indefinite time in the future, probably two or three years. The person Conn, who from that day occupied the dwelling house and used the furniture, was not in any manner related to said Culbertson or his family, and no room was reserved therein; neither was the furniture therein reserved for them. While Culbertson and his family were in Europe, and in December, 1870, some four months after he left, he wrote a letter to his brother, William S. Culbertson, a merchant of New Albany, which contained the following: "They of course will only tax me upon my realty this year, as I have ceased to be a citizen for a year or two, and as life is uncertain, may never become one again." Culbertson and his family rented part of a furnished house in London during August, September and a portion of October, 1870, wherein he and his family regularly kept house during that period. They then traveled from place to place on the Continent, and after living in Europe for two years and a quarter nearly, in August, 1872, he notified said Conn that he would require him to vacate his house in November following. He returned with his family in November, 1872, to New Albany, and from that time to March, 1873, they resided in New Albany. Between August 8th, 1870, and their return from Europe, neither Culbertson nor any member of his family was in the United States, and during part of the time the children were at school in Europe." The court said: "From an examination of the . . . authorities, we are thoroughly satisfied that appellant did not lose his residence in this state; that immediately upon his return home, he was entitled to exercise all his political, civil and municipal rights; that he was eligible to office and entitled to vote; and that he is to be regarded as a person residing within this state, within the meaning of the third section of the assessment law, . . . and was subject to be taxed under the first clause of said section."

In Schmoll v. Schenck, 40 Ind. App. 581, 82 N. E. 805, it was held that no change of residence had been effected by the following facts: "The special findings, in substance, show the date and place of appellee's birth and place of residence before marriage, her marriage on May 29, 1872, to Ulysses P. Schenck, Jr., resident of Vevay, Switzerland county, Indiana, and that from that time she continued there to reside with him as his wife until his death and burial at Vevay in 1892. During the winter of 1889-90 appellee was an invalid and went to Peru, Miami county, Indiana, to receive treatment from certain physicians, residents of that city. For about two years from May, 1880, appellee, her husband, and child, and solely for the benefit of the health of appellee and her husband, lived in Colorado and California, during which time their home in Vevay remained closed. Immediately after the death of her husband appellee and her daughter went to Peru, and remained with relatives and friends until July and then went to Vevay where they remained until October, 1892, going from there to Canton, Ohio, for one month, then to Peru, to assist in the care of appellee's mother, who at that time was a widow—old, blind, and in ill-health—requiring constant attention and physical assistance, and which care and attention devolved largely upon appellee. The mother died in July, 1903. In the spring of 1894, in anticipation of her daughter's marriage, a furnished residence in the city of Peru was leased for a term of eighteen months. The marriage occurred in June, 1894. Thereafter, when in Peru appellee occupied said dwelling with her daughter and son-in-law. In September, 1895, her son-in-law went to New York for a course in the Bellevue Medical College, his wife and appellee following in December, all returning to Peru the last of June, 1896. In July appellee went to Petoskey, Michigan, where she remained a month, then returned to Peru, and immediately, with her daughter, went to Vevay, remaining until the latter part of October, when they returned to Peru. Appellee's son-in-law, a physician, after considering various cities, decided to locate permanently in Peru, and on June 26, 1897, appellee purchased a lot in Peru, took the title in her own name, erected thereon a dwelling house, which was completed in July, 1898, and is the only real estate owned by appellee in Miami county. The dwelling was planned and constructed with reference to the wishes and conveniences of the son-in-law and his wife. Two rooms were for use as a physician's office, and one room for the special use of appellee's mother, and occupied by her when appellee was in Peru. When appellee was away the mother was taken to the home of her son. No special room was reserved for appellee. Appellee never remarried, and after the marriage of her daughter had no one depending upon her for support. In 1899 a son was born to appellee's daughter, and for several months after the birth of the child the mother was feeble in health and unable to care for it, and the child was cared for by appellee. Appellee since the death of her husband has not kept house, and prior to July, 1898, while in Peru she occupied furnished rooms and took her meals at hotels, restaurants, and in boarding houses. Subsequently to her daughter's marriage, when convenient, they roomed at the same house and took their meals together. At other times they roomed and boarded at separate houses. Immediately prior to the death of appellee's husband he was negotiating the sale of the home they occupied in Vevay. The sale was not consummated by him. Soon after her husband's death appellee stored her household goods in a portion of the house and rented the remainder until 1893, when she sold said residence and her household goods, except certain articles which had come to her through the relatives of her husband, and which, owing to the memories associated with them, she retained for her daughter, and which she shipped and stored in Peru until the completion of her house in 1898. Appellee since the death of her husband has returned to Vevay on an average of about once a year, remaining on such occasions from two weeks to two months. Her stay on different occasions was shortened by calls from her relatives on account of sickness in their families, or on account of the condition of her own health. She has spent about nine-tenths of her time in Peru, the remainder in Vevay and other places. When appellee went to Peru after the death of her husband she had no definite time fixed during which she would remain. Appellee was a member of the Baptist church. She took a letter from that church at Vevay and deposited it in the Baptist church at Peru. When she went to Colorado and California in 1890 she took with her a church letter. On December 5, 1895, appellee intended to visit Europe for an indefinite time. To enable her brother to attend to her business, pending her absence, she executed to him a power of attorney, in which the scrivener who drew said instrument, without her knowledge, described her residence as in Miami county, Indiana, and she executed the same without observing that her place of residence was so stated, and did not know of such mistake until after the instrument was recorded. She at no time knowingly executed an instrument nor accepted a conveyance to herself in which her residence was described as Miami county, Indiana. After the sale of her homestead in Vevay, the purchaser placed at her disposal a certain room therein, which she occupied at times, at other times, from choice, occupied another room, and at other times roomed with relatives of her deceased husband. She took her meals at the hotel, and at times boarded with her friends. Of all the times appellee was in Vevay, after the death of her husband, on but two occasions did she go on matters of business. Since the death of her husband she has continuously owned, in the city of Vevay, six residence properties, some unimproved lots, two business rooms, two livery stables, one paint shop, and an interest in a furniture factory. In Switzerland county she owns four farms, one of thirty acres, two of one hundred acres each, and one of over two hundred acres. She owns notes, secured by mortgages on real estate in Miami county, of the value of $10,000. Since the sale of her homestead in Vevay, appellee has owned but a small amount of tangible personal property, consisting principally of a horse and buggy, which, with her daughter's household goods she listed for taxation in the city of Vevay until the year 1898, inclusive, in good faith, claiming and believing that to be her residence and the proper place to list said property, although said property was in Miami county, Indiana. For the years 1899 to 1903, inclusive, acting on the advice that tangible personal property should be listed for taxation and assessed in the township, town or city where the same is situate, irrespective of the owner's place of residence, the property just named was listed for taxation in said city of Peru, she at the time of each listing claiming Vevay as her residence. In each and every year from 1893 to 1903, appellee, claiming Vevay as her home, returned to the township assessor of the township in Switzerland county, in which the city of Vevay is located, a full, true and complete list of all moneys loaned, and credits owned by her on April 1 of each of said years, respectively, which were duly listed for taxation in said county and city, averaging for the eleven years $21,662, and the taxes were duly assessed on the property so returned and listed, both in said county and city, and paid by appellee. Appellant is threatening to place certain property on the tax duplicates for the years 1893 to 1903, inclusive, consisting of moneys, moneys loaned and credits, ranging in amounts from $16,240 in 1893, to $22,896 in 1903. During said years the average rate of taxation in the city of Peru was $1.42, and in Vevay, sixty and one-sixth cents on the $100. She had an agent in Vevay who attended to the listing of her property, and she did not know the rate of taxation in either Peru or Vevay for either of said years. During her married life she formed sincere and lasting friendships in Vevay, and a warm attachment for the city and its residents, which she still retains, and never at any time intended to abandon her home in Vevay and to fix her home in any other place, and intends to maintain that city as her home and be buried, there." With reference to these facts the court said: "In the case at bar it is admitted that appellee in 1893 was an inhabitant of Vevay, Indiana. With this fact admitted, the rule is well settled, both in this country and in England, that such habitancy or domicile will continue until both residence in a new locality and intent to make it her home concur. . . . The special findings show the presence of appellee in Peru, Miami county, the greater part of the time between 1893 and 1903, inclusive, that she purchased a lot and built a residence thereon, and that she has money loaned in that county. But, when these facts are considered in connection with the denial of an intention to adopt Peru as her domicile or habitancy, the magnitude of her interests in Vevay and Switzerland county, her acts and conduct in listing the property in controversy for taxation in Vevay, her long-admitted residence there, her explanation of the cause of her stay in Peru, covering practically the entire time for which she is proposed to be taxed by the latter city, the explanation and inferences to be drawn from the facts found relative to the purchase of the lot, and the building of the residence, coupled with the fact that, by the will of her late husband, she became the owner of all the property with which he died seized, and that she, during all of said time, was unmarried, together with all of the other facts found, clearly sustain the conclusions of law of the trial court to the effect that during all of said time she was an inhabitant of Vevay, and not an inhabitant of Peru, Indiana, and that the class of property mentioned in the complaint was, during all of the time mentioned, properly and rightfully listed and taxed in Vevay."

In Brookover v. Kase, 41 Ind. App. 102, 83 N. E. 524, it appeared that Mary Brookover was a person of unsound mind who had never in her life been capable of caring for her own property; that for many years she had resided with her mother in Warren county; that in 1884 her brother, the appellant, was appointed her guardian and made an arrangement whereby the mother was to furnish a home for and care for the lunatic ward; that this arrangement continued, the ward living in Warren county with her mother, until 1886, when the mother moved to the city of Huntington, the ward going with her, by and with the consent of the guardian; that they both lived in Huntington from 1886 to 1892, when they both moved back to the old residence in Warren county where they remained a year, returning to Huntington in 1893, again by and with the consent of the guardian, and still under the original arrangement. On these facts the court held that the residence of the insane ward had been changed from Warren county to Huntington and that her personal property was taxable in Huntington for the years during which she and her mother had lived there.

(3) Iowa.

The court held, in Nugent v. Bates, 51 Ia. 77, 50 N. W. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 117, that a change in residence had not been effected by the moving of the appellant to Chicago. The court said: "The appellees do not dispute the proposition that if the appellant was a resident of Chicago he was not taxable in this state. The plaintiff is married, and from 1871 resided with his family in the town of Osceola, in this state, until he claims to have moved to Chicago in September, 1875, which is not disputed. This latter date is stated in the petition to have been in 1874, but this must be a mistake, as the plaintiff in his affidavit states it was in 1875. The family continues to reside at Osceola after September, 1875, there being no change in this respect except that the plaintiff was absent. He was in Osceola with his family at least once. This was in December, 1875, and how long he remained, or for what purpose he returned, does not appear. Affidavits were filed by the plaintiff which, in terms, state that he was a resident of Chicago from September, 1875, until after January, 1876. Such affidavits are not entitled to consideration because they state mere legal conclusions. The affidavits in effect merely state what, in their judgment, the law is. The plaintiff states that he was a resident of Chicago at the time the assessment was made, and that he had been such since September, 1875, and further states: 'I had at said time permanently located, as I supposed; had sold out my business in Clarke county, and was doing business in Chicago and no other place; that at the time I was assessed had all my arrangements made to move my family to Chicago, where I at that time was in business, and had purchased property, but owing to the failure of the bank at Osceola I was unable to carry out the plans. I had to let the trade go, as the bank was my security.' . . . When a residence is once acquired it is presumed to continue until there is satisfactory evidence of abandonment. . . . The only evidence of the abandonment of the residence which had been acquired in Osceola is that the plaintiff had gone to Chicago, purchased property, and gone into business with the intention of permanently locating there. But his family continued to reside in Osceola, as they had before the plaintiff went to Chicago. It is not claimed any preparations had been made for removal. To all appearances the family was permanently located in Osceola. We are of the opinion, under these circumstances, the plaintiff was a resident of Osceola, and rightly assessed and taxed there to the extent of the personal property owned by him."

In Babcock v. Board of Equalization, 65 Ia. 110, 21 N. W. 207, it was said: "Plaintiff was taxable on his moneys and credits in the county of his residence, and at no other place. . . . In 1880, and prior to that, he was, without any question, a resident of Clayton county, and of the township in which the assessment in question was made. In 1877 he owned a residence in the village of Strawberry Point, in Clayton county, in which he resided with his wife. She died in that year, but he continued to keep house until 1879, when he sold his residence, and went to live with his sister in the same village. He owned a farm in Fayette county, which was occupied by a tenant. He continued to live with his sister at Strawberry Point until the fall of 1880, when he removed a portion of his furniture and household effects, and stored them in a room in the house on his farm, but a portion of his goods he left at the residence of his sister. He also took his trunk and valise, containing his wearing apparel, from his sister's place, stating to his sister at the time that he was going to live with his brother, who owned and lived on a farm adjoining the one owned by him in Fayette county. He took his trunk and valise to his brother's house, telling him and his family at the time that he had come to make his home with them. He swears that when he left Strawberry Point on this occasion he fully intended to make his home in Fayette county. He continued to make his home at his brother's until the summer of 1882. He frequently returned in the meantime, however, to Strawberry Point, and on some of these occasions remained there for some time, stopping with his sister. He and his sister were the administrators of the estate of her deceased husband, and the evidence shows that his object in going to Strawberry Point on these occasions was to give attention to the business of settling this estate. In the summer of 1882 he left his brother's place, taking his trunk and clothing with him, and returned to his sister's house. He remained there for some time, when he went east on a visit, and in the fall he was married, and returned to Strawberry Point with his wife, and they continued during the winter to board with his sister. He testified, however, that it was his intention during all this time to return to Fayette county and make his home there. On this state of facts we think it clear that plaintiff ceased to be a resident of Clayton county in the fall of 1880. He left there at that time, intending to make his home at another place, and also intending not to return again to that county to reside. From that time up to the summer of 1882 he was an actual resident of Fayette county, and his intention was to make that his home. His domicil and residence during this time were certainly in the latter county. And we think it equally clear that he has not lost his residence there. His absence from that county was temporary, and it was his intention to return there and make that his home."

In King v. Parker, 73 Ia. 757, 34 N. W. 451, the court said: "The plaintiff claims that on January 1st, 1885, he was not a resident of Montgomery county, but of Burlington, Des Moines county. He so averred in his petition and so testified. The facts are, however, that he had no family, that he did not keep house, and was a mere boarder wherever he was. For the last six or eight years he had spent most of his time at Red Oak, Montgomery county, and had a post-office box there. He does not appear to have voted, nor to have paid any taxes anywhere. According to his testimony, some of his clothing and his trunks remained in Burlington, and were at a private boarding house, where he had at times boarded; but it is not shown what proportion of his clothing was there, or how often he returned to it, or whether he had occasion to return to it at all. The evidence upon this point is so meager that we are led to suspect that the clothing, upon which considerable stress is placed in argument, was a trifling matter, and that the plaintiff seldom went to Burlington for any purpose, and remained there but little when he did go. It does not appear that he had any business there, or any property there which required any attention, or that there was any reason for his being there at any time. His property, as we conclude from the evidence, consisted almost entirely of moneys and credits and real estate, and the latter was in Montgomery and neighboring counties, and he spent his time at Red Oak, because his interests were such that it was more convenient for him to be there. When approached by the assessor of Montgomery county, he gave in a small amount of personal property, as if a resident of the county, and without a suggestion that he was a non-resident, and that his personal property was not properly assessable there. This, to our mind, is a very significant fact. Taking the evidence as a whole, we have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff regarded himself as really a resident of Montgomery county January 1st, 1885, though sometimes claiming to the contrary."

In Cover v. Hatten, 136 Ia. 63, 113 N. W. 470, the court said: "The sole question presented by this appeal is one of fact. It is this: Where was plaintiff's residence and domicil on the first days of January in the years 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902? That his original residence and domicil from the year 1856 down to the year 1899 was in Iowa county is conceded; but it is contended that in December of the year 1898 he changed his residence to Keokuk county, and that he has lived there ever since. The testimony, as we think, shows that plaintiff never changed his original residence and domicil, which is conceded to have been in Iowa county down to the month of December in the year 1898. True, during the very last days of the years in question plaintiff made trips into Keokuk county taking some items of wearing apparel with him and went to the home of his sons, where he remained for a short time, returning finally to Iowa county and to his home, which remained furnished and in order. There he kept a horse and cow for personal use, which he never disposed of; there he had a business which demanded and received his personal attention; there he had a farm which he personally managed; and there to all intents and purposes he made his home. True, he made many declarations to the effect that he had changed his residence to Keokuk county and intended to make that his home, but these seem to have been for taxation purposes only. His conduct belies the claim that he had in fact changed his residence. He never in fact established a residence in Keokuk county, and, in the absence of some evidence of an abandonment of the old, that will continue to be to his residence for the purposes of taxation. He did not vote in either county, nor did he set up an establishment in Keokuk county. His home, the place to which he returned each time after his short visit to the neighboring county on or about January 1st of each year, was in Iowa county. This he never abandoned, save in his mind, and evidently for the purpose of escaping the burdens of taxation. True, he paid taxes in Keokuk county, but this does not relieve him from paying where he should. We shall not set out the testimony upon which we base our conclusions in detail. It is sufficient to state our conclusions, and this we have done."

In Shirk v. Monmouth Tp. Board of Review, 137 Ia. 230, 114 N. W. 884, the court held that intent and fact of change of residence were shown by the following facts, which were, therefore, sufficient to constitute a change: "In October, 1905, plaintiff went to Oklahoma with intent, as he claims, to make that then territory his residence, and returned according to his contention for a temporary purpose in February, 1906. During his absence he was assessed on money and credits in the township of Monmouth in Jackson county, and also in the city of Maquoketa in said county. Plaintiff appeared before the township board of review and also before the city board and objected to said assessments, claiming that he was assessed on the same property in Oklahoma, and that his residence on the 1st day of January, 1906, was in that territory. Each board overruled his objections, and he then appealed to the district court and when the cases were reached in that court they were consolidated and tried together. In the district court plaintiff filed what he called a petition, in which he averred, his nonresidence at the time for which the assessment was made, and asked that the assessments be stricken. Defendant township board of review filed an answer, in which, among other things, it admitted that plaintiff appeared and objected to the assessment upon the ground of non-residence, and because the property had been taxed in another jurisdiction, but it pleaded that pursuant thereto time was given plaintiff to make his showing which he failed and neglected to do, and that for this reason the district court had no jurisdiction of the appeal. To this part of the answer plaintiff demurred because it appeared that the board of review had no jurisdiction over his property. Testimony was then taken upon the issue as to plaintiff's residence, and at the conclusion thereof the case was submitted, resulting in an order sustaining the demurrer and finding that the assessment made for the township was illegal and void. The assessment made by the board of review of the city of Maquoketa was also canceled and set aside. The township board alone appeals." The court said: "The next and final contention is that the trial court was in error in its finding as to plaintiff's residence. Claim is made that he was a resident of this state and of the county and township named on January 1, 1906. Much testimony was taken pro and con upon this proposition. We have gone over the record with care, and see no reason for interfering with the finding of the trial court on this issue. Fact and intent must concur in order that one may gain a residence or domicile in another jurisdiction from that in which we find his original domicile. But both are shown here."

In Glotfelty v. Brown, 148 Ia. 124, 126 N. W. 797, it was held that there had been no change of residence, within the tax law, since no sufficient intent appeared from the facts in the case, which the court outlined as follows: "He was born in Jefferson county, and lived there until in March, 1906, when he sold the farm upon which he lived, and surrendered the possession thereof. He thereupon rented a house on the same farm, and lived there until in August, 1906. After that, he and his family visited friends in Iowa and Minnesota, and later they went into California, where they remained until the latter part of March, 1907, when they returned to Jefferson county, Iowa. They rented a house in Fairfield during the summer of that year and in the fall bought a home there, where they have since resided. The appellant did not remove his household goods to California. He did not purchase property there, nor did he vote or pay taxes there. When he went to California, he undoubtedly intended to make that his future home if he found the conditions there satisfactory to himself and family. That he was not well enough pleased with conditions in California to stay there and to make it his permanent home is evidenced by his early return to Iowa."

In Barhydt v. Cross, 156 Ia. 271, Ann. Cas. 1915C 792, 136 N. W. 525, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 986, the following facts appeared, as stated in the opinion: "Prior to October 8, 1909, T. W. Barhydt resided at No. 420 Iowa street, in the city of Burlington, Iowa; the same being an eleven-room brick house, with brick laundry and barn, on a lot 180x117 feet, where he had lived continuously for over forty years. On October 8, 1909, while still living in that house, he and his wife started on a trip of travel, study, information, and sightseeing around the world via New York, the Suez Canal, Egypt, India, China, Japan, and Hawaii; the destination being San Francisco, Cal. He left his furnished home at Burlington in charge of a caretaker. After leaving New York, the only place where they were in territory controlled by the United States before reaching their destination was at Manila, Philippine Islands, on December 19, 20, and 21, 1909, and at Honolulu January 23 and 24, 1910. They reached San Francisco, Cal., on January 31, 1910, where their water trip ended; and, after resting a few days there, they went direct to Los Angeles and Pasadena, Los Angeles county, Cal., spending part of the time in each place, while Mr. Barhydt looked over different properties he had in view to purchase, first purchasing No. 90 South Grand avenue, Pasadena, late in March. At the same time, he had made an offer on No. 969 San Pasqual street, Pasadena, which was accepted within a few days, both of which properties he owns now. Mr. Barhydt remained in Pasadena until April 15th, when he and his wife returned to Burlington, and such portions of the summer as they were in that city occupied No. 420 Iowa street, their old home, and lived there until December 20, 1910. At the date of the trial below, March 7, 1911, his house and furniture in Burlington were in charge of a caretaker. Prior to this trip around the world, they were accustomed to spend most of their winters in Burlington, taking occasional trips, but never going away before February or March. At the time of taking Mr. Barhydt's deposition (January 30, 1911), he was living at No. 969 San Pasqual street, Pasadena, Cal., having occupied that house since December 23, 1910, the house having been purchased in March, 1910; and Mr. Barhydt took possession of the same by placing a caretaker in charge of it on April 22, 1910. Mr. Barhydt testified that he left Iowa, with the purpose and intention of ceasing to have a residence and domicil there, on October 8, 1909. Previous to leaving Burlington, he said he looked up several places in California in view of becoming a resident and citizen of that state." For the year of 1910, an assessment of taxes on personality was made against Barhydt in Burlington, Iowa, which he sought to avoid on the grounds that he was then, and had been since 1909, when he left Burlington for his trip around the world, a resident of California. The court held, however, that until December 23, 1910, when he took up actual residence in California, Barhydt had not legally changed his residence, and that he was, therefore, properly assessed for the year in Burlington, Iowa.

(4) Kentucky.

In Montgomery v. Lebanon, 111 Ky. 646, 64 S. W. 509, 54 L.R.A. 914, it appeared that the plaintiff was, and had for many years been, the owner of a farm in Marion county, a few miles from Lebanon; that his only business was that of a farmer; that about two years prior to the institution of the suit, in order to secure the advantages of city schools, he, with his family, and taking many of his household effects, moved to the city of Lebanon and occupied a residence there which he had erected for his wife; that he had been sending his children to the free city schools; that he kept his house on the farm in readiness for the return of his family; and that he continued to perform his duties as a citizen in the precinct in which the farm home was situated, being a regularly appointed and acting surveyor of a public highway in that precinct. Taxes were assessed on the personal property of the plaintiff by the city of Lebanon, which he sought to avoid in the instant litigation. Holding that he was not a resident of Lebanon, and was therefore not liable for the tax, the court said: "In the case at bar it is clear that appellant never became domiciled in Lebanon unless he became so by reason of the facts occurring within two years preceding this litigation. His domicil was certainly in the county, not far from Lebanon, but outside of it. His only business is farming. He cultivates his farm, or has it cultivated. Part of his household goods remain in his house on his farm. He retains the right to remove his family back to his house at any time, and he says he spends most of his time on the farm, and that he removed his family to Lebanon to stay only while his two children were in the school age, the youngest of whom was sixteen years old at the time of the trial. He says he never exercised any of the privileges of citizenship peculiar to the city, never registered there as a voter. It is true that he sends his children free to the free school in Lebanon, but it does not appear that there is any special municipal tax collected for the support of the free school, and it is claimed for appellant that, inasmuch as he pays his share of the state tax devoted to free schools, he should be allowed to send his children to the free school in whatever district they might for the time being reside. After careful consideration of the law and facts of the case, we have reached the conclusion that the appellant had not, at the time of the trial of this case, lost or abandoned his country domicil. It results, therefore, that the court erred in dismissing his petition."

In Lebanon v. Biggers, 117 Ky. 430, 78 S. W. 213, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1528, the following facts appeared, as stated by the court: "The defendant resisted payment of the taxes upon the ground that he was not a resident of the city, but that his permanent home was located upon his farm, some three and one-quarter miles from the city of Lebanon, and he was only liable for the tax assessed against the real estate owned by him which he offered to pay. To support his contention as to his residence, the defendant testified that he had a wife and two children; that for many years he had owned a farm of 200 acres about three and one-half miles from Lebanon, on which was located a dwelling house which contained seven rooms, which he had occupied for many years; that on the 20th of October, 1899, he purchased the residence then occupied by him in Lebanon, furnished it comfortably, and shortly thereafter took possession of it with his family, and had continued to reside in it; that after his removal from his farm it was operated by him on shares; that the tenant occupied a portion of the dwelling, but that he reserved three rooms for his own use; that he still got his vegetables, chickens, milk, and household supplies largely from the farm, and that he frequently stayed out at the farm at night during the summer; that he depended upon his farm and stock trading for a living. But upon his cross-examination he was asked this question: 'Mr. Biggers, where, in future, do you expect to make your residence for your family? A. In the country, on some farm. I do not know whether I will make it my farm or not, but I am going away from town.' He admitted that his family had not occupied his country residence during the year 1901, and that he had paid taxes upon his personal property for that year in Lebanon, but had refused to pay for the year 1901 in consequence of the decision by the court in Montgomery v. Lebanon, 111 Ky. 646, 64 S. W. 509, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 891, 54 L.R.A. 914; that he had moved to town because both his own and his wife's health were better than on the farm, and because they wanted the advantages afforded by the city of attending church, etc., that when he moved into the city there was no fixed definite time in his mind of abandoning his town residence. Under this state of facts the trial court dismissed plaintiff's petition, and it has appealed." Distinguishing the instant case from that of Montgomery v. Lebanon, 111 Ky. 646, 64 S. W. 509, 54 L.R.A. 914, the court said, after a review of the authorities: "When we apply the law as stated in these authorities to the facts of this case, we find that when appellee left his home in the country and moved to the city of Lebanon he bought a new residence, furnished it comfortably, and took up his abode there, with no fixed or definite intention of returning to his farm. Indeed, he testifies that he does not know that he will return to his home in the country, even if, in the future, he should abandon his residence in the city. He says the hope of improving his health was one of the main inducements in moving to the city, and that his anticipations have been realized; that the opportunity afforded by the city of attending church regularly was an element in determining his choice. All of these circumstances are likely to make his residence in the city permanent, although he testifies that it is at present indefinite. The facts in this case clearly distinguish it from Montgomery v. City of Lebanon, supra. In that case it appeared that Montgomery moved to Lebanon for a definite purpose and for a definite time—the education of his two children, the youngest of which was then sixteen years of age; that he continued to act as surveyor of a public highway in the country in the neighborhood of his farm; that he intended to return to his farm as soon as his children had finished their education. It would be better if the questions of fact involved in cases of this character were left to the determination of a jury. But as the parties elected to submit their controversy to the chancellor, and he has decided the question upon its merits without objection, we think it not improper that upon this appeal the matter should be finally disposed of. We have reached the conclusion that under the facts of this case the appellee, J. M. Biggers, was liable for the taxes sued for, and that the trial court erred in not so adjudging."

In Helm v. Com. 135 Ky. 392, 122 S. W. 196, the following statement, from which the facts and holding sufficiently appear, was made by the court: "This is a proceeding commenced in the county court of Fayette county to require the appellant, as trustee for Margaret Helm, to list the personal property of the cestui que trust for taxation as omitted property for the years 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907 and 1908. The merits of the question involved here turn upon whether or not Margaret Helm was domiciled in Fayette county, Ky., during the years mentioned, as is claimed by appellee, or whether her domicile was in Woodford county, as claimed by appellant. The question is one wholly of fact, and is not altogether free from doubt. Margaret Helm's father and mother resided on a large farm in Woodford county, Ky., up to the time of the death of the father. After his death the mother, Mary L. Helm, and her daughter, Margaret, continued to reside in Woodford county, although they were absent therefrom a large part of the time. The farm was rented out, but the mother retained a room in the house which she kept furnished, and occupied from time to time. After the death of her mother, Margaret Helm did not continue to keep a room in the house on the farm, but boarded in Lexington, Ky. She was unmarried, and able financially to live how and where she pleased. Her mother died in 1903, and since that time she has for the most part boarded in Lexington. Whether or not that was her domicile is the question for adjudication. The will of the mother, Mary L. Helm, was probated in Woodford county, and the Security Trust Company was appointed and qualified there as trustee under the will for the daughter, Margaret. It is conceded that each and every year since the appointment of appellant as trustee it has paid state and county taxes on the trust estate in Woodford county, Ky. The question of domicile is nearly, if not always, one of intent, and often very slight circumstances will serve to turn the judgment in favor of one or another of the different places claimed to be the domicile. It is a firmly settled rule of law that every person has a legal domicile somewhere; and it is equally well settled that, where the domicile is once established, an intent to abandon it and adopt a new one must be satisfactorily shown. Now, in the case before us, it is conceded that, up to the time of the death of her mother in 1903, the domicile of the mother and daughter was in Woodford county. To establish the fact that the daughter, after the death of the mother, changed her domicile from Woodford to Fayette county, the commonwealth proved that for the larger part, if not all, of the time since the death of the mother, the daughter has lived in a boarding house in Lexington, and evidence is given of certain statements of the cestui que trust relative to a proposed change of residence to avoid taxation; but this was after this procedure was commenced and had reference to escape from city taxation. On the other hand, we have the undisputed fact that the trustee has regularly listed the whole estate for taxation in Woodford county, and paid the taxes due thereon each year. We find, also, that Margaret Helm retained her membership in the Episcopal church at Versailles, and has never changed it to a church in Lexington; and it is shown that she told the officers of the trust company that she resided in Woodford county, she having been asked this question for the purpose of ascertaining where her estate should be taxed, and this long before any question of taxation in Fayette county arose. In reaching the proper conclusion as to the domicile of the cestui que trust, her sex and status and all her surroundings should be taken into consideration. Being single, with no family ties it was not necessary for her to own a house; being wealthy, she was not required to go into any business; and, being a female, she might feel a delicacy in keeping a room in the home of her tenant. On the whole, we think that the fact that the estate was listed for taxation during all of the years involved therein in Woodford county, Ky., ought to establish, in the absence of stronger evidence, that Margaret Helm resides in Woodford county."

In Boyd v. Com. 149 Ky. 764, Ann. Cas. 1914B 481, 149 S. W. 1022, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580, the following facts appeared, as stated by the court: "Robert Boyd has been for many years a resident of Laurel county, Ky. On the 9th of September, 1903, he stated to his friends that he intended leaving Kentucky and making his home thereafter in Texas. In furtherance of his expressed intention, he left his home, went to Louisville, from there to St. Louis, where he arrived on the 11th of September, and from that point traveled in a leisurely way toward his destination, Bonham, Texas, which point he reached on the 24th of September. He remained in Texas until sometime in the late fall or early winter, and not being in good health returned to Kentucky. He was registered as a legal voter of London, Laurel county, sometime in October, 1904. His property was listed for taxation in the county of Laurel in the falls of 1904, 1905, and 1906, and he died in November, 1906. He frequently expressed an intention of returning to Bonham, Texas, though he never did so. He did not list his property for taxation in the fall of 1903 prior to going to Texas, and the state, through one of its revenue agents, sought to compel him to do so. In the litigation which followed, it appeared that he was the owner of personal property of the value of $35,000 on September 15, 1903, the trial judge in the county court found, from the evidence, that he was not a resident of Bonham, Texas, but of Laurel county, Ky., and hence was answerable to the state for taxes upon this unlisted property. He appealed from the judgment of the county court, but, before the case was tried in the circuit, he died. The litigation was continued against his executor, and, upon final hearing, the chancellor was of opinion that the findings in the county court were correct and entered a judgment accordingly. The executor appeals." The court said: "As stated prior to September 9, 1903, he had expressed an intention of leaving Kentucky and making Texas his home. He had arranged with a relative there about lodging, etc., and in furtherance of that expressed intention, left Kentucky on the 9th of September, but did not arrive at his destination in Texas until September 24th, or nine days after the date upon which the property should have been listed for taxation in Kentucky, if liable for taxation here. Upon the 15th of September, he had not reached the border of the state of Texas. So, we are confronted with the naked question: Did his determination to make his home in Texas and his leaving Kentucky, for the purpose of going there, have the effect of giving him a domicile in that state before he actually reached it and settled there? If it did, then the [he] was not, on the 15th of September, a resident of Laurel county, for no principle is better settled than that one cannot have two domiciles at one and the same time. It is also true that every one must have, at all times, a legal residence somewhere. The place of one's birth is his domicile of origin; during his minority, he is without power to change this, though it may be changed for him by his parent, guardian or the person having legal custody of him. After his majority, he is free to change it, and when so changed, the new domicile is termed domicile of choice. One may have several homes, but can have only one legal residence. . . . Applying the rule announced in the . . . cases and texts to the facts in the case at bar, Robert Boyd did not become a resident of Bonham, Texas, until he located there on September 24th. Not having acquired a residence there prior to that date his legal residence necessarily remained in Laurel county, Kentucky, until that time; hence, the property sought to be subjected to taxation, was properly assessable for taxation in that county, and the trial judge correctly so held."

In the case of Winchester v. Van Meter, 158 Ky. 31, 164 S. W. 323, it was held that a removal was temporary and did not constitute a change of legal residence, in view of the facts which appear in the following excerpt from the opinion: "The evidence shows, without contradiction, that Van Meter, in April, 1912, and for many years prior thereto, owned and conducted a large farm in Clark county, a few miles distant from Winchester. His farm had never been leased or rented, but was managed and operated by servants and employees acting under the direct supervision of Van Meter. On this farm he maintained a furnished home, and this home was occupied by himself and family as a residence during several months each year. For a few years prior to 1910 he had been in the habit of removing with his family, which consisted of his wife and some children of school age, to the city of Lexington, in the fall of the year and remaining there until spring or early summer, for the purpose of enabling his children to attend school in Lexington. When school closed he would return, in company with his family, to his farm. In the fall of 1910 he rented a furnished house in Winchester in which he and his family lived until the spring or summer of 1911, during which time his children attended school in Winchester. At the close of school he returned with his family to his farm and lived there until the fall of 1911, when he again desired to take his family to Winchester in order that his children might more conveniently attend school. Not being able at this time to rent a house in which to live during the school period, he purchased a house in Winchester and furnished it, and in this house he and his family lived from some time in the fall of 1911 until the beginning of summer or close of the school year in 1912, when they returned to his farm. While he lived in Winchester, as well as in Lexington, it was his habit to go to the farm nearly every day for the purpose of superintending its management. He testifies that he never intended to take up his permanent residence in Winchester or to have a permanent residence at any other place than his farm, and that when he left the farm under the circumstances and for the reasons stated, it was always with the intention to return to it. It further appears that in these years all of his choses in action and personal property were listed for assessment in the district in which his farm was located, and in this precinct he always voted. Under this state of facts we think all of the choses in action and personal property owned by Van Meter in April, 1912, had a situs for taxation at his home in the country. He was merely a temporary resident of Winchester. He had never abandoned his home in the country, and when temporarily absent always had in mind the intention to return and did return when the reasons or conditions that induced temporary absence had ended."

In Saunders v. Flemingsburg, 163 Ky. 680, 174 S. W. 51, the facts were set forth by the court as follows: "The facts on which plaintiff relies are as follows: For many years he and his family resided in Poplar Plains in

Fleming county. Prior to March 11th, 1911, he sold his home property and gave possession during that month. He and his brother also owned about 570 acres of partnership land lying near Poplar Plains. About the same time that he sold his residence the partnership was dissolved and plaintiff purchased his brother's interest in the land. After leaving Poplar Plains plaintiff lived in Louisville for about three months and attended to certain duties there as a director of the Burley Company. Every two or three weeks he would return to Poplar Plains. When he returned he would sometimes board with Mrs. Samuel and sometimes stayed with his brother-in-law. During this time his wife remained in Louisville and his daughter continued at school at Millersburg. About the middle of July, 1911, they returned to Flemingsburg and took up their residence at Mrs. King's where they occupied furnished rooms and boarded at the hotel. They remained at the King residence in Flemingsburg for about a year. In September, 1911, plaintiff's daughter went to Lynchburg, Va., to school and remained there until after Christmas. She then returned to Flemingsburg. During the month of July, 1912, plaintiff and his wife moved to the property of Miss Ella Belt and at the time this action was filed were still occupying these rooms. While in Flemingsburg plaintiff would frequently make business trips to Lexington and other places. In March, 1914, he purchased a farm in Fayette county. After leaving Poplar Plains he always claimed that place as his home. He never intended to give up that home until he acquired a home elsewhere. He says that he had no intention of taking up his residence in Flemingsburg, but remained there only temporarily until he could find a place that was satisfactory. During the time that he remained in Flemingsburg he frequently stated to various people that he had no intention of making it his permanent residence. His church letter was transferred from Poplar Plains by the local minister at Flemingsburg, who insisted upon his becoming a member of the church at Flemingsburg. He was appointed on a church committee, but resigned because he did not know how long he would remain in Flemingsburg or how long it would be before he would locate permanently in some other place. While in Flemingsburg he was regularly assessed in Poplar Plains and paid his taxes as a resident of that precinct. On the other hand, the city relies on the following facts: The sale of plaintiff's home in Poplar Plains left him without any home there and plaintiff never intended to return to Poplar Plains. After moving to Flemingsburg plaintiff superintended the building of a large warehouse by the Burley Company and when complete became its manager. He also rented a large stock barn just outside of the city limits where he handled a number of horses, mules, etc. He also purchased several hundred thousand pounds of leaf tobacco upon his own account and in connection with others. He was a money lender and took between thirty and forty mortgages in which he described himself as a resident of Flemingsburg. His church letter was moved to Flemingsburg. After taking up his residence in Flemingsburg he remained there for almost three years and was still there when this suit was filed during the latter part of March, 1914." Holding that the residence of the plaintiff had been changed to Flemingsburg, in spite of his "floating intention" to go somewhere else, the court said: "In the present case it is insisted that though plaintiff had abandoned his former domicile he never acquired a domicile in the city of Flemingsburg with a view of remaining there permanently. He was there merely for a temporary purpose, i. e., until he could invest in a home. It is true that plaintiff so testified. It is also true that his intention declared to others sustains his view. However, it must be remembered that a party's own testimony or declared intention cannot have a controlling effect. Where there is a conflict between the party's intention and his conduct, his conduct will control. . . . Plaintiff admits that he left Poplar Plains with no thought of ever returning there. While he was in Louisville temporarily he acquired no residence there. He returned with his family to Flemingsburg in July, 1911. For nearly three years he remained there and conducted his business. Having abandoned his former domicile with no intention of ever returning and having acquired an actual residence in Flemingsburg, it was not necessary, in order to show that a new domicile had been acquired in Flemingsburg, to prove that plaintiff intended to stay there permanently. Though plaintiff says he was there for temporary purposes only, he admits that he was to remain there until he purchased a new farm and, to say the least, his stay there was for an indefinite length of time. . . . Where a man abandons his former home and takes up a new home with a view of remaining there indefinitely, or until he actually purchases a new farm, and does remain there for almost three years, the fact that he may entertain a 'floating intention' to purchase property and go elsewhere will not be sufficient to show that no change of domicile has taken place. Here plaintiff did not move to Flemingsburg to carry out some particular purpose of a temporary character. He transacted practically all of his business there, and this business was of a large and substantial kind. Under these circumstances, there can be no doubt that he thereby surrendered his legal residence in the Poplar Plains precinct and acquired a new domicile and legal residence in the city of Flemingsburg."

In Covington v. Wayne, 58 S. W. 776, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 826, the court said: "Appellee instituted this action to enjoin the collection of taxes assessed on intangible personal property. He alleges that at the time of the assessment he was a resident citizen of the state of Rhode Island, and has listed all his personal property there for taxation, and had paid taxes there on that property. The allegation of residence in Rhode Island was denied by answer, and this is the sole issue. Upon this issue of fact the only proof is that of appellee. He proved that he is without an active occupation; owns national bank stock and government and other bonds, and his attention is given to real estate owned in Cincinnati, O. He owns a dwelling in Covington, and one in Rhode Island. Usually spends his summers in Rhode Island, his winters in the South and the remaining time at Covington. He testifies that since 1892 he has claimed his home to be in Rhode Island, and has been a nonresident of Kentucky. The lower court held he was not liable for the tax because he was not a citizen. We think this judgment is in conformity with the proof."

In London v. Boyd, 77 S. W. 931, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1337, the court said: "The further contention that appellee was an actual resident of London on the 15th of September, 1901, is not supported by the testimony. He testifies that his legal residence and home was at his farm five miles from the town of London; and that he resided there on the 15th of September, 1901, and had done so for several years previous to that date when in Kentucky; and that he voted in the country precinct which included his farm; that during the greater part of the year for many years he had been absent from Kentucky on account of his health: that the notes and bonds had been left in a safe in an office which belonged to him in the town of London, and which was occupied by one of his nephews, for convenience and safety alone. And whilst a number of witnesses introduced by appellant testified that appellee was frequently seen about his office and on the streets of London, and took his meals at one of the local hotels, and often spent the night there, this testimony was not sufficient to rebut the positive unequivocal statements of appellant as to his actual residence. We, therefore, conclude that the trial court properly found against appellant on both contentions."

(5) Louisiana.

In State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann. 165, the court said: "But conceding that the father of defendants had become a citizen of the United States and had acquired a domicile or residence in Louisiana, we are of opinion that the residence has been lost, by his residence in France, notwithstanding his repeated declarations of his intention to return and the various causes which it is alleged prevented it. It is in evidence, that being a native of France, he came to this country in the year 1805 or 6, being then 26 or 7 years of age, that in the year 1822 he returned to France and purchased an estate in the department of which he was a native and where his parents resided. How long he remained is not stated, but it appears that he was in Louisiana after the death of his uncle in 1824, engaged as one of his legatees and as agent of the others in arranging the affairs of his estate. In 1885, he returned to France and there married a lady whom he took to his estate near Nantz, where she has resided ever since, neither she, nor either of her children having ever been in this country. Whether he ever after his marriage visited Louisiana more than once is left in some uncertainty. One witness deposes that between the years 35 and 42, he made three visits, while several other witnesses examined by the defense, depose to only one visit made in 1841, after which he returned to France and there remained until his death in 1852. These facts . . . would seem to prove the domicile of deceased to have been in France at the time of his death."

In New Orleans v. Sheppard, 10 La. Ann. 268, the defendant was sued for municipal taxes and resisted on the ground that he was a citizen of Virginia. It was held that his residence was in Virginia, of which state he was therefore a citizen, and it was decreed that the cause should be remanded to the United States circuit court, on grounds of diverse citizenship. The court said, the facts sufficiently appearing in the opinion: "The defendant had been for several years a resident and avowedly a citizen of Louisiana. But about six years since, according to the testimony of several witnesses who were intimate with him, and who are not contradicted by other witnesses, the defendant announced his determination to reside on his farm at Shepherdstown, Virginia. From that period they say he began to occupy a dwelling house there, then recently finished, and which is his only domestic establishment. It is kept up by his servants during his temporary absences. He has expended about sixty thousand dollars in the improvement of this estate, and personally superintends the cultivation of the farm. For several years past some of those witnesses say he has uniformly refused to vote in New Orleans when requested to do so, declaring he was no longer a citizen of Louisiana. It appears, however, that the defendant comes annually to New Orleans in the month of November, and stays until sometime in April, when he returns to his estate in Virginia; that he has large interests in New Orleans, real and personal, but for several years past has ceased to transact a commercial business here. It also appears that since 1847, about which period the intention to change his residence was, according to the witnesses, carried into effect, he is spoken of in a notarial act signed by him, and in three petitions filed by his counsel, as being 'of New Orleans,' or 'residing in New Orleans;' while in the registry of a vessel, he is described as of Shepherdstown, Virginia. In qualifying here as executor of the estate of a wealthy friend, he submitted to the onerous requisition of giving bond under the statute as a nonresident; this however being at a date subsequent to the institution of this suit. Although the circumstances above enumerated are somewhat conflicting, our conclusion from the whole is that the defendant has acquired a domicile in Virginia, facto et animo, and is entitled to be considered as a citizen of that state. Shepherdstown is considered by himself and his friends, and has fairly become, his permanent residence and home; New Orleans, on the contrary, a place of temporary sojourn during about five months of the year."

(6) Maine.

In Judkin v. Reed, 48 Me. 386, the court said: "It is a question of fact, whether the plaintiff was or was not, on the first day of April, 1855, a resident in Roxbury. And, in my opinion, the evidence reported greatly preponderates in favor of the position that the defendant, on that day, had his legal residence in Roxbury, and was liable to be taxed, and was legally taxed in that town. The case finds that, in 1848, the plaintiff purchased a farm situate partly in Mexico and partly in Roxbury, and that, in 1852, he built a house on said farm, on the line, so that the house stood partly in the town of Mexico and partly in the town of Roxbury. The plaintiff changed his residence from Mexico to Roxbury when he moved into this house in 1852. His domicile was in one or the other of these two towns. It could not be in both. In which, depends upon no one fact, but upon all the facts in the case. . . . Only a small part of the house is in Mexico. The most necessary and indispensable part is in Roxbury, as well as the other buildings and conveniences."

In Church v. Rowell, 49 Me. 367, the following facts appeared: "The plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned, on account of the omission to pay a tax assessed upon him in the town of Hartland, for the municipal year 1853; and the action is against the assessors.

upon the ground that he was not an inhabitant of Hartland on May 1, 1853. There was no controversy, that the plaintiff lived with his father, in the town of Hartland, till he was seventeen years of age. Having bought his time, he left his father's house, and lived in several different towns, and was at Hartland very little afterwards, excepting that he was there at one time for about three months, attending school and living at his father's. He went to California, in the year 1850, and, while there, he and several others owned a house, in which they lived, and carried on mining operations. In March or April, in the year 1853, he left California and came to Hartland, where he arrived on April 28, 1853. He staid there from three to five days, after which he went to Canaan; and, on the seventh day of May, 1853, he bought in Canaan a farm, stock, farming tools, and furniture, and afterwards took up his permanent abode in that town." The court held the following instruction to the jury to be correct on those facts: "First, if the plaintiff ever had a home established in the town of Hartland, and if he was in California, or other places, for a specific purpose, intending to return to Hartland, when that purpose should be accomplished, without making either of such places his home for an indefinite period of time, his former residence would not be lost. Otherwise, if he took up his abode in California, or other places, without any present intention to remove therefrom. Second, if he had acquired a home in California, and when he left there to come to Hartland, he departed with the deliberate intention of not returning there, but to abandon it, and he came to Hartland, as to his former established home, and was there on May 1, 1853, having no intention to go to reside in any other particular place as a home, he was subject to taxation in Hartland. If he had acquired a home in California, as before stated, and he left there with the intention of returning, and not to abandon it as a home, and such intention was retained by him on May 1, 1853, he was not a subject of taxation in Hartland, on that day."

In Littlefield v. Brooks, 50 Me. 475, the following facts appeared: "In March, 1860, the plaintiff was an inhabitant of Brooks; that on the 30th of March he formed the intention of leaving that town as his place of residence; that he accordingly left that day and went to Monroe; that on the 1st of April he proceeded to Bangor, where he spent the night, and on the 2d of April reached Oldtown, at which place it was his intention to make his residence, when he left Brooks." The court held that since the new residence in Oldtown was not acquired until April 2d, the old residence at Brooks continued until that date and that therefore the plaintiff was rightly taxed in Brooks on April 1st.

In Parsons v. Bangor, 61 Me. 457, it was held that the plaintiff was, on April 1st 1867, a resident of New York and not of Bangor, Maine, and was, therefore, not taxable in Bangor on that date, the facts appearing as follows: "At the trial he [the plaintiff] rested his case upon his own testimony, which in substance was as follows: That he now resides in Brooklyn; that he resided in Bangor from 1835 to 1867, boarding the last four years of his residence there, with his wife, at the Bangor house, where the rooms they occupied were partially furnished by him; that he resigned his office as cashier of a bank in the city about the middle of March, 1867, in pursuance of an arrangement made the month preceding to take effect April 1st, to go into business in New York city as one of a firm of which his brother-in-law, a resident of Medford, Mass., was to be a member; that he sold a lot in Bangor upon which he had once intended to build, but had not; that he disposed of all his real estate in the city; that he sold his bank stock and vessel property, and some of the remnants of furniture, which he had stored when he gave up housekeeping in 1863; that he made a conditional sale of his horse because he did not know whether he should want to take him or not, and a like conditional sale of his carriage; that he afterwards took them back and had them sent to Massachusetts in the course of the summer. He says at first that he sold all his furniture, that he did not want to move, before going himself, as hereinafter stated, but afterwards admits that some of it might have been sold afterwards. What was finally removed (bedding, pictures, books, and some few articles of furniture) was sent some time in the summer, not to New York but to Lexington, Mass., where he fixed his residence the following autumn. On Saturday morning March 30, he settled his bill at the Bangor House, and, as he says, surrendered his rooms, but said to the landlord that if his wife could retain them for a few weeks she would like to do so, and taking with him nothing but his wearing apparel he started for New York where he arrived Monday morning, April 1, 1867, engaged board and commenced business the same day. He has never since lived in Bangor or in Maine. He was to pay a certain price for his own board and another and different price when his wife, whom he left behind in Bangor, to remain until the boarding place was engaged, should arrive. She never did go to live in New York. His brother-in-law died the same week and that broke up the business arrangement. The plaintiff's wife went to Massachusetts to attend the funeral a week after her husband left Bangor, and was then informed by her husband that it was uncertain under the circumstances whether he remained in New York, and she returned to Bangor in a week or two, as he says, 'to complete her arrangements for removal, with his knowledge and approval.' His interest in the New York business ceased in June. The plaintiff was back and forth and between Boston and New York during the summer and his wife remained in Bangor so far as appears, retaining their old quarters at the Bangor House, until they finally settled at Lexington that year. Having testified to these facts upon his examination in chief and cross-examination, on being re-examined by his counsel, he says 'on April 1st, I had no intention but that I should live in New York, and when I left her the agreement was that I should live in New York.'

In Stockton v. Staples, 66 Me. 197, it was held from and after June, 1872, the defendant was a resident, for taxation purposes, of Searsport and not of Stockton, the following facts appearing, as stated by the court: "The defendant is the master of a vessel. Previous to 1871, his home had been in Stockton. In September of that year, he left on a voyage, intending to abandon Stockton and, on his return, to go to Searsport. On his return from sea in June, 1872, he married a resident of Searsport, in that town, and remained there ten or eleven days. He then went to sea with his wife, and returned to Searsport in May, 1874, and then left his family there. He further testified that he had not been in the plaintiff town, except on a visit, since 1871, and that he claimed his home to be in Searsport."

In Porterfield v. Augusta, 67 Me. 556, the court held that a change of residence had not been effected by facts which appear in the following quotation from the opinion: "This is an action to recover back a tax of $130.50, assessed upon Allen Alexander, the plaintiff's intestate, in 1867, and paid by him under protest. It is in evidence that in 1863, Alexander purchased a house in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he resided with his family. Being a master mariner, he sailed from New York, December 1, 1866, on a voyage to the coast of Africa, from which he returned in July, 1867. Some three or four weeks after he sailed, his wife with her children and trunks containing their clothing came to Augusta to visit her mother, and remained with her until she received a telegram from her husband advising her of his arrival at the home port, when she returned to New York. Mr. Alexander was not in Augusta during the year 1867. While Mrs. Alexander was visiting her mother, the house and furniture were left in the charge of a friend, who occupied the house free of rent. There is no proof that Alexander owned any real or personal estate in Augusta, or that he had any intention whatever to change his domicile. He had done no act indicating in the most remote degree such intention. The wife could not change the domicile of her husband against his will had she desired to do so, and the evidence negatives any such desire on her part."

In Stoddert v. Ward, 31 Md. 562, 100 Am. Dec. 83, the following facts appeared: "Previous to the year 1869, the appellant had long been a resident of Charles county, and had been assessed and paid taxes on his property as such. Early in the year 1869 he resolved to change his residence and remove to the city of Baltimore. In his letter to the commissioners, exhibited with the bill of complaint, dated March 22d, 1869, he says, 'I have this day received information (which I have sought for, two months in vain), which determines me on removing to the city of Baltimore,' asking them to apportion his taxes for 1869 and stating that his farm, horses, cattle, etc., will be the only property subject to county taxation. 'The city stock and other personal property attaches to the domicile of the owners.' After this letter he continued in Charles county, with the intention to remove to Baltimore but not actually removing, till the 17th day of April, 1869, when he addressed another letter to the commissioners, upon the subject of the proof required by them with regard to his residence, and stating, 'I should have been residing in Baltimore in person, not in person and intent only, six weeks ago, if my daughter's illness of three weeks and more, following of five weeks, had not detained me here.' In reply to his letter, the commissioners by their clerk, addressed a letter to the appellant, dated April 27th, 1869, saying: 'Your favor of the 17th was to-day submitted to the board of county commissioners, and they direct me to inform you, that your application for a deduction on your taxable property came too late for this year, as they had already held their term for changing and making abatements on the assessable property for the year.' The only additional evidence furnished by the record, as to the time of the actual removal of the appellant to Baltimore, is a letter addressed to the clerk of the board of commissioners by John H. Barnes, register of Baltimore city, dated May 14th, 1869, saying: 'In the month of January of the current year, John T. Stoddert, Esq., of your county, communicated to me by letter his intention to remove to our city immediately, and make it his future home, and register his personal property here. In pursuance of such purpose, he has reported himself to me as a citizen of Baltimore, and his stocks are registered upon our books.'" The court said: "From this statement of facts, as disclosed by the bill and exhibits, it is apparent that the appellant continued in fact to reside in Charles county until as late as the 27th day of April, or perhaps till some time in May, on or about the 14th. It is also evident that he had the fixed intention to remove to Baltimore as early as the 22d day of March, or perhaps before that time; and the error into which he seems to have fallen, is that in a case like this, the question of domicil depends merely upon intention, and that he ceased to be a citizen of Charles county, liable to taxation as such, so soon as he determined to remove from the county, and communicated that purpose to the commissioners. In this view we think he was in error. In our judgment his change of domicil, so far as it respects the question of taxation, could not be effected by intention alone, and without actual removal. So long as he continued in fact to reside in Charles county, he was liable to taxation as a citizen thereof; and the levy for the year 1869 having been completed while he so continued to reside in the county, and before he removed therefrom, he is chargeable with the taxes assessed for that year, and the injunction was properly refused."

(8) Massachusetts.

In Lyman v. Fiske, 17 Pick. 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293, "it appeared that the plaintiff had lived on his farm in Waltham a number of years, and had been taxed and had paid his taxes in that town; that for several years he had been a widower; that for several years he had kept a house in Boston ready furnished, one room of which he had used as a counting-room; that he usually had some person living in the house to take care of it; that he kept a clerk in Boston, and transacted business there, mostly through commission merchants, but sometimes in his own person, or by his clerk; that he spent most of his time in Waltham, but was in the habit of coming often into Boston in the summer season, occasionally spending the night in Boston, but generally returning to Waltham on the same day; and that the house in Boston was managed generally in the same manner, whether he was more or less in the city. At an interview with the assessors of Waltham in 1831, the plaintiff proposed to them to pay the sum of $300, annually, for his taxes, and alluding to some previous difficulties with them about taxes, observed that he intended always to live and pay taxes in Waltham, unless the assessors bore too hard upon him. In March, 1832, the plaintiff directed his clerk to recall his former housekeeper, who had left his service, and have the house in Boston ready, as he intended to come to Boston that season and pay his taxes there. This direction was obeyed, and the housekeeper was at the house before the middle
